small figure marching through the bean poles, and pass the golden squashes and tasselled corn, and featherly asparagus. Will had it his own way, and the way led him to the water. There he began to fish, and presently, nobody near him, in he fell, head foremost.

But, from the distant parlor window, Mamie, looking out, with marvellously far-seeing eyes, had seen the baby's predicament. She flew like an arrow, screaming for her Mammy as she passed the kitchen, and Aunt Hannah's turbaned head, and long, lithe limbs, went hurrying after her. As Mamie reached the river bank, the flaxen poll rose to the surface, and the little scarlet figure threw itself into the waves, and caught the child with a firm clutch. A boat had directly come to the rescue, and black and white child were fished out, and handed dripping to Aunt Hannah, who hugged Willie to her broad breast, and scolded Mamie because she was so relieved and thankful that both little ones were unhurt.

A year after that, Mamie, who became more than ever a pet in the family of the Stewarts took a heavy cold. At first no one felt any solicitude, but as the hacking cough did not yield to remedies, and weeks rolled by, we all perceived that Mamie was fading away. It was the gentlest and most gradual of declines, and all that medical skill could do was done, but the child somehow had not a very strong hold on life, her vitality was low, and little by little, she slipped and slipped, farther and farther, till it was evident that soon the tide of death would carry her out to the deep sea of immortality.

Mamie was not in Aunt Hannah's kitchen. She had been brought to Mrs. Stewart's own house, and a lovely big room, opening off the parlor had been prepared for her. There from her bed she could watch the white sails on the beautiful river, and hear the silvery notes of the piano, when ladies who loved her came and played Chopin and Mendelssohn for her pleasure. Sometimes Aunt Hannah sang to her "Go down Moses!" and "Swing low, sweet chariot?" and she lay still, suffering little, always smiling, going home, her small shallop of life floating out peacefully to meet the fleets and argosies which evermore go sailing up to the city of God.

"I'se goin' to my Jesus!" was her confident reply. "I'se goin' to be well and hear music, and I'se goin' home!"

So passed into the light and the love, one of the sweetest souls I ever knew.
Under that little black face was a purity and graciousness only given to those who are washed white in the blood of the Lamb. Dear Mamie. Hers was the sweet hymn:

I don't even me that I know
 For the birds tell me so,
 Little one, to him, science
 There are, you, but for the strong.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

At School in Africa.

The following quaint details of School-life at Likoma, in Africa, are given by a missionary in African Tidings: "The African does not take kindly to figures, but can handle them in a very long chain and single matter of fact, as sums, as well as the others. We identify by the name of 'round numbers.' In this latter fingers are brought into play, and, what will surprise you more—Oiling is numbered by shoes, they prove most convenient. We treat the highest class in our copy-books, and they all learn to write re-peatedly, and in many cases, excellently well, faster than their white brethren. I wish, but for a power of doing much in a short time, that it must be owned, somewhat to her teacher's horror. The pen-wiper is her own, and the little book, in which the copy is made, every day another, and a new one is required. I now keep my ink in a tin provision of nature, and offer no expostulations. If ink gets spilt on the table it is wiped off with their own hands no one being a penny the wiser; another advantage of the shiny black skin."

Education Under Difficulties.

How a Brave Colored Girl Learned to Read and Write, and what She is doing at Mayesville, S. C., to Elevate Her Race.

EVERY one is stirred by a story of true, unselfish heroism. Hard and cold as the world is, its heart goes out in love and admiration to the man or woman who gives life and labor to the cause of the unfortunate. We do not grudge the man of aristocratic birth, or the man of wealth, the prizes that have fallen to his lot, but we keep the best prize, the crown of heroism, the highest places on the scroll of un-forgotten worthies for those who scorn to live a life of ease and luxury, or to toil for their own aggrandizement, but lay their lives on the altar of self-sacrifice. When a man or a woman lets the good things of life go, content if by devotion and hard service, some wretched, miserable people can be lifted out of their misery, we honor such an one as one who has the true spirit of Christ. Such honor may justly be given to the devoted woman whose portrait appears on this page. That she belongs to a despised race, and that she labors in a humble sphere, are considerations that do not enter into the account. The quality of her work, the purity and disinterestedness of her motives, and the sacrifices she has made, are the elements that made her a heroine, and that will win for her at the great day the approval of Him in whose steps she walks.

It was on a plantation near Mayesville, S. C., that Emma J. Wilson was living, a little child only a few years old when President Lincoln's proclamation gave her liberty. Already she had gained the first rudiments of an education. Her owner, concerned for the welfare of the children on his father's estate, had done a little teaching and from him she learned the alphabet. A newspaper had served as a primer, and she had learned to write with a pointed stick as a pen, and the sand as a copy-book. It was the roughest kind of learning, and the children of our northern cities may smile at such very elementary teaching; but there is something pathetic in the spectacle of the eager little child, thus getting her first initiation to the temple of knowledge. A child who would spend her time in that way, instead of in play, had true grit in her which, under favorable circumstances, would make its mark. For a long time after she was set free there seemed no prospect of her enjoying such circumstances. But she was bent on getting an education if it were possible. She coaxed her mother to buy her a spelling-book, and eventually the poor woman, whose cents were few, and who was not very sure that her child would benefit by the purchase, was induced to invest in a Webster's blue-back primer. With this treasure she was delighted, and eventually the girl was able to

The achievement only whetted her desire for knowledge. Books were to be had, and the Primer was exalting. It seemed tantalizing that no further progress could be made. But after waiting, the opportunity of attending school came. The Good-will school was seven miles from her home, and then open to her. Miss Wilson remembered the delight with which she tramped those seven miles morning and night to take advantage of the opportunity. She studied hard, her teachers were interested, and eventually to her great delight she won a scholarship in Scotia Seminary. Her outfit then became a problem to the poor household that was hard to support. They were proud of her progress and anxious for her to enjoy the fruits of her hard toil. A few articles in the poor household were turned into money, and the people of the village, both white and colored, knew of the child's hard struggle for help. Clothing, and a little money for books came from one another, and gifts not to be measured by their value, but by the sacrifices they involved. Thus equipped the girl went to Scotia where she remained two years, graduating with honors at the end of her term.

The question of a career had often been discussed during her studies and she was urged by several Christian friends to see herself as a missionary to Africa. Her work would have been congenial to the girl had given her heart to it and had become a member of the Presbyterian Church. There have been an assured income she would have been lifted from the squalid surroundings of her home life. But her heart was over her own people, girls like herself whom she knew, who were growing up like heathen at home for lack of the instruction she could give. There were boys, too, ignorant and intelligent, near at hand who needed her help as much as the millions of an African forest. She determined to give her life to her people.

From the time of her leaving the Seminary to the present, this colored woman has toiled for the benefit of her race. How sorely her needs were needed she saw still more fully after her two years' residence among the refinements of the Seminary. The people were white and hard, but had no idea of economic. Their daily life was equal and miserable. Early out in the morning, father, mother, and children toiling until noon; then home for their poor meal, which m.

them ate sitting on the floor in a room around a common dish, and at night lying on their wretched "pallets" on the ground. They needed to learn much beside book-knowledge. Patiently and cheerfully the girl, who had seen nothing but white people live, set to work. She taught the little ones in an empty gin house; later in a church placed at her disposal; she helped the elder women to make their homes better and gave herself to the use of her people in every way that was possible to her.

Our readers know from our former articles and from the picture we published the teachers and pupils in the institution what has been the outcome of the work of this consecrated woman, and the fruit of her own race educated like herself, who have labored with her. They are a big band, toiling in poverty and under many difficulties, but supported by the true Christian spirit, that like the Master gives life and labor that others may live. To this little band of laborers the spiritual gifts of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have come like rain on parched ground. They now see nearing reality their long cherished desire for a bureau of their own, in which the boys are taught useful trades and the girls are taught sewing and cooking. The $3,000 already received is in bank, at the call of the Committee, of which Dr. Klopsch, proprietor of this journal is a member. A suitable site can now be secured on favorable terms, and as speedily as contributions come in, the work will be pushed forward. It is a delightful pleasure to help such people, and we will gladly contribute knowledge in these columns all contributions sent to us for the work.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This letter is a fair example of hundreds that are now reaching us daily:

ST. PAUL, Minn., Oct. 20.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:—My leather-lined Index Bible came to hand yesterday, and I shall never again use anything but a leather-lined Bible. It is the greatest convenience in the world, and I am charmed with the facility with which we can find any part of the book. We bought a Bible some time ago that was paper-lined, and I then knew the advantages of the leather. I thought your Index Bible was better, we once perceived the great superiority of the leather over the paper lining. J. R. ANDREWS.

ADER, Phila., Pa. Please state in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the exact name and address of the Treasurer to whom money is to be sent for "The Mount-Lawn Home."

Contributions should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

P. S., New Athens, O. Should a young married man, with the promise of a good farm home, having five years yet to attend school, continue his studies and enter the ministry, or remain on the farm as his parents wish him to?

Such a question ought to be prayerfully considered before a decision is reached. If the young man is of a high spiritual nature, a true Christian, with some natural talent and with unmistakable call to a life of active service for Christ, he would do well to continue his studies with the ministry in view. But even if he were not sure of this, and were to decide to leave the farm, that need not prevent him from serving the Master acceptably; for even the humblest walks of life present opportunities for doing good and making others happy.

W., Davenport, Neb. 1. Give names of some of Chaucer's literary productions. 2. Some of his contemporaries. 3. A few words descriptive of the society of his time. 4. One canto from Canterbury tales. 5. And a few lines from Faery Queen. 6. Who were some of Spenser's contemporaries and what he wrote and the society of his time?

The House of Fame, Canterbury Tales, Legend of Good Women, Court of Love, Book of the Duchess, and The Romance of the Rose, are among Chaucer's leading works. Any biographical dictionary will furnish the data you desire concerning both Chaucer and Spenser. We cannot devote the space to it.

McAfee, Harrisburg, Pa. Who is the "Grand Old Man of Japan," so-called?

Yukichi Fukuzawa. Though the junior of Marck and Gladstone by probably twenty years, he is yet a most distinguished statesman and has done more for his country's intellectual and social advancement than any other Japanese living. He visited America thirty-five years ago and on returning home introduced the study of the English language, and advocated the opening up of Japan to Western influences. He is founder of a great university, senior editor of an influential journal and a noted author. He has persistently declined to receive decorations and similar honors from royalty.

S. M. F., Riverside, Cal. It is claimed by the Unitarian Church folks here that the distinguished people whose names are enclosed are members of their church, and do not believe that Christ was the Son of God. Is their claim justifiable?

Such a claim is mendacious and unworthy serious consideration. On the other hand, there is ample evidence, did space permit, to show from published biographies that the majority of the names you enclose are those of Christian men and women. Such a claim as to mention cannot be maintained and is wholly regardless of the truth. Do not permit yourself to be dragged into a controversy on the subject.

V., Rochester, N. Y. Where can I find the following verse in the Bible: "Blessed are they who believe in the Lord, for they shall see God?" This was put on my wife's grave-stone through some mistake and I cannot find such a verse in the Bible. Is there any similar verse in the Bible?

The precise language quoted in your letter not in the Bible. The nearest approach to is found in the passages, which you can compare, in Matt. 5:8 and Rev. 14:13.

S. John H., Collinsville, Tex. Where in the Bible can we find that Jephthah killed his daughter?

The passage in Judges 11:39, "who did with according to the vow," is capable of such construction, but authorities differ greatly as to the true interpretation. Josephus, in Antiquities (Book 5, Chap. 7, Sec. 10), distinctly says, "when the time was over, he sacrificed his daughter as a burnt offering," and unsparsingly condemns the act in the same sentence. Most of the Jewish writers, as well as the early Christian fathers, take this view. On the other hand, Joseph Kimchi, Leviben-Gerson, Irenaeus, Grotius, Bishop Hall, Dr. Hale, and many other eminent men, hold that the vow was one of consecration, not destruction, and that she was shut up for the remainder of her life and condemned to perpetual virginity. They point to the fact under the Mosaic law such a sacrifice was impossible, the Israelites being expressly forbidden to indulge in human sacrifices.

W. G. R., Oneco, Fla. Where is there a good training school for foreign mission work?

Moody Institute, Northfield, Mass.; Moody Training Schools, Chicago; Baptist Missionary Training Institute, La Salle avenue, Chicago; and Christian Alliance Institute, Eighth ave., New York. All four are excellent.

Lemuel Marsden, Sacramento, Cal. 1. In a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, you mention the great age of some of our California redwoods. Are there not trees in the Eastern States and elsewhere that attain as great an age? 2. What trees live the longest?

1. There are trees in some Oriental countries whose legendary life counts up into the thousands of years. Thus, in Ceylon, one great tree of incredible age is pointed out, and there are others in Arabia. An aged olive in Gethsemane is said to be almost as old as the Christian era. 2. The comparative ages of trees are: Elm, 300 years; ivy, 355 years; maple, 516 years; larch, 576 years; orange, 630 years;

AN EGYPTIAN WELL, OPERATED BY OXEN.

In many Eastern countries, where water is scarce, the precious fluid is brought by various mechanical devices from deep wells in the bowels of the earth. One of these is shown in our illustration. The wheel is a clumsy, wooden affair, and is furnished with a set of buckets or earthen jars, which descend empty and return full as the wheel revolves. Oxen are yoked to a pole which passes through the axis of the wheel, as shown in the photograph.

cypress, 800 years; walnut, 900 years; lime, 1,700 years; spruce, 1,200 years; oak, 1,500 years; cedar, 2,000 years; yew, 3,200.

H. T. S., Philadelphia, Pa. 1. What was the origin of "the Apostles' creed," and when was it first used? 2. Can the Encyclopedia referred to in your paper be purchased? If so, what is the price for same?

1. It is held by early writers that the creed was composed by the Apostles themselves, during their stay at Jerusalem, shortly after our Lord's ascension. 2. It cannot, and our advertisement distinctly so states.

Subscriber, Suppose a wife calculates that her husband does not give her any pocket-money? Her husband is not rich. His salary comes fully to the house and remains there till all is spent for the needs of the family. He spends nothing for his own pleasure, nor is he given up to any vice, and he keeps the purse only because the money comes naturally to him and he considers himself as the treasurer of the family. If the treasury allows it, she gets from it for special purposes as much as she needs; but still, she thinks she ought to have a treasury also. The husband, on the other hand, regards her as the father in the parable did his oldest son: "Thou art ever with me; all that I have is thine;" and that therefore there is no need for her to have a separate treasury. What do you think about it?

This is doubtless the position of affairs in many homes, but although the attitude, as expressed by our correspondent, has its defenders, it is not all that a faithful, loving, intelligent wife might reasonably expect. She is really the partner of her husband, sharer of joy and sorrow, of fortune and adversity, and she should be a counselor and guide, rather than a dependant. If the husband is head of the house, she is its queen and should have a voice in all that relates to its management, handling of finances included. To deprive a wife of all power over the family purse is to degrade her to the level of a servant. (See Proverbs 31:11 to 31.)

J. R., Clayton, Ala. 1. Who was the first missionary to China, and when did he go? 2. How many missionaries have we in China? 3. Who was the first missionary to Japan? What has been the growth of Christianity there? 4. What has been the growth of Christianity in the world for the past twenty years, for the past ten years, for the past five years? 5. About how many churches have been built in the United States? 6. About how much money is given annually to the missionary enterprise?

To answer all these questions accurately and satisfactorily would require more time and space than we can devote to any single inquirer. In the volume called A Hundred Years of Missions, published by Funk & Wagnalls, you will find the information you want.

Husband, Chicago, Ill. Is a Christian man whose wife has been unfaithful, bound to forgive her and restore her to her place if she confesses her sin and asks to be forgiven?

We would advise you to do so, if you can. You may save a soul from death. You must forgive her, but there is no compulsion to restore her. It would, however, be a Christ-like thing to do. Forgiveness without restoration would leave a stigma upon her that would deprive it of its virtue.

Knight Templar, Philadelphia. One of your recent answers in the Mail-Bag appears to indicate that you believe there is no chance of pardon beyond the grave. Do you not think that God will pardon the sinner who repents wherever he may be?

Have you not misunderstood our answer? We said there was no warrant in the Bible for entertaining the hope. That if there is a profect man, but he was a man who sincerely repented of his sins, and earnestly sought forgiveness. There is a great difference between a good man falling into sin, and a bad man who persistently lives in sin and pays no heed to reproof. Both are deplorable, but of the former there is hope. You cannot separate the two characters. The story is told of a bishop who was also a prince. He was a profane man; one day after uttering an oath, he asked a pious servant why he looked so surprised. "To hear a bishop swear," said the man. "I swear as a prince, not as a bishop," said the prelate. The servant answered: "Will your lordship tell me what will become of the bishop, when Satan gets the prince?"

C. G. Kimalyan, Dorchester, Mass. 1. Who was the Man with the Iron Mask? 2. If it is not known does it not disprove Matt. 26:26? 3. Shall we accept partial or verbal inspiration? 4. Does the theory of evolution prevail among scientists? 5. Is it a fact or a theory? 6. Does the Bible teach evolution?

1. It is not known, but as you are probably quite aware, many romantic suggestions were made as to the identity of the prisoner in the Bastille who was said to have worn the mask. 2. No, because the time of revelation of secrets was not stated. 3. If you mean the verbal inspiration of our English Bible, you can scarcely accept that, unless you believe the translators were inspired. 4. It does. 5. It is a theory. 6. It teaches submission to authorities, except in matters of conscience. But in cases of grievous oppression, revolution is justifiable.

Jessie M., Leavenworth, Kan. 1. How many bees are there in a hive—the average? 2. Where can I get bee-keeping instruction? 3. How much honey can a hive gather daily?

1. A hive may contain anywhere from 10,000 to 30,000 bees, only one-half of them being honey-gatherers, while the others do duty in the hive. 2. Perhaps the editor of some one of the Bee-keepers' publications may afford information. 3. A hive with 20,000 outdoor workers making from six to ten trips and exploring 500,000 flowers, or perhaps more, will gather in good weather and under favorable conditions about two pounds of honey daily.

Constant Reader, Rogers Prairie, Tex. What reason had Paul for forbidding women to speak in the churches? Cor. 14:34?

The customs of the time. Corinth was a very licentious city. It was above all things necessary, as the history of the Church proved, that the infant religion should not be regarded as countenancing immodesty in women. To speak in a public assembly was regarded as bold and immodest. Paul was anxious to have no further scandal, as there had already been one serious one in the Church. We cannot believe that in the present condition of society, he would have written such a prohibition.

W. S. F., Finch, Ont. Referring to the story of Balaam in Numbers 22, is there not an inconsistency in God being angry with the man for going after he had told him he might go?

If you study the whole story the apparent inconsistency will disappear. Balaam at first heeded the prohibition. He would not go because he was told not to go, inasmuch as Israel was blessed, and he must not curse those whom God had blessed. Then the king sends more distinguished messengers with more valuable presents. Balaam's cupidity was excited. He wanted the presents, and he hopes to get a different answer from God, as if the value of the presents could make any difference with him. He is allowed to go, but is warned not to say anything but what he is told to say, and he knows what that will be. Balaam goes, and there is no doubt he intended to earn his money by cursing. God who sees the heart perceived his intention and interposed. That would account for his being blamed.

Louella Farney, Beaver, O. I am convinced that Saturday is the proper Sabbath. Ought I to keep it when all around me are keeping Sunday as the Sabbath?

You should obey your conscience whatever others may do. But as we suppose you have not renounced Christianity for Judaism, we may hope you will not desecrate the day on which all Christendom concurs in celebrating the Lord's resurrection. That would be to dishonor him. Keep Saturday holy as the Jews do, if you like; and you may keep Friday holy too as the Mohammedans do, if you wish; but do not neglect the Sunday, which is the day Christians observe. In short it will be well if you keep all the days of the week holy in the sense of refraining from sin.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

Antwerp and Its People.

An Old-World City Full of Quaint Customs and Picturesque Scenes.

FEW cities in Europe have a more attractive history than Antwerp, the old Belgian city by the sea. It was founded by the Saxons over nine hundred years ago, and its people were converted to Christianity by teachers from the western isles. As early as 726 A. D., mention is made of a market-toll being enforced in Antwerp, showing that even in those early days it was a centre of some trade. Wool and other materials for the great manufactories of the continent were imported through Antwerp for many years, and its merchants were among the richest on the globe, and old-time writers, including Guicciardi and Scribanus, have left glowing accounts of its greatness. Its annual fairs attracted merchants from all parts of Europe. Five hundred ships would enter its port in a single day and five hundred laden wagons would pass through its gates daily.

But the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were evil times for the grand old city, which was despoiled alternately by French and Dutch, its citadel captured, its citizens impoverished, and its commerce almost destroyed. In recent years it has regained much of its old volume of trade, although commercial supremacy has gone elsewhere.

There are many fine old buildings in Antwerp, including the Gothic pile called the Exchange (built in 1531), the massive and venerable Hanseatic League House and the splendid cathedral of Notre Dame (of fourteenth century construction), whose paintings, shrines, chapels and decorations are world-famous. In the town gallery are nearly six hundred pictures, including famous specimens of Rubens, Vandyk, Titian, Teniers, Jordaens, Quintin Matsys, and other masters. There are, also, a number of fine educational buildings devoted to literature, science and art, schools of navigation, zoological and botanical gardens, and a library of 30,000 volumes.

There are numerous nooks in Antwerp where the appearance of the people and their general surroundings demonstrate how slow are the changes in dress and customs in certain parts of the world. The old fisherman and his wife who are shown in the photograph reproduced on this page are familiar types of their class. Hardy, weather-beaten and courageous as are all the fishing people of the River Scheldt, and of the North Sea, they belong to a race that has lost none of its characteristics during the centuries. Their dress is simply a sufficient protection against the weather. The fisherman wears a heavy, weather-beaten coat, and the fishwife's stiff-starched muslin cap and the creel or basket laden with the finny prizes that have fallen to her husband's skillfully-thrown net.

Mr. Gladstone on Music.

At a recent musical fete on the grounds of Harrogate Castle, Mr. Gladstone took occasion to remark on the "Jignity, fervor and majesty" of the music sung in Welsh chapels and related to the following remarks:

"I have no musical faculty and feeling. If I were without it, it is because it is all nonsense to talk about music as a gift to the generality of mankind. The gift to one man here and one woman there, and the gift to the majority of mankind is a downward. I deny that. I say, if it is properly tended and properly brought out, it is a general gift in civilized countries, and even in barbarous countries, and most certainly it is a gift that pervades the people of this country, so far as nature's part is concerned. But people used to say to me 'I cannot sing,' and I said, 'Now, supposing that when you were a baby, and when you grew out of being a baby your nurse always continued to carry you in her arms, do you think you would be able to walk?' I am sure not. Well, you must learn to walk by practising walking, and you must learn to sing by practising singing. Beyond singing lies instrumental music, and there the progress made has been astonishing. It was to the last degree rare when I was young, and it has now become very common."

A Smiling Face.

Everybody welcomes a smiling face. All doors are open to it; all social circles welcome it. It is an open sesame to heart and glass and scythe broken; and an empty purse. After finishing it, he broke his palette and brushes, sketched the remains with his pencil, and never wrought more. A month later he died. Such a death carries its own moral.

Tea in a Mandarin's Home.

Miss K. B. Stayner, a missionary at Wun-chau, China, in a recent letter gives this entertaining description of a social visit to the home of a mandarin:

"In the morning of the day we intended to visit them we sent our boy with our cards announcing our intention, and in the afternoon we and the Bible-woman set off in chairs. This young girl proved to be the daughter of an official under the Tao-tai, or mandarin, called Koh Da-lao-yeh, who has charge of all affairs in connection with foreigners, and whom we know seems favorable to them. The other three ladies were mandarins' wives, who lived near our young friend. We were received in a very friendly way. Koh's wife, a pretty, young-looking woman, came out to meet us, and we were led up to seats of honor. Soon several more of the old T'aitais came in, and before we left there must have been at least six of them. The neighborhood must have been in a perfect nest of mandarins! We were treated first to tea, then to very nice Chinese cakes. After that we presented some of the children with colored handkerchiefs, balls, and Christmas cards; then I was asked to home. By it burdens are lightened, cares dispelled, sorrows banished, and hope made to reign triumphant, where fear, doubt and despondency held high carnival. Get the glow and radiance from such nearness to the throne as God permits to his own. Bring from a holy and divine communion a face luminous with light, and let it glow and shine on all around. A little child on the street of a great city, wishing to cross at a point where the surging throng and the passing vehicles made the feat dangerous to the strong, and especially to the weak, paused, hesitated, and then asked a sunny-faced gentleman to carry her across. It was the sunny face that won the child's confidence. Childhood makes no mistakes.

An Artist's Moral Lesson.

One of the strangest lessons ever told by an ebbing life was that which is related by Hogarth, the famous artist. His last drawing, when he lay the hand of death upon him, was a broken bottle; the butt end of an old musket; an old broom worn to the stump; an unstrung bow; a crown in pieces on the floor; towers in ruins; a cracked bell; the sign-post of an inn, called the "World's End," falling down; a waning moon; an empty gibbet dropping to the ground; a ship on fire; Pharoah and his horses lying dead in the clouds; a wrecked ship; Time, with his preach the Gospel to them, as on the last visit some of the ladies seemed quite interested in what the Bible-woman had told them. This was quite a formidable ordeal, and I first suggested the woman speaking instead, but no, they wanted to hear the foreigner, so at last I began, and really it was not so hard after all, for they listened most attentively, and of course understood things far better than most of the country people, being more intelligent. When I had finished speaking they wanted to hear more, so the Bible-woman spoke on for a long time. Some sweet rice balls were brought for us. The young girl showed us all over their house, picked some pretty flowers for us, gave us a couple of pretty bits of needlework, and we had some more talk, and then returned to the guest-room to make our adieux."

The Value of System.

In training the young, the importance of system cannot be too much impressed upon their minds. It is the open sesame of smooth and rapid work. Systematic people get over the most ground with the least friction, and have the greatest capacity for enjoyment of well-earned leisure. When our minds are harassed by the thought of duty undone, real pleasure is impossible. Lack of system makes a lumber room of many lives that might otherwise be capable of accomplishing great results.

LIFE'S TASKS.

(Written for "The Christian Herald.")

How slow God's children are the tasks learn. Meant for their culture in the heav'nly w. Much less their erring reason can discern The meaning he designs they should convey As wild, unruly children thrust aside Their books unlearned, in discontent a blame. So they in the perverseness and the pride Of wilful hearts, have dared to do the sad How might they thrive beneath God's teaching's blest!

Were they to give them diligence and heed Surely a teacher so divine knows best, What daily task a child of his may need. Alas! they deem themselves already wise—Wiser than any philosophic sage, And hence the reason that before them lies The slighted lesson, and neglected page.

Yet all the while this heav'nly Tutor, God, Over his truant children yearning bends; In place of angry frowns and threat'ning frowns The look that kind forbearing love portends. Made Happy in Old Age.

C MOST beautiful story was related by the well known English revivalist, Denham Smith. He made the acquaintance of Baron and his Countess in Ita-

They were a genial, wealthy, and accomplished couple, advancing in years, but still able to travel about from place to place, with all the attendants suitable to their position and rank. Mr. Smith never had any direct spiritual conversation with them till they were about to part; when, seizing the hand of the Baron, he said "Good-bye; I hope we shall meet again." "Many thanks, sir," said the Baron, "at my time of life it is scarcely possible I shall ever meet again; if you come back to this neighborhood, the probability that I shall be gone." "Yet I hope I shall meet again." "Ah, sir, you mean in heaven." "I do, indeed." "Ah, I shall never meet you there," replied the Baron; "I am too great a sinner ever to meet you there." The aged couple were deeply affected, and the countess said "Sir, what would you do with one like me? I was religiously brought up, a member in England I attended the ministrations of a Protestant clergyman, but since the years I have wandered away from God and amid the pleasures and excitements of the world I have forgotten what I used to know. What would you do with a child who had left the father's house?" "Do," replied Mr. Smith, "I would point her to the 15th chapter of Luke," and opening that chapter and putting it into the hands of the countess, he asked her to read it.

She read it until tears dropped from her own and her husband's eyes. Coming to the verse which describes the prodigal coming to himself, she said emphatically "Is that me?" "O yes, it is you. Again she read on till she came to the other clasp in his arms the returning prodigal. Said the Baron, "Is that God's father God?" "Yes, with arms around that bundle of rags." "Can you stop a minute?" he cried; a pulling out his note-book, said, "Let me write that down." The two afterwards trusted in Christ, believed in the Gospel and were made happy.

Mrs. Stowe on Spiritual Comfort.

There were few more beautiful lives than that of Harriet Beecher Stowe, who recently passed away. In a letter to a friend, written not very long ago, she gives this inspiring glimpse of her faith and hope, when nearing the close of life: "I am coming to that stage in my pilgrimage that is in sight of the river of death, and I feel that now I must have all in readiness day and night for the messenger of the King. I have sometimes in my strange perceptions of a vivid spiritual life near to and with Christ and multitudes of holy ones, and the joy of it is like no other joy; it cannot be told in the language of the world. What I have, then, I know with absolute certainty; yet it is so unlike and above anything we conceive of in the world that it is difficult to put it in words. The inconceivable loveliness of Christ!" Her splendid faith stayed with her to the end.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning November 1. p. 15; 140.

CRUDE ideas of Christianity are responsible in a large degree for the slow progress it is making in the world. An impression prevails within, as well as outside the Church, that religion is a hindrance to the progress of spiritual life-insurance; that the Christian pays the premium of abstention from certain pleasures, and in return receives at his death escape from perdition and entrance into everlasting bliss. How much a notion of Christianity from Christ's idea of it, may realize by a study of the verses associated with the vine. He conceived of the Christian as so closely united with himself, that the union was like the union between the branch and the vine. He said very little about the conditions, but he dealt about the Kingdom of Heaven, and again and again he said to his disciples, "The Kingdom of Heaven is within you." It was not a condition to be conferred at some future time but a condition to be enjoyed now, which should lead to full fruition in the life. The heaven he pointed to his hearers was the present life set free from the conditions and the things of the world, and deepening out and deepening in. The life which he came to impart, is received here and now, and permeates the being, elevating it, so that in the new and better conditions it shall have present the conditions it most desires and has been desiring. This is the mysterious condition that he calls abiding in the vine. As the branch grows from the vine and has no separate existence, but draws all life and nutriment from the vine, so the Christian was to draw life from Christ. And his life was to be eternal, given in unbroken continuity, rather than by the death of the body—the same life enlarged and made distinct by the confinement of the body. He made distinctly that he gave life to his people. It is only for the full development of life there must be perfect submission to him. Pursuing the figure which he gave for it, we see the vine-brancher cutting and pruning, pruning the branch to the point that supports the vine, the one object of getting it from it. If the branch is feeling, we can imagine the process being very painful. This in the human branch, the end is desirable. That we should make the process painful. Indeed, we should not. But it involves giving up our own way, submitting to the discipline that leads to us, never fretting the uncongenial surroundings, but accepting them as appointed of God for the development of our character and powers, for our whole duty cheerfully, waiting for the next step in the process. It is easy to see how such a disposition and such a view of life would raise us above anxiety and care, and keep us free from repining and discontent. Whatsoever our lot may be, we should be satisfied that God has placed that such surroundings will be the best for us, and will best tend to eliminate our faults and increase our fruit-bearing power. If that end is achieved why should we cry to God for relief from trial? Should we rather yield ourselves to his will, and only for a larger measure of strength and that grace which is sufficient for us? In his hands who sees the end we may leave our lot and be at peace.

"I SHALL BE SATISFIED."

WHEN from the scenes of earth I rise
With Christ, my Saviour, to abide,
Beyond the clouds, beyond the skies,
I shall be satisfied.
I shall behold my Saviour's face
Illumined with the light of day,
And I shall rest in his embrace,
Far from earth's cares away.
There I shall see the faces fair,
Of all my loved ones who have left
This world of sin, this vale of care,
Of whom I've been bereft.
And I shall tread the streets of gold,
And listen to the angels' song,
While glory to me shall unfold
Through endless ages long,
I'll join the songs of praise and sing
Of him who once was crucified,
And in the presence of my King
I shall be satisfied.

A SINNER REDEEMED.

IN the darkness I wandered alone,
But light from God's glory hath beamed,
To soften my heart and bid sorrow depart,
And make me a sinner redeemed.
CHORUS—
I praise the dear Lord for his mercy—
'Tis more than I ever have dreamed—
He died to redeem every sinner—
So I am a sinner redeemed.
From the heart of God's wonderful love,
The fountain of mercy hath streamed,
And there have I been to find cleansing for sin
And now I'm a sinner redeemed.
The Lord who left heaven for earth,
Who came—but lightly esteemed—
Hath counted no cost in redeeming the lost—
And so I'm a sinner—redeemed.

The Times of the Gentiles.

The Era of Gentile Supremacy, Beginning with the Destruction of the Temple, soon to Terminate.

BY J. R. CALDWELL.

PARALLEL with the period of Israel's last captivity, scattering, and final tribulation, run what our Lord calls "the times of the Gentiles (Luke 21: 24). Of these much is written in the prophecies of Daniel, and to this book it is that Christ himself refers when speaking of the period of Israel's oppression under Gentile supremacy. (See Matt. 24: 15.)

The promise made to Israel under the law, and conditional upon their obedience, was that they should be "set on high above all the nations of the earth"; that in everything they should be manifestly a blessed people. All the people of the earth were to see that they were called by the name of the Lord, and to be afraid of them. But on account of their subsequent disobedience and utter apostasy from Jehovah they forfeited all these blessings, and instead thereof the curses that follow in Deut. 18, have come upon them to the full. It was not until after long trial, during the times of the judges and of the kings—after many warnings by prophets, many partial judgments and deliverances—that finally the threatened scattering and captivity took place, first of ten tribes (see II. Kings 15: 29, and 18: 9-12) and then of the remaining two—viz., Judah and Benjamin. (See II. Kings 25: 1, 2, and II. Chron. 36: 15-21.) "Thus was the wrath of the Lord kindled against his people, so that he abhorred his own inheritance. And he gave them into the hand of the heathen; so that they that hated them ruled over them" (Ps. 106: 40, 41).

It is of this period of the supremacy of Gentile power, called by the Lord the "times of the Gentiles," that the book of Daniel principally treats. We have there recorded two distinct visions, each of which embraces the whole period from the reign of Nebuchadnezzar to the second coming of the Lord Jesus to execute judgment upon the nations. The first of these is that which was given in a dream to King Nebuchadnezzar himself (Dan. 2: 31).

The interpretation that follows is plain and explicit. The head of gold represents Nebuchadnezzar himself. After him was to arise another kingdom, inferior represented by the silver, then a third represented by brass, and a fourth by iron, and lastly, the deterioration still continuing, this fourth kingdom assumes the form of a mixture of iron and clay. That these kingdoms were the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman, there can be no doubt—indeed, upon this all are agreed.

More details are given in the interpretation by Daniel as to the fourth kingdom than any of the others. In the course of its duration it undergoes a change in its character, the clay being introduced in the feet and toes, and not before.

It is upon this fourth kingdom, in its final form that the stone falls. The Stone is one throughout Scripture, the same that being rejected by the builders, is made the Head of the Corner, and which shall grind to powder all upon whom it shall fall. The end of Gentile supremacy is thus shown to be in judgment, by the setting up of "a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever."

CHAPTER XII.

in the Parlor.

WHILE the investigation of the raised check was taking place at Mrs. Seymour's house, another investigation in which Milton was concerned was going on at Deacon Walter's. The Deacon had fortunately been absent when the officers took Milton and his mother away, and as he had been busy all morning he had not heard of the unpleasantness. If he had been a witness of it, his prejudice against the young man, originating in the boyish escapade when he was taken out of his cistern, with the water-melons beside him, would have been increased.

The deacon's dinner-table that day was unusually brilliant. Mr. Barclay and Nellie Price were surprised to see the display of plate and flowers which were there by Mr. Walter's orders. When all were seated the deacon said:

"It has been my custom for many years to honor this one day of the year above others. It is the birthday of my dear wife, whose untimely death has been the great sorrow of my life. In my own country, it was my habit to open a bottle of priceless wine from a bin that was never touched on any other day. But since I have been in America I have learned the evil of all intoxicants and I have abjured them. But I like to remember the day by a special dinner, and that is why you see the change in the table to-day."

The meal proceeded quietly until the deacon glancing around the table, said: "Carrie, my dear, why are you not using your silver cup? On this day I would like you to use it especially. Ring for it, my dear."

The cup was searched for, but could not be found, and Carrie remembered, with alarm, that Milton had handled it on the previous evening; but she could not imagine where it was. She called the butler and asked him:

"What became of my cup, last night?"

"Sure, and do yeess mane the one as is shaped like a beer barrel?"

"Yes, where is it?"

"Why, Miss, when them police officers was here, aristing them people last night, that young feller put it in his overcoat pocket!"

"Put what in his pocket?" asked the deacon, with some austerity.

"Miss Carrie's silver barrel, sir."

"What young fellow do you refer to, and what officers? Who was arrested?"

They all tried to explain last night's proceedings to the deacon. Mr. Barclay knew the particulars, and talked the most; the young ladies trembled as the deacon knitted his brow, and finally said:

"Has he stolen your silver cup, my child? You know I have no confidence in that young man, and you will keep up your eyes on him, will you?"

"Milton Seymour is no thief, Papa," Carrie said, her cheeks burning. "I remember now his taking up the cup and saying it was his mother's. I did not understand it, and we forgot it afterwards, but I shall take care to keep my eyes on him."

"But I shall insist on the cup being returned," said the deacon. "But I shall insist on the cup being returned."

"I shall take care to keep my eyes on him," said Carrie. "I shall take care to keep my eyes on him."

"I shall take care to keep my eyes on him," said Carrie. "I shall take care to keep my eyes on him."

"I shall take care to keep my eyes on him," said Carrie. "I shall take care to keep my eyes on him."

"I shall take care to keep my eyes on him," said Carrie. "I shall take care to keep my eyes on him."

"I shall take care to keep my eyes on him," said Carrie. "I shall take care to keep my eyes on him."

"I shall take care to keep my eyes on him," said Carrie. "I shall take care to keep my eyes on him."

"I shall take care to keep my eyes on him," said Carrie. "I shall take care to keep my eyes on him."

"I shall take care to keep my eyes on him," said Carrie. "I shall take care to keep my eyes on him."

"I shall take care to keep my eyes on him," said Carrie. "I shall take care to keep my eyes on him."

"Never fear, papa; it will be here to-morrow."

But no cup came the next morning nor any message about it. Carrie grew uneasy. Not that she had any doubt of Milton, but she feared that some mistake had occurred and that Milton really believed that the cup belonged to his mother. She therefore decided to go to the Seymour cottage and make inquiry. Her cousin, George Browne, accompanied her. They found the widow lying on a sofa, looking as if she was incapable of much exertion, the excitement of the past few weeks having seriously shattered her nervous system. Besides, Patterson Green, who was still in the house, required much of her time. She looked pale and languid. The young people, therefore, after spending an hour with Green, sat in a group in the parlor, leaving the widow to enjoy her reverie on the lounge.

"Milton," said Carrie, "I want to tell you a Bible story, or rather refer to one. See if it will quicken your memory, and reveal to us, as did the story of old, that we are brother and sister. Now, 'be attentive.'"

"All right, I am listening;" but he did not observe that his mother seemed excited by Carrie's remark, and was also listening with intense interest.

"Well then," resumed Carrie, "to begin my story, when Joseph dismissed his brothers from Egypt, he secretly ordered his silver cup to be put into Benjamin's sack, and soon after dispatched his servants in pursuit of them; and, finding the cup, to the surprise of all, brought Benjamin back a prisoner. Now papa has missed my silver drinking mug, which he values highly; and as it was seen in your possession, he holds you responsible for it, so Cousin George and myself have come to recover it."

"The cup," gasped Milton, springing up, "yes, your silver barrel; what did I do with it?"

"What is it, my son?" said the widow, rising from her couch, facing them, and looking anxious and worried, her eyes glaring unnaturally. "Has anything been lost?"

"Well, yes, mother; a silver mug. What did I do with it?" replied Milton, deliberately and thoughtfully.

"When and where did you last have it?" asked his mother, with a woman's wisdom.

"Just as the police officers arrived at Mr. Walter's house," replied Milton.

"Then," said the widow, "possibly it is in the pocket of your overcoat."

"Ah! well said, mother," and he bounded up the stairway to feel in the pockets of his overcoat, and found there the missing cup. In the later excitement the whole circumstance had faded from his memory; but a sight of the mug, and its mysterious inscription, again brought the scene at the tea table vividly before him.

In a few minutes the beautiful silver piece was placed on the table, while Mrs. Seymour, looking at it from her lounge, said:

"Why, my dear, you have brought down your little baby sister's mug, by mistake."

"O no, dear Mrs. Seymour, it is my own baby cup."

Mrs. Seymour asked to see the cup, and Carrie handed it to her. She critically examined it, and turned it around; and when the name appeared: "Maud Caroline Heath Walter," her heart stopped its beating; a death-like pallor spread over her features, and, with a long, low, agonizing moan, she sank back upon the lounge, stiff and motionless, having fainted.

Young men generally know nothing about fainting, and these two, active and willing enough under ordinary circumstances, stood looking at each other in bewilderment, not knowing how to proceed.

Not so with practical Carrie Walter, who, in one breath, dispatched Browne for ice water and Milton for ammonia, both of which were in Green's room. Then the door was opened to admit fresh air; but ordinary means failed to restore the sufferer, and Browne went for a doctor. An hour of anxiety and pain to all present had passed before consciousness returned, when the doctor, observing that there were feverish symptoms, directed the patient to be put to bed, and kept in quietness.

"Do you think it was the sight of the cup that made her faint?" asked Carrie, who trembled nervously with the reaction usually following excitement and exertion.

"I am not so sure of that," said Milton. "There is some mystery about it for, you see, mother has a duplicate cup and the first three names on each are the same, which is more than a coincidence."

Carrie made up her mind to ask Mrs. Seymour the history of the cup, but she was too ill then to be questioned. Having seen her comfortably transferred to her room, Carrie bade mother and son good-night and left them, to ease her father's mind by restoring the cup to the family plate chest.

Milton passed an anxious night. His mother was restless and scarcely conscious of her surroundings. At times she was quite delirious.

"A few hours hence we can tell better," said Dr. Benton, the next morning, in response to Milton's anxious questions about his mother's health. "At present she has high fever, and her nervous system is completely prostrated. We can only do our best and hope for favorable results."

His words went like an arrow to Milton's heart. His dear mother dangerously ill! Suppose she died, thought Milton; suppose that sweet voice which taught me, "Now I lay me down to sleep," should be silent forever; suppose that soft hand which provided for my every comfort and exercised a soothing influence over me, putting to rest the angry passions of the soul, should become stiff and cold in death; suppose those dear eyes, which have wept tears of sorrow for me should cease to shine forever! Horrible seemed the bare possibility to the young man, whose spirit sank within him at the thought of future loneliness. But he was too fond of the dear sufferer to give his time to idle forebodings while present duties required his attention.

A neighbor volunteered to find a suitable nurse, while Milton promptly sent his resignation to the Academy, and prepared to devote his entire attention to his mother. The sick woman was carried to the large, well-ventilated guest's room, where as spring was approaching, she would be more comfortable. He then prepared to occupy her former chamber, which communicated with the guest's room, and be thus ready for any emergency.

It was an anxious time. The delirium increased and the words of the sufferer indicated severe mental disturbance. She looked at her son with a blank countenance, the eyes seeming like balls of fire, and then said, "Joseph's cup in Benjamin's sack; brother and sister!"

"Yes, mother, dear, but it is all right now; the cup is restored, and we want nothing now but to get you well again."

Her eyes wandered a little, and a restless spell came over her; but apparently without hearing a word, she went on talking of matters strange to him, but all more or less tinged with the mysterious cup. For days the fever raged, baffling the skill of two physicians and two faithful nurses.

The poor sufferer raved of places and names which were unintelligible, and yet Milton knew that it all concerned her early married life; when he was a baby, when his little sister was drowned, and his mother cruelly treated by those from whom she should have received kindness. From this morbid strength, she would relapse into a pitiable state of weakness; but whether quiet as a sleeping infant (which she was most of the time), or raving like a maniac, her every thought seemed to be on her father's house, her deceased baby, and her unnatural sister.

The close of May found Mrs. Seymour still in her bed, with but little strength and small hopes of recovery. The fever was broken but she was weak in body and mind. Milton had never left her; like a faithful and loving child, he remained near her by day and by night. His face had, however, grown five years older in as many months, and he looked more like a man. Passing through difficulties trials unknown before, his experience developed his character, and he no longer be called a boy.

One morning a consultation was held in the Seymour parlor, Doctor Benton, old Doctor Chapman from Philadelphia being present; besides Rev. Dr. H. Milton and Plummer. The visits latter were frequent, and his kindness and sympathy were prompt Christian love. The doctors agreed that the case seemed beyond the skill, but believed that the had some harrowing care, or deep trouble unknown to others, and efforts to hide it, had caused the and might derange her mind permanently unless circumstances favored an uning of her sorrows.

"Have you no idea," Dr. Hellings speaking to Milton, "what is the cause of your mother's anxiety? Perhaps I be relieved. Have any letters come her since she was taken ill?"

"Yes," said Milton, "there are a few letters waiting. I noticed the I did not open them as my mother not like me to do so."

"I think you had better read what do you say Brother Plummer?"

"I agree with you Dr. Hellings Mr. Plummer, 'there may be news' that would do her more good than medicine."

That evening Milton found the and read them. They referred to a correspondence, and evidently related lawsuit then in progress for the possession of a large estate in England. One of was from a lawyer, who informed Seymour that if she retained him confident of securing the estate for her with the title of Baron Evington two litigants were rival claimants; neither had so clear a title as her Money was needed, and perhaps vexation at not possessing the fund necessary to press Milton's claims that have disturbed his mother's mind evidently knew of the suit to which letter referred. There was also referred to an investigation that was being conducted for her of some confession in a former servant of her father's, who appeared, had been paid to keep away. It related in some way to Milton's infant daughter who, as it remembered she told Milton, was actually drowned at her father's house in her absence.

Evidently there was nothing in letters that could be considered good; but they shed a light on the air which were harassing the widow.

Weeks ran into months, and still Seymour was a sufferer. At one time ton would be cheered by signs of recovery his mother was able to sit up, and take a carriage drive on a warm afternoon. But the inevitable relapse would come and she would sink again to a condition of weakness from which it seemed impossible she could rally. She could not think out suffering, and yet her business in land required constant attention. Legal expenses were absorbing all of her money that she could spare from her mode of living, and, latterly, part of principal had to be expended. Still agents and lawyers kept writing for money, but gave her small promise she would receive definite information about the fate of her baby; or an intangible concerning the speedy recovery of the property lawfully belonging to her, although every letter assured her of ultimate success. All attempts at practical thought, or at writing, brought on nervous ailment, and during the next years she had several attacks of insanity. As a consequence, her son could not leave home for college to complete his education even were she able to spare the money for his fees. He therefore sought opportunities to study privately; and recited the village lawyer of Brookdale, paying him in return by copying deeds and legal documents.

During all the time Mr. Walter aloof, though now both Milton and mother were convinced that the mother had been the husband of Mrs. Seymour's sister, and that Carrie, whose likeness her so many had remarked, was her sister. The silver cup, with its inscription, was proof positive on that head. Still Mrs. Seymour shrank from claiming relationship.

Sunday School Missionary Tells of the Conversion of One who had Trusted to Feelings, Rather than Faith—A Season of Busy Work.

One devoted worker and scholar, in the fall and winter there are many upon a missionary to hold protracted meetings. I was thus engaged one fall in a religious work, where I had organized a Day School in the spring. God blessed the meeting. There were thirty who gave evidence of being saved. One of the inquirers was a lady who had been a faithful attendant of the school, and early in the fall manifested an earnest desire to be saved; but day after day passed without success of her conversion. Others were in hope of heaven who, at the beginning of the meeting and during its progress manifested no deeper interest in the Lord than she. I relate the substance of a conversation, as nearly as I can, which revealed her difficulty. She had submitted to the Lord, and had been earnestly longed to be saved; but she believed on Him; but she did not feel as she wanted to; she did not feel happy as others whose conversion she had witnessed, and therefore was not satisfied that she had obtained.

"Do you believe on the name of the Lord?" I asked; "that is, do you trust in him?"

"I," she said.

"Then," said I, "it says nothing about feeling, nor to compare your feelings with hers. We are not told we shall either have eternal life by our own feelings, but by what is written; and the apostle expressly says: 'These things are written unto you that believe on the Lord, that ye may know that ye have eternal life.' We are to settle these questions on what is written."

Direct from heaven there then flashed the message that brought peace to the stricken heart. He knew that God had saved him—that he had passed from death unto life. But God had work for him to do on this earth. Lights began to move on the wharf; the man gave a shout for help; he was heard and rescued. He blesses that night when Miss Bates, of the American International Missionary Alliance, tells of a Hindu widow of thirteen years of age, who was most cruelly used by her guardians, but who, in some way, heard of a Christian refuge for such as she. Miss Bates continues: "She managed to send word to these people that she greatly desired to escape from her life of bitter suffering, and come to them, and as both her own and her husband's parents were dead, and no one had a legal claim upon her, effort was made to remove her to this Christian home. She met a lady at an appointed place, and she disguised herself by a different style of dress, having her face entirely covered. It was necessary for them to take a train at a station near by. Before the train started she had been missed, and men sent to search for her. They came to this station and examined every woman and girl there, a man lifting the cloth from her head, and holding a lighted lantern square in her face; but his perceptive faculties were blunted, so that he said, 'This is not the girl we are looking for,' and she was taken away in safety, and is doing well in her new home. I met her last autumn, and she had such a bright, happy face, and was progressing well in her studies. Of the nearly 23,000,000 widows in India, at least 281,400 are under fifteen years of age."

CRADLE SONG.*

NIGHTINGALE, oh, leave our garden,
Where soft dew the blossoms steep;
With thy litanies melodious
Come and sing my son to sleep!
Nay, he sleeps not for thy chanting,
And his weeping hath not ceased.
Come not, nightingale! My darling
Does not wish to be a priest.

O thou thievish, clever jackdaw,
That in coin findest thy joy,
With thy tales of gold and profit
Come and soothe my wailing boy!
Nay, thy chattering does not lull him,
And his crying is not stayed.
Come not, jackdaw! for my darling
Will not choose the merchant's trade.

Wild dove, leave the fields and pastures
Where thou grieveest all day long;
Come and bring my boy sweet slumber
With thy melancholy song!
Still he weeps. Nay, come not hither,
Plaintive songster, for I see
That he loves not lamentations,
And no mourner will be he.

Leave thy chase, brave-hearted falcon!
Happily he thy song would hear.
And the boy lay hushed, and slumbered,
With the war-notes in his ear.

—RAPHAEL PATKANIAN.

The Outcasts.†

DRIVEN now from the haunts of sin, as if the devil himself had grown tired of him, he was tossed as mere scum upon the great ocean of humanity. Lost to his friends, and lost to himself, he deemed his life scarce worth the odd coppers he spent on daily food. What could life ever be worth to him? He knew that his constitution was undermined, and that a grave—a pauper grave—must be opened out somewhere before long. Then, in grim pride, he reflected, a pretty thing to leave his body about to trouble other people with, when no one would spend a thought upon it whilst animated with life. Best at one stroke to forestall death, and arrange for his own burial. Only a plunge, and one long gasp, and all would be over. The night was chilly. He drew his torn jacket over his chest, and, coming quickly down the steps, walked on with long strides and a swinging gait towards the landing-stage, whilst, as an echo from days long past, the words, "What thou doest, do quickly," rang in his ears. He passed down the covered way, and, turning to the right, made for the far end of the stage. The long line of lights gleamed brightly across the river, and lamps on passing steamers glided swiftly to and fro. He scarcely marked them. Lights had no charm for him. He was hurrying on into eternal darkness. A stream of people advanced towards him. They were coming from the Birkenhead boat. He turned aside slightly to avoid them. A childish voice on his left arrested his attention. "Please, sir, can you spare me a copper?" "Get away, child; be off, now!" was the gruff reply from a tall man, warmly clothed in an ulster, who brushed past. The outcast from the music saloon looked round for the beggar child. The sad voice strangely touched him. A little girl in a ragged frock had sunk down by a post. Her head and feet were bare. She squatted there, all huddled up, covering her face with her hands, and sobbing bitterly. Youth in rags stood over against childhood in rags.

"What is it, little one?" he asked. The child looked up, and wondered where the voice came from. "What's the matter, little one?" he asked again. "Ha! was it you that spoke?" the child exclaimed. She marvelled that so gentle a voice could come from one so ragged and wretched looking.

"For the light of this world, I will give you my life," she said, and she looked up at him with a smile.

night," she said, "and mother's ill I bed, and dad'll whop me agen." The young man took her by the hand. "I'll see you safe home," he said. "Where do you live?" "Off London Road." The child tightened her clasp on the hand that held hers. It was long since she had felt the kindly touch of a friendly hand. Presently she glanced up and asked, "Are you a real gent? You talk like one." "All are not gents who are dressed fine," was the answer, and no more was said. They came at length to the court where the child lived. The young man pulled from his pocket a coin and put it into the girl's hand. "Oh, thank yer, sir," she said, and vanished; and the scum of society was alone again. He turned his steps once more to the river, but his resolve wavered. He had made a child happy. It was not much, but perhaps there was room for him in the world after all. Why not wait until to-morrow? He turned aside into a cheap lodging-house and paid for a bed, and whilst he slept the Sabbath dawned.

AN acquaintance of the writer—a man of intelligence, proud spirit, great will-power, and great business capacity—was afflicted with this demon. He was a good citizen, a radical prohibitionist. After a certain defeat of a prohibitionary movement in which he was interested, he cried like a child, and said: "Why could not my neighbors have helped me put this thing beyond my reach? I am all right when I cannot get it; but there are spells which come over me I cannot control; they are stronger than myself, and if the thing is where I can get it I am cursed."

He experienced religion and became humble and happy as a child, and active in promoting the cause of the church. But on one occasion, when he was feeling ill, his wife, unguardedly, gave him a drink of weak cider. It roused the lion in him. He told her she had done wrong, and by no means to give him any more. The fiend in him was pitted against the man's whole better nature. He begged for the cider; for stronger drink. When lucid intervals came he asked if they had given him any, and thanked them they had not. He charged them not to give him a drop, whatever he might do or say, and, if he must die, let him die a sober man. Then the appetite would rage, and a most piteous begging, crying and pleading for the drink succeed. His neighbors and church friends came to his relief and watched with him, held him, prayed for him, and joined all they knew to help him out; and, after a week's struggle, night and day, a final calm came. Never was there a happier man, nor one more thankful than he that he had gained the victory. I shudder when I think of the struggle of this "strong man is his agony," and it puts meaning to those tears when he said: "My neighbors know my weakness, and why did they not help put the thing beyond my reach?"

The subject of the insanity of inebriates is so full of interest that I cannot leave it till I add the answer of Dr. W. W. Godding, Superintendent of the Government Hospital for the Insane, at Washington, D. C., which he gives to his own question: "What shall be done with them?" It may be suggestive to some other physician: "As scientists, curious of the bacillus, we forget the worm of the still. As savants, we show a pardonable enthusiasm over the shards of a jug on which we may, with laborious pains, decipher the symbol of Anubis or Osiris, but manifest an inexcusable indifference to that human 'treasure' which we have in these frailier than 'earthen vessels,' on whose shattered fragments we might still trace the lines of the image once stamped there. It is time that the scientist and the scholar spoke; that he turn from the contemplation of the cliff-dwellings and bone caves, and draw out from dens of infamy and caverns of despair, where he has been hiding this troglodyte of our time. When the medical men of the community move in earnest in this we shall have public sentiment, and out of that sentiment will come law and an answer to the prayer, 'Lord, that I might be healed.'"

Missionary McAll's Methods.*

THE history of the McAll Mission is full of instruction for those who love to trace the hand of God in his dealings with men. The long-continued miseries of the siege, and the horrors of the Commune, must have done much to prepare the working people of Paris for the Gospel, by making them, for the time, a sadder and wiser race. And the bountiful supplies of food which England had sent for the starving population, after the two sieges, had doubtless made many far more willing than they would have been before the war to hear what an Englishman had to say. The invitation which Mr. McAll printed for distribution at the doors of his mission rooms, "Des amis anglais desirant vous parler de l'amour de Jesus Christ," was well worded for those days, but would not, I fear, be too attractive now.

Besides the qualifications which are to be found in every faithful messenger of Christ, and on which therefore I need not here enlarge, I think that Dr. McAll was specially fitted for his work by a rare combination of prudence with energy and courage. The wonderfully rapid growth of his Mission—from four rooms in 1872, to more than thirty in Paris and its suburbs, and more than eighty in the departments, at the present date—was mainly due to the eagerness with which he was ever pressing forward. When the cry, "Come over and help us," was heard, from whatever quarter it might come, it was hard for him to refuse. Yet at the same time he was eminently cautious when caution was required. A physiognomist would, if I mistake not, see in his portrait a large amount of benevolence accompanied with great firmness and decision of character. Yet his firmness was not that of one who can break through briars and thorns without feeling them. His temperament was a highly sensitive one, and his manner in speaking indicated great nervous susceptibility.

His kindly spirit and remarkable courtesy of manner were well calculated to gain the hearts of the French. These are no doubt valuable qualities all the world over, but I think that all who have lived in France will agree that they are peculiarly appreciated in that country. The kindly hand-shaking and friendly smile which awaited the audience at the door of the mission rooms when Dr. McAll had been presiding, as they went out, had no doubt the effect of making them the more ready to come again and hear the Gospel message. The spirit and manner of the messenger were altogether in harmony with the message which he delivered.

There are two particulars in which Dr. McAll's method of work, might, I think, be successfully copied, not only in France but in England. One is that of renting empty shops as preaching places. A man in working dress will not enter a handsome church or chapel, where he knows that he would find a congregation in their Sunday clothes; but if he hears the sound of speaking and singing in a mere shop he may be induced to look in, feeling that he can easily make his retreat if he wishes to do so. And if he finds an audience containing people in working clothes like himself, he may be induced to stay.

The King that is to Come.
From an Address on "Triumphs of the Missionary Gospel" by Rev. J. D. Rankin, D.D.

DEFEATED by Charlemagne, Didier, king of the Lombards, took refuge in Pavia. When he was Ogier, the former friend of the warrior. From a chronicle of the time, Guizot takes a description of the army of the besieging army and the territory. "Didier and Ogier ascended to the top of a vast height whence they could see the approach from afar. First the countless engines of war such as the catapults, the engines of Darius, the engines of Caesar. 'Is not Charles with his army?' asked Didier. Ogier answered, 'No.' Next the horizon was filled with armies gathered from all quarters of the vast empire. 'Certes, Charles is here in triumph in the midst of this city,' said the king. 'No, not yet,' was the answer. 'What shall we do then?' said the frightened king, 'should he be accompanied by a large band of warriors?' 'You will see what he is when he comes,' replied Ogier, 'but as to what will be of us I know nothing.' Next came the invincible guards that knew no rest, this sight the Lombard King, who was with dread, exclaimed: 'This is surely Charles.' 'No,' answered Ogier, 'not yet.' In their wake came the monks, the abbots, the ordinaries of the royal, and the counts. Then Didier, out with groans, 'Let us descend ourselves in the bowels of the earth from the face and the fury of so great a foe.' Trembling, Ogier, who knew power and might of Charles, answered: 'When ye shall behold the shaking for fear in the fields, the gloomy Po and Ticino overflowing the walls of the city, with their way thickened with steel, then may ye think Charles is coming.' He had no more speaking when there appeared in the sky as it were, a cloud which turned the day into awful shadows. As it drew near the gleam of arms caused to shine on the city a day more gloomy than any. Then appeared Charles, his head in a helmet of steel, his hands and arms with gauntlets of steel, his heart and his shoulders of marble, protected by a cuirass of steel. All those who were before, those who accompanied him, those who followed, even the whole armor of steel. The fields and the ways were covered with steel; and the spears of steel reflected the rays of the sun. And this hard steel was borne by men with hearts still harder. Terror spread through the city. The hearts of the people melted with fear. 'Here,' said Ogier, 'here is what you have so long sought. This is Charles.' And uttering these words he fell almost dead.

The glory of Charlemagne will be rivalled. Our King comes. But our armies, barriers have disappeared, the lost "Atlantis." The Occident and Her schools appear. Ignorance flees, a thinker loose in the world, and the trembles. Listen to the tramp of citizenship of to-morrow. Is this the King of the King? No. Christian ship moves into view. It comes to throne the Christ and apply his power to civil affairs.

Certainly he is in its midst. But not here. A vast concourse appears. But has never raged fierce enough; the rage of the enemy have never been deep enough, their charges fierce enough to drive from the standard of our King. They were "last at his cross and first at his ulchre." Certainly the King advances the midst of this great host. No.

The Orient appears. From every crowded China, the pagodas of the sacred haunts of Buddha, the Nile, the strongholds of Islam are coming. From all oceans, the stray children of the continent come in the shadow of St. Peter's dome, the mosque of Omar they come. Such is the King. No. But when they see all people flowing to the mountain of the Lord, "when thou shalt heaven opened and a white horse upon it and armies following in white horses and clothed in line and clean; then may ye know that the King has come.

EGYPT'S MUSHROOM CITY.

Port Said and its People of Many Races and Tongues — A City Built on Sand and which was Created by the Suez Canal Trade — A Visit to the Native Quarter — Cairo and Port Said Contrasted — Street Scenes in Both Cities.

TO those who pass through the Suez Canal, journeying from the east, there are no stopping-places along the line of that famous waterway that seems so inviting in Port Said. The little town is a strange level of the ancient and modern, many enough in aspect, and looking like a cluster of cheap buildings lying on a sloping and barren sand-bank. It has little to indicate its importance. It is a mushroom city, the new-ling in a land of old things that are old as history itself. Yet the tourist who finds time to visit it will be amply repaid for the labor. No other city of its size in the whole world, probably, is there to be found a greater variety of nationalities. Egyptians, Turks, Greeks, English, Germans, Arabs, Syrians, Maltese, and others, are all there. The total population of the town is more than 20,000, nearly one-third of whom reside in the native quarter, a walled suburb, a short distance from the city proper. But, although Port Said is little more than a stopping station for the great canal, it possesses an interest for the traveler that weighs its commercial importance. If one has artistic tastes there is abundant material for study on that treeless and desolate-looking strip of sand upon which the town lies. There are few hotels and only one that makes any pretence of blouse and trousers. In the streets of the little town, few women are seen, and when the wives and mothers of the population of Port Said do venture out, to do their shopping or marketing, it is a rare thing, indeed, to see them unattended. Our artist has seized the opportunity, in the color picture on this page, of showing how a Port Said matron appears when she goes to market. It is a sketch from the life. The Arab husband and father sees his wife and child on the family donkey, the mother wrapped in the folds of her malayeh, (the cloak which serves as hood, veil, and mantle, and is always worn outdoors), and her face is effectually hidden from the vulgar gaze of strangers. On certain days, in the native quarter of the town, women are seen in greater numbers. Marion Harland, who visited Port Said a few years ago, describes them in her famous book, The Home of the Bible, as sitting "in the doors of their houses, or upon the ground, knitting, tending babies, and gossiping; they stirred messes in brass pots over braziers of charcoal. They sold beads, sweetmeats, saustentions to modern conveniences, and its guests have at first been puzzled and then amused to discover that no female help was employed there, even the cooking and chamber-work being performed by men in an odd cos-ages, apples, dates, and lemons, at stalls set right in the street. However engaged, they were covered up to the eyes in a sort of combination suit of circular cloak, hood, Pageantry of the Woods.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., } "We all do fade as a leaf."
on the Text: Isaiah 64:6: }

It is so hard for us to understand religious truth that God constantly reiterates. As the school-master takes a blackboard, and puts upon it figures and diagrams, so that the scholar may not only get his lesson through the ear, but also through the eye, so God takes all the truths of his Bible, and draws them out in diagram on the natural world. Champollion, the famous Frenchman, went down into Egypt to study the hieroglyphics on monuments and temples. After much labor he deciphered them, and announced to the learned world the result of his investigations. The wisdom, goodness, and power of God are written in hieroglyphics all over the earth and all over the heaven. God grant that we may have understanding enough to decipher them! There are scriptural passages, like my text, which need to be studied in the very presence of the natural world. Habakkuk says, "Thou makest my feet like hind's feet," a passage which means nothing save to the man that knows that the feet of the red deer, or hind, are peculiarly constructed, so that they can walk among slippery rocks without falling. Knowing that fact, we understand that, when Habakkuk says, "Thou makest my feet like hind's feet," he sets forth that the Christian can walk amid the most dangerous and slippery places without falling. In Lamentations we read that "The daughter of my people is cruel, like the ostriches of the wilderness;" a passage that has no meaning save to the man who knows that the ostrich leaves its egg in the sand to be hatched out by the sun, and that the young ostrich goes forth unattended by any maternal kindness. Knowing this, the passage is significant—"The daughter of my people is cruel, like the ostriches of the wilderness."

Those know but little of the meaning of the natural world, who have looked at it through the eyes of others, and from book or canvas taken their impression. There are some faces so mobile that photographers cannot take them; and the face of Nature has such a flush, and sparkle, and life, that no human description can gather them. No one knows the pathos of a bird's voice unless he has sat at summer evening-tide at the edge of a wood, and listened to the cry of the whip-poor-will.

There is to day more glory in one branch of sumach than a painter could put on a leaf. The painter can give but a look into the autumnal leaf a glance that none can give to the painter. The leaf can maintain looking upon the man, and the man looking upon the mountain.

For several autumns I have made a tour to the Far West, and one autumn, about 1890, I was in the mountains of Colorado. I had with me a number of Cropsey and I other skilful pencils, but that week I saw a pageant two thousand years old. The sun shined brightly. God stretches his canvas! A grander than any scene I have ever seen. All day long the sun shined and down the sides of the great mass, and in the folds of the folds, were great masses of living masses of red and orange and yellow and green and blue and white and scarlet. Here and there the trees were green, but the great mass was into fire. In the morning light the forest seemed as if they had been transfigured, and in the evening hour they looked as if the sunset had burst and dropped upon the leaves. In more sequestered spots, where the frosts had been hindered in their work, we saw the first kindling of the flames of color in a lowly sprig; then they rushed up from branch to branch, until the glory of the Lord submerged the forest. Here you would find a tree just making up its mind to change, and there one looked as if, wounded at every pore, it stood bathed in carnage. Along the banks of Lake Huron there were hills over which there seemed pouring cataracts of fire, tossed up, and every whither by the rocks. Through some of the ravines we saw occasionally a foaming stream, as though it were rushing to put out the conflagration. If at one end of the woods a commanding tree would set up its crimson banner, the whole forest prepare to follow. If God's urn of colors were not infinite, one swamp that I saw along the Maumee would have exhausted it forever. It seemed as if the sea of divine glory had dashed its surf to the tip top of the Alleghanies, and then it had come dripping down to lowest leaf and deepest cavern.

Most persons preaching from this text find only in it a vein of sadness. I find that I have two strings to this gospel harp—a string of sadness, and a string of joy infinite.

"We all do fade as a leaf."

First. Like the foliage, we fade gradually. The leaves which, week before last, felt the frost, have, day by day, been changing in tint, and will for many days yet cling to the bough, waiting for the first of the wind to strike them. Suppose you that the pictured leaf that you hold in your hand took on its color in an hour, or in a day, or in a week? No. Deeper and deeper the flush, till all the veins of its life now seem opened and bleeding away. After a while, leaf after leaf, they fall. Now those on the outer branches, then those most hidden, until the last spark of the gleaming forge shall have been quenched.

So gradually we pass away. From day to day we hardly see the change. But the frosts have touched us. The work of decay is going on. Now a slight cold. Now a season of over-fatigue. Now a fever. Now a stitch in the side. Now a neuralgic thrust. Now a rheumatic twinge. Now a fall. Little by little. Pain by pain. Less steady of limb. Sight not so clear. Ear not so alert. After a while we take a staff. Then, after much resistance, we come to spectacles. Instead of bounding into the vehicle, we are willing to be helped in. At last the octogenarian falls. Forty years of decaying. No sudden change. No fierce cannonading of the batteries of life; but a fading away—slowly—gradually. As the leaf! As the leaf!

Again : Like the leaf we fade, to make room for others. Next year's forests will be as grandly foliaged as this. There are other generations of oak leaves to take the place of those which this autumn perish. Next May the cradle of the wind will rock the young buds. The woods will be all a-hum with the chorus of leafy voices. If the tree in front of your house, like Elijah, takes a chariot of fire, its mantle will fall upon Elisha. If, in the blast of these autumnal batteries, so many ranks fall, there are reserve forces to take their place to defend the fortress of the hills. The beaters of gold leaf will have more gold leaf to beat. The crown that drops to-day from the head of the oak will be picked up and handed down for other kings to wear. Let the blasts come. They only make room for other life.

So, when we go, others take our spheres. We do not grudge the future generations their places. We will have had our good time. Let them come on and have their good time. There is no sighing among these leaves to-day, because other leaves are to follow them. After a lifetime of preaching, doctoring, selling, sewing, or digging, let us cheerfully give way for those who come on to do the preaching, doctoring, selling, sewing and digging. God grant that their life may be brighter than ours has been! As we get older, do not let us be affronted if young men and women crowd us a little. We will have had our day and we must let them have theirs. When our voices get cracked, let us not snarl at those who can warble. When our knees are stiffened, let us have patience with those who go fleet as the deer. Because our leaf is fading, do not let us despise the unripened. Autumn must not envy the spring. Old men must be patient with boys. Dr. Guthrie stood up in Scotland and said, "You need not think I am old because my hair is white; I never was so young as I am now." I look back to my childhood days, and remember when, in winter nights, in the sitting-room, the children played, the blithest and the gayest of all the company were father and mother. Although reaching fourscore years of age, they never got old.

Do not be disturbed as you see good and great men die. People worry when some important personage passes off the stage, and say, "His place will never be taken." But neither the Church nor the State will suffer for it. There will be others to take the places. When God takes one man away, he has another right back of him. God is so rich in resources that he could spare five thousand Summerfields and Saurins, if there were so many. There will be other leaves as green, as exquisitely veined, as gracefully etched, as well-pointed. However prominent the place we fill, our death will not jar the world. One falling leaf does not shake the Adirondacks. A ship is not well manned unless there be an extra supply of hands—some working on deck; some sound asleep in their hammocks. God has manned this world very well. There will be other seamen on deck when you and I are down in the cabin, sound asleep in the hammocks.

Again : As with the leaves, we fade and fall amid myriads of others. One cannot count the number of plumes which these frosts are plucking from the hills. They will strew all the streams; they will drift into the caverns; they will soften the wild beast's lair, and fill the eagle's eyrie.

All the aisles of the forest will be covered with their carpet, and the steps of the hills glow with a wealth of color and shape that will defy the looms of Axminster. What urn could hold the ashes of all these dead leaves? Who could count the hosts that burn on this funeral pyre of the mountains?

So we die in concert. The clock that strikes the hour of our going will sound the going of many thousands. Keeping step with the feet of those who carry us out will be the tramp of hundreds doing the same errand. Between fifty and seventy people every day lie down in Greenwood. That place has over two hundred thousand of the dead. I said to the man at the gate, "Then if there are so many here, you must have the largest cemetery." He said there were two Roman Catholic cemeteries in the city, each of which had more than this. We are all dying. London and Pekin are not the great cities of the world. The grave is the great city. It hath mightier population, longer streets, brighter lights, thicker darknesses. Cass is there, and all his subjects. Nero there, and all his victims. City of kings and paupers! It has swallowed up in immigrations Thebes, and Tyre and Babylon, and will swallow all our cities. Y City of Silence. No voice. No hoof. I wheel. No clash. No smiting of hammer. No clack of flying loom. No j No whisper. Great City of Silence! all its million million hands, not one of them is lifted. Of all its million million eyes, not one of them sparkles. Of all million million hearts, not one pulsates. The living are in small minority.

If, in the movement of time, some great question between the living and the dead should be put, and God called up all the dead and the living to decide it, as we lift our hands, and from all the resting-places the dead they lifted their hands, the dead would outvote us. Why, the multitude of the dying and the dead are as these autumnal leaves drifting under our feet every day. We march on toward eternity, by companies of a hundred, or regiments of a thousand, or brigades of ten thousands, but sixteen hundred million abreast. Marching on! Marching on!

Again: As with variety of apparel the leaves depart, so do we. You have noticed that some trees, at the first touch of the frost, lose all their beauty; they stand withered, and uncomely, and ragged, waiting for the northeast storm to drive them into the mire. The sun shining at noon gilds them with no beauty. Ragged leaves! Dead leaves! No one stands to study the. They are gathered in no vase. They are hung on no wall. So death smites man. There is no beauty in their departure. O sharp frost of sickness, or one blast off the cold waters, and they are gone. No time of hope. No prophecy of heaven. The spring was all abloom with bright prospects; their summer thick foliaged with opportunities; but October came, and the glory went. Frosted! In early autumn the frosts come, but do not seem to damage vegetation. They are light frosts. But some morning you look out of the window and say, "There was a black frost last night," and you know that from that day everything will wither. So men seem to get along without religion, amid the annoyances and vexations of life that nip them slightly here and nip them there. But after awhile death comes. It is a black frost, and all is ended.

Oh, what withering and scattering death makes among those not prepared meet it! They leave everything pleasant behind them—their house, their families, their friends, their books, their pictures and step out of the sunshine into a shadow. They quit the presence of birds and bloom, and wave, to go unbeckoned and unwelcomed. The bower in which they stood, and sang, and wove chapels and made themselves merry, has gone down under an awful equinoctial. No man can toll one-half the dolefulness of the condition. Frosted!

But thank God that is not the way people always die. Tell me, on what day all the year the leaves of the woodbine are as bright as they are to-day? So Christian character is never so attractive as in the dying hour. Such go into the grave, not as a dog, with frown and harsh voice, driven into a kennel, but they pass away calmly, brightly, sweetly, grandly! the leaf! As the leaf!

Why go to the death-bed of distinguished men, when there is hardly a house in this street but from it a Christian has departed? When your baby died there were enough angels in the room to have chanted a coronation. When your father died you sat watching, and after awhile felt of his wrist, and then put your hand under his arm to see if there were any warmth left, and placed the mirror to the mouth to see if there were any sign of breathing; and when all was over, you thought how grandly he slept—a giant resting after a battle. Oh! there are many Christian death-beds. The chariot of God, come to take his children home speeding every-whither. This one sits at the gate of the almshouse; that at the gate of princes. The shout of motives breaking their chains comes on a morning air. The heavens ring again again with the coronation. The twelve gates of heaven are crowded with ascending righteous. I see the accumulated glories of a thousand Christian beds—an autumnal forest illumined by an autumnal sunset! They died not in shame, but in triumph! As the leaf! the leaf!

At last! As the leaves fade and fall only to rise, so do we. All this golden shower of the woods is making the ground richer, in the juice, and sap, and life of the leaves will come up again. "Next time the south wind will blow the resurrection trumpet, and they will rise. So will fall in the dust only to rise again. The hour is coming when all who are in the graves shall hear his voice and come forth." It would be a horrible consideration to think that our bodies were always in the ground. However beautiful flowers you plant there, we do not want to make our everlasting residence in such a place.

Have with these eyes seen so many of the glories of the natural world, and the radiant faces of my friends, that I do not want to think that when I close them in death I shall never open them again. It is sad enough to have a hand or foot amputated. In a hospital, after a soldier had had his hand taken off, he said, "Good-by, dear old hand, you have done me a great deal of good service," and burst into tears. It is a more awful thing to think of having the whole body amputated from the soul forever. I must find my body again, to see with, to hear with, to walk with. With the hand I must clasp the hand of my loved ones when I have passed over Jordan, and with it wave the triumphs of my King. Aha! we shall rise again—we shall rise again. As the leaf! As the leaf!

Crossing the Atlantic the ship may founder, and our bodies be eaten by the sharks; but God tameth Leviathan, and we shall come again. In awful explosion of factory boiler our bodies may be shattered into a hundred fragments in the air, but God watches the disaster, and we shall come again. He will search the deep, and ransack the ocean, and upturn the wilderness, and torture the mountain, but he will find us, and fetch us out and up to judgment and to victory. We shall come up with perfect eye, with perfect hand, with perfect foot, and with perfect body. All our weaknesses left behind.

We fall, but we rise, we die, but we live again! We moulder away, but we come to higher unfolding! As the leaf! As the leaf!

WHEN I HAVE TIME.

When I have time, so many things I'll do to make life happier and more fair
For those whose lives are crowded now with care,
I'll try to lift them from their low despair,
When I have time.

When I have time, the friend I love so well
I'll know no more these weary, toiling days;
I'll lead her feet in pleasant paths always,
And cheer her heart with words of sweetest praise,
When I have time.

When you have time! The friend you hold so dear
May be beyond the reach of all your sweet intent—
May never know that you so kindly meant
To cheer her life with sweet content,
When you had time.

Now is the time! Ah, friend no longer wait
For better loving smiles and words of cheer
To see around whose lives are now so dear,
The day not need you in the coming year—
Now is the time.

Egypt's Mushroom City.

and veil, usually black, and of some opaque material. How a native woman, thus muffled up and swathed, can discharge even the few domestic duties incumbent upon one who lives mainly in the open air, is a puzzle to the foreign observer.

That nothing may be lacking from the discomfort of mantle, wimple and veil, our Arabian, or Egyptian, or Syrian matron wears, in token of her honorable estate of wedlock, a brass tube, nearly an inch in diameter, strapped perpendicularly upon her forehead directly between her eyebrows and in a line with the bridge of her nose. Close scrutiny showed us the black string attached to one end and losing itself in the close black hood which forms the upper part of the mantle; how it was attached to the veil below is still to us an Oriental enigma. Through this pipe, Mohammed, or some other Moslem authority in spiritual matters, is supposed to breathe admonition, counsel and consolation as the married devotee requires it.

In the native quarter, apart from the picturesqueness of the people themselves, there is little to attract the visitor. It is including the pelican, flamingo, and spoon-bill, but the usual experience is either intense heat or a sand-storm that fills eyes, ears, nose, mouth and everything.

In striking contrast to the newness and bareness of life at Port Said and its lack of picturesque surroundings, are the scenes that greet the traveler in Cairo, one of the very oldest of Egypt's most remarkable cities. Our photographer has given us an idea, in the illustration on this page, of some of the peculiar street sights to be witnessed there—an Oriental barber at work, his customers kneeling on carpets spread on the stones of a public square, or courtyard. Regarding his visit to Cairo, Hon. Z. T. Sweeney wrote:

"Cairo is a much handsomer city than Alexandria, and more than twice as large. It is the largest in Africa, and next to Constantinople the largest under Mohammedan rule. It is really cosmopolitan. Here is a mixture of all nations and creeds. The sons of Shem, Ham and Japhet buy and sell in her markets. The mosque, cathedral and chapel adorn her streets. You can pass along one of the main streets of Cairo and imagine you are in England or America, while you can go two blocks away and conceive yourself to taken and killed in the Mosque of Sultan Hassan, near by. In this latter Mosque, which is considered the finest piece of Arabian architecture in the world, they still show the spot where his blood stained the marble floor. I noticed a great many similar stains on the floor in other parts of the Mosque, and came to the conclusion that there must have been more than a dozen Mamelukes killed in the Mosque, if the discolored spots are any testimony.

"Here is also what is known as Joseph's Well. It is a remarkable well, about 15 feet square, and cut down 20 feet into the solid rock. The guide tells you that Joseph, when under Pharaoh, had it built in commemoration of the pit into which he was cast by his brethren. The guide-book tells you that no one knows the origin of the well, though one Yussuf (Joseph) had it excavated and put in repair about seven hundred years ago. The reader can take his choice of the versions."

The view from the citadel is by far the finest around Cairo. To the west, the Great Pyramids and Boulak, with its museum. To the east, Heliopolis and its obelisk, with the Virgin's tree and ostrich farm. To the north, Shoubrah and Ghezirah Palaces, with the grounds and drives; while southward are seen Memphis and Sakkara, with a whole group of pyramids centering around the "Step Pyramid."

A Mission on a Race-Track.

There are few places where profanity, anger, dissipation, gambling and other forms of vice are so glaring as on the average race-track. A novelty in Christian work, in the form of a Race-Course Mission, has lately been established in Doncaster, England for the purpose of carrying the Gospel message to the frequenters of the various race-courses of that country. Josiah Nix was the organizing secretary, and Joseph Jackson, the general secretary of the new movement. Mr. Jackson was formerly connected with the East London Wesleyan Mission. The Race-Course Mission paid its first visit to Doncaster during race week this year. Two furniture vans were placed in convenient positions and at the outset the mission workers were reinforced by numerous volunteers and crowds came from the race-track to listen to the services. Many were deeply affected and promised to leave off their dissipations and begin a new life. One remarkable incident took place on the last day of the races. Among the workers was a well-known minstrel, who was converted three years ago. He and his banjo had been busily engaged during the week in Gospel work. Old companions and acquaintances were sought out on the track, and the story of his changed life was told with good effect.

On returning to the town after the last race, his attention was called to a saloon. The window of the bar-room was open, and a large, broad-brimmed hat was visible. A touch of the hat brought round the face of the wearer. His blackened face soon told his calling; but he was alone, and was drinking. To their mutual astonishment they recognized one another as old acquaintances. The convert gave particulars of his conversion, and urged his new-found mate to give up his mode of life and serve Christ. 'I can't come now,' was the reply, 'I'm blackened up.' 'Never mind that; when I came to Jesus he washed my heart white while my face was black.'

It was a novel and delightful sight. As the man was on his knees, tears made furrows down his black face. Soon his sorrow was turned to joy.

The Racecourse Mission promises to be a potent force for righteousness in a locality where it is greatly needed.

A STREET SCENE IN CAIRO—THE PUBLIC BARBER AND HIS PATRONS.

an evil-smelling, insalubrious section from which one is glad to escape. An open roadway leads from it to the edge of the canal. This road terminates in a cemetery two miles from town, and no spot could be drearier or less inviting. All the cemeteries—Christian, Coptic and Moslem—lie in sandy wastes, and are exposed in places to the ravages of the sea and the destruction wrought by the desert winds. Boxes, some of wood and others of cement, are fitted over the graves to protect them as far as possible from decay. On Fridays—the Moslem Sabbath and mourning day—veiled women may be seen in the Mohammedan cemetery weeping over their dead.

It is somewhat of a relief to get away from Port Said, especially in the hot season. The only part of the population that seems to fully enjoy life is the little Arab lads who paddle around the steamers in tiny skiffs that dance on the waves, and who are ready at a moment's notice to dive for a coin tossed into the clear, blue waters, by some generous passenger, as the steamer ploughs her way toward the east.

Port Said deserves the title of the "Mushroom City" of Egypt, for it is a creation of the Suez Canal and sprang up on the sandy slope almost magically. It is by no means a charming place in any sense, nor is that part of the Canal peculiarly pleasing. Some travelers have described its banks as rendered gay and brilliant by beautifully plumaged birds, be in Bagdad, or in the land of the Arabian Nights.

"Upon the broad verandahs of the hotels men of India display their wares, and the snake-charmer of Central Africa performs for your enjoyment and his profit. One of the miserable creatures used to come every evening, and bring his 'school' of snakes of all sizes, and give his loathsome performances with deadly reptiles, to the great disgust of nearly all the guests, and the extreme delight of a few, whose tastes seemed to be in sympathy with his own.

"The first point of interest is the Citadel. This was a fortified place erected by Saladin, 1166, and the only place of defense in the city. The Turks let it fall into ruin, until it was thoroughly repaired by the late Pasha. It is now occupied by British troops. It is situated about one hundred feet above the general level of the city, and when built thoroughly commanded the city. Since the invention of gunpowder it is of little use, however, as a place of defense, being too near the Mokattam range of hills, from whence the British easily cannonaded it. Within the precincts are a cannon foundry, printing press, and the mint. Here also is the celebrated Gate where the Mamelukes were slaughtered by order of Mehemed Ali. Only one escaped, and he jumped his horse over the wall, down forty feet upon some rocks. The horse was killed by the fall, but the man escaped, only to be over-

The Temple Dedicated.

Sunday School Lesson for November 8.
1. Kings 8: 54-63. Golden Text, Heb 2: 20.
By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A HOUSE for the Lord, and the Lord not there, would be a useless and unmeaning structure. A "house for the name of the Lord," where anyone or anything should take precedence of his holy name, would be but a mockery of him; a place for the Lord to dwell in, where his presence was welcomed only from time to time, where he may be as "a wayfaring man that turneth aside to tarry for a night," this would be only a dishonor to our God. Are we, as his temple, his continual, glorious dwelling place? It was not God's thought, but David's, to build the Temple at Jerusalem; but God respected and accepted the homage of his servant, and David put all his heart into the work. But the thought of a living Temple, built with living stones, to be "eternal in the heavens," is not of man's originating, it emanated from God himself. He could say indeed, "The Lord hath chosen Zion; he hath desired it for his habitation. This is my rest forever: here will I dwell, for I have desired it" (Ps. 132: 13, 14), yet "My rest forever" points to something beyond the transient experiences of this passing world.

The True Dedication of Solomon's Temple was not the king's prayer, nor was it his offering nor that of the priests. All this was indeed necessary, as it was man's part of the transaction, but that which really hallowed the temple was the cloud which "filled the house of the Lord, so that the priests could not stand to minister by reason of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord filled the house of the Lord." "The Lord is in his holy temple; be silent all the earth before him." (Hab. 2: 20.) It is not the fervor, the self-sacrifice, the entirety of our consecration which makes us "holy unto the Lord," but the true reality that the Lord himself comes to abide in us. The mystery hid from ages and generations, but which is manifested to his saints is not the superiority of self-devotion in God's people, but it is "Christ in you the hope of Glory" (Col. 1: 27); it is the Lord in his Temple, making it possible that the flesh shall yield and be brought to silence before him. In the death of Christ our old man was crucified, and Christ can live his own holy life in such as accept that identification with him in his death and resurrection, which Paul calls "buried with Christ," and "risen with him by faith of the operation of God who raised him from the dead." (Col. 2: 12.) The flesh, in which dwelleth no good thing, and the very goodness of which, as the flower of the field withers and dies, must be put to silence, and cease to have a voice where "the Lord is in his holy temple." He has come to supersede the flesh, and in his presence no quarter must be given to that which his very death for us condemns. Our rights, our wishes, our feelings, our susceptibilities, all in us which others can hurt, and wound, and offend, cannot, must not, have a voice, or the smallest consideration in the Temple where the Lord is. Be silent. O our rights! be silent. O our wishes! be silent. O our susceptibilities! The Lord Jehovah is here. It is becoming in such a Presence is a shame in such a Presence that your existence should be recognized. The

that there should be response to no other therein; recognition of no other except in relation to him. Every other stone, precious because part of the temple, a lost world, loved because he hath so loved the world; our dear ones, doubly dear from the moment we cease to hold them for the satisfaction they give us, or the honor we may obtain through them, but only as committed to us in a holy trust by him. As we enter into the realities of the living temple of which we form a part, it becomes more and more a habit to look at all things in their relation to God, rather than to ourselves. We learn how to "know no man after the flesh" (II. Cor. 5: 16), no man for our own selfish ends. "All things are of God," all things working together for good to them that love him (Rom. 8: 28).

The first act of Solomon in his dedication of the temple was to assemble all the representatives and head men of Israel to bring up the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of the city of David, and he set it under the wings of the wooden cherubim, which he had overlaid with gold. The golden cherubim made "of one piece with the mercy seat," were still an integral part of the mercy seat, which formed the cover of the ark, within which were the tables of stone with the writing of God upon them: the type of God's union with the man who has his law within his heart. This done, Solomon and the people sacrificed numberless sacrifices to the Lord. They did not reckon. It was something of the same spirit which animated the early Church when they had "all things common," and no man would own as his any of his possessions (Acts 4: 32). It was then that the cloud of God's glory filled the temple. The offering was accepted, God Had Taken Possession.

And now Solomon takes the position of an intercessor for his people. Recapitulating all that God had done, and omitting altogether what his father and he had done, to lead up to the present moment—for the presence of Jehovah shut out that of man—he went on to plead with God for his people in divers situations. It was a long prayer and very inclusive, and all the king's heart was in it; it must have been unforgettable by those who were gathered there together, and God also did not forget it. "And it was so that when Solomon had made an end of offering all this prayer and supplication unto the Lord, he arose from before the altar of the Lord, from kneeling on his knees with his hands spread up to heaven. And he stood and blessed all the congregation of Israel with a loud voice. Nearer to God than to man at that solemn blessed moment Solomon, no priest of the house of Aaron, but a true priest at heart, exercised priestly functions and blest in the name of the Lord (Num. 6: 24-27; Deut. 10: 8).

The blessing of Solomon was characteristic: it was first of all a tribute of praise to God: "Blessed be the God that hath given rest unto his people Israel according to all that he hath promised: there hath not failed one word of his good promise by the hand of Moses his servant." The king could only bless his people as he led them to have confidence in God. The greatest blessing we can bring to any man is to lead him to know and count upon God. Next the king in his blessing says: "The Lord be with us as he was with our fathers: let him not leave us, nor forsake us: that he may incline our hearts unto him, to walk in all his ways, and to keep his commandments, and his statutes, and his judgments, which he commanded our fathers (1. Kings 8: 57, 58). Every blessing, of basket and store, of wealth and long life, of peace and prosperity, and above all, every spiritual blessing was included in the words, "The Lord our God be with us." When our beloved Lord gave his last charge to the eleven, he left with them as his special parting blessing, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world" (Matt. 28: 20). Solomon knew well that to have God with us is to have a heart inclined to obey him. Hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep his commandments (1. John 2: 3). It is impossible to know him and not love him; and we cannot love him who is Almighty in his love and holiness, as well as his power, without trusting and obeying him. Solomon's great wisdom did not make him independent of his God, he knew, by the very "wise and understanding heart" which God had given him, how dependent he was upon him for the very inclination to obey him.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the use of Sunday School Teachers.

IN all the history of the chosen people, there was no day so glorious as the day of dedication. It was a day of rejoicing, of solemn pageantry, and of devout consecration.

A SACRIFICIAL ALTAR.

In seven and a half years, the vast army of men had built up the foundations of the temple, and practically completed the magnificent little edifice, a perfect gem of a building, lustrous with gold and precious stones. The dedication appears to have been hurried forward about a month, in order to make it coincide with the Feast of Tabernacles, or, as some scholars think, it was delayed eleven months to bring it to that date. The Feast of Tabernacles commemorated the goodness of God during the forty years wandering in the wilderness. The completion of the temple was splendid evidence of the settlement in the land when the wandering had ceased. It was also a harvest festival corresponding with our Thanksgiving, an appropriate time for such a ceremony as the dedication. The Ark had been carried with solemn reverence from the place in Zion, where David had temporarily deposited it, into the Holy of Holies and placed in that dark room in the Temple prepared for it. The staves with which it was carried, were drawn out of the rings and placed by its side, in token of its wanderings having ended in that permanent and magnificent abiding place. Then the great assembly was held to dedicate the Temple to the worship of God. The spectacle must have been a memorable one. The vast array of priests, clad in white robes, grouped around the altar, blowing their silver trumpets, the dense crowds of people from all parts of the kingdom filling the courts and, over and above all, visible to every person in the huge assemblage, the king alone on the brazen platform erected for him. Kneeling down, the first time that that attitude of prayer, so familiar to us, is mentioned in Scripture, he besought God's blessing on the completed work. An introduction, seven petitions, and a sublime conclusion compose the beautiful prayer. That the Temple might be recognized as the abode of God, by the people of Israel whosoever they may be, is the king's desire, and he beseeches God to encourage them by answering them when in future they presented their petitions toward the Temple, and also to answer even the stranger who might realize that God dwelt there, and pray to him. Yet the king's idea is more intelligent than his prayer might appear to imply. He realizes that God cannot in very deed dwell in any building. He knows that the house is only a symbol, after all. Then the king rises, and in a brief address to his people, urges them to righteousness, sincerity and fidelity. Following this address, came the huge sacrifice which showed the munificence and grandeur of Solomon's consecration.

Let your heart be perfect. The injunction is not, as to any particular calling or work, but as to readiness for service. A young man of ecstatic temperament called on a veteran preacher and declaring his intention to become a minister, asked his help. The clergyman seeing that the young man was intellectually weak, advised him to stick to his calling. "But I want to glorify God," said the youth. "You can glorify God in any honest business. If your heart is right and you are ready for work near at hand, you will not have to complain of lack of opportunity. I don't make the mistake of thinking that you have to preach in order to glorify God; you can glorify him if you have no sin, but making broom-handles."

That all the people of the earth may know. A widely-read story by a famous author describes the home of an infidel gas-fitter. It was a dreary place, with a drunken and poor neglected children. The fitter was a shrewd, clever debater, and his pleasure was to attend a socialistic and argue on politics, religion and economy. His tongue was a bitter and the miseries of his lot increased his venom. He made the acquaintance of a Christian man who helped him in developing the club, gave lectures on music, science and travel, brought into the the fruits of study and extensive reading and worked with the men to brighten dull lives. The gas-fitter came to him and went to see him in his troubles and difficulties, and found in him a friend. He could get sound, practical advice from him, and when he was sick a Christian friend helped with the expenses of the household. He did more, he won the confidence of the drunken and persuaded her to abstain. The fitter's whole life was changed by the goodness of his Christian friend. But no word of religion had been spoken. One night the club the question of religion came and his opponents expected that the fitter would speak out on their side. But to their surprise, he declared that he had changed his opinions. He believed in God, and pointing to his Christian friend he said, "I have found God in him."

As the matter shall require. How we are the wants of men; yet God supplies them all. The tradition runs that a man, seeing an olive tree growing at the entrance to the cave in which another man lived, asked him what he had done to make it so strong and flourishing. He had an olive sapling planted by him, he went on, "and I longed for it to come a fine tree like this. When I thought it needed water, I prayed to God to send rain; and when I thought it needed heat, I prayed to God and the sun shined; and when I thought it needed shade, I prayed to God and the frost came. I sent me everything I prayed for, though it needed it; but my tree died. 'And I,' said the other hermit, 'God to take care of my tree, and I laid his hands to arrange the how and when, thinking that he knew best what was good for my tree, and the tree flourished.'

The Lord hath given rest unto his people. One of the most difficult passes to climb in the Scottish mountains is the Pass of Corrie. The road winds in and out and there are many dangerous places where the slightest foot might end in death. But when the head of the pass is reached and the beautiful prospect lies spread out before the traveller like a map, he is repaid for his exertions. At this point there is a stone bearing the inscription, "Rest and thankfulness." We can imagine the Christian at the end of a troubled life, seeing his heavenly rest, all danger and toil, sorrow and trial ended, obeying the injunction very gladly.

The Lord be with us. An incident of maritime life is told of a certain Christian traveler. The vessel was approaching a vast ice-field, and the captain was very anxious. Soon there was only one narrow channel left between the ship and the water. Could the vessel make it? But she would be crushed like a nut between the crackers. Suddenly the wind dropped and she had no steam. The Christian man who was standing by the captain knew his anxiety, proposed that they should pray. The captain consented that all who believed in prayer might go below and join in the prayer. Presently he joined the little company himself. When they returned on deck the first words heard was the mate saying, "We are saved; it's blowing nor-nor-east." One of the men suggested that more sail should be spread; but the captain refused. "I won't touch her," he said; "some one else is managing this ship."

EVANGELIST MOODY'S CLARION CALL.

Rizousness and Intelligence, he Declares, are Needed to Save the Nation—"The Church that has no Sunday Evening Service is Dead!"

THE days of divine inspiration have not passed away. At intervals, great communities are stirred by the almost prophetic utterances of godly men and women, whose lives and talents are consecrated to the salvation and spiritual enlightenment of society. It is well for those who, hearing the voice of warning or admonition, take the message to their own hearts; but too often it falls on unheeding ears, and its importance is not fully realized until the golden opportunity has passed.

Light L. Moody, the well known evangelist, who has probably exerted a more extensive moral influence than any Christian worker of our time, has long been a deeply and deeply interested observer of the nation's spiritual progress. In an interview at the offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a few days ago, he sounded a note of alarm that should be heard in every Christian Church and congregation in America. It is a clear trumpet-call to action and cannot be misinterpreted. "Righteousness and intelligence are needed to save the nation," said Mr. Moody. "We need a revival of Gospel preaching—plain, old-fashioned, unadulterated Gospel of Jesus Christ—in all our churches. And let me emphasize the fact, right now, that the church that has no Sunday evening Gospel services, or what amounts to none, is dead! Dead! You cannot impress this great truth too fully upon our people. Use the medium of your journal, which goes everywhere, to spread it. The church that has no Sunday evening Gospel service is dead! In every such service should be followed by after-meeting for personal work. Why do I lay so much stress on the Sunday evening service? Because it is and always has been, the best of all services for reaching the common people. They do not come to the meetings week-day evenings for various reasons, and on Sunday evenings, many of them rest at home, instead of coming to church. Then on Sunday afternoons, they are tempted to some form of recreation, indoors or out. So, if you don't get them to church Sunday evening, you won't get them at all.

Now, this is the situation among the churches in New York and Chicago, and in large cities. The neglect of Sunday evening Gospel services, and the after-meeting for personal work, is producing disastrous results everywhere; I meet it on all sides. A service which is not based on the Gospel, that does not preach Jesus Christ and him crucified, is of no value to this emergency. Nothing can hold the people but the Gospel; no 'higher criticism' sermons or discourses on other topics can attract them or hold them or meet their real needs. I am convinced that if the glorious Gospel of Jesus alone was presented in a majority of our pulpits Sundays, we would not have any occasion for the complaints, now so general, of small audiences and lack of spiritual interest."

was reminded of an incident that particularly illustrated this: A man entered a store and wanted to buy a yard of cloth. The salesman measured off thirty inches, but the customer objected. "That's not a yard," said he, "it's six inches short." "Oh," replied the salesman, "it's all they're giving to the yard in Solid-So's, and it's all we're giving, too." But didn't suit the buyer, so he came away, saying he wanted the good, old-fashioned yard of thirty-six inches or nothing. So, nothing short of the good, old-fashioned Gospel of Jesus and a full-measure of salvation will satisfy the hearts and souls of our people to-day.

That the lack of earnest, genuine Gospel preaching, and the preference given to the "isms" of the day, or to immaterial and transient topics for pulpit discourse in the churches, is the real cause of their spiritual inertia and numerical decay, does not admit of argument. The hearts of men are not satisfied with such things, and when the heart is not right, nothing is right. It is a palpable fact that "dry rot" invariably strikes a church where the Cross and the Sacrifice are not faithfully presented to its people. In such churches, conversions cease, spiritual advancement is arrested and there are few or no accessions. The Cross is not "lifted up" to draw the sinners. There are churches in many cities whose pastors and people can identify this as part of their own sad experience, if they are frank enough to make the admission. There are certain denominations the united membership of whose churches in some of our largest cities is now smaller, in proportion to population, than it was forty years ago, although the local population has nearly trebled during that period; and this is due to the same cause—neglect of the plain, old-fashioned, unadulterated Gospel sermons. These are not Mr. Moody's words; but they are nevertheless based on facts, and are corroborative of his statements.

"On looking around in New York," continued Mr. Moody, "I find that at the present time every hall suitable for evangelical services is engaged for many Sunday evenings ahead, some for sacred concerts and others for various social or secular purposes. Now, they could and should all have been secured for the preaching of the Gospel of Jesus. The Christian laymen of New York should see to it that there is no lack of facilities for presenting the Gospel to the masses Sunday evenings: it is clearly their duty to do this."

He would apply the same suggestion elsewhere; the need of a revival of Sunday evening Gospel preaching is general throughout the entire country. If the people are to be reached, and the dangerous unrest and discontent of the masses al-

Quite near the tablet is a beautiful font, supposed to have been the baptismal font, and the pillars of the sanctuary are also standing in good repair. It was difficult for us to realize that upon that spot, so many years ago, songs of praise and adoration had been sung to our blessed God! The missionaries hope that a Gospel hall may yet be erected on the spot. The English Baptist Mission have a nice work some little distance from Si-gan. "Mother Sherwood" Dead.

An Earnest Christian Life that was Devoted to Rescue Work in the Slums.

MOTHER Sherwood" is dead! The sweet-faced, consecrated woman, whom the converts of the McAuley Mission greatly loved, has passed to her reward. No more will they hear her kindly greeting, or listen to her gentle pleadings for the wanderers to return to the fold and abandon lives of sin and sorrow. No more will they enjoy the blessing of her presence, and her prayers at the Rescue Meetings. But her memory will long be cherished, and the influence of her Christ-like ministrations among the lowly and the fallen, will be felt in the slums for many a year.

Mrs. Sherwood died at Ocean Grove, on October 1st, after two months of severe illness. She had been ailing for the past year, and had gone to Ridgefield, Conn., her former home, to rest. She came back feeling no better, and after three days' stay at the McAuley Mission, she went to Ocean Grove to stay with a friend, hoping she might regain her health. She rapidly grew worse. Medical assistance proved unavailing, and finally, she died while undergoing an operation. She was sixty-four years of age, and was the daughter of two good Christian people, Nathan and Delia Lownsbury, of Ridgefield, Ct. Her father and mother lived to a great age, and for fifty years were stalwart Methodists in that locality. She had two brothers, one being State Senator George E. Lownsbury, a prominent shoe manufacturer of South Norwalk, Conn., and the other Ex-Governor Phineas C. Lownsbury, president of one of the leading banks on Broadway, New York. A sister is Mrs. Joel Rockwell, of Ridgefield, Conn. Mrs. Sherwood was a widow, and for the past fourteen years was the faithful and much beloved missionary of the old McAuley Mission, at 316 Water Street. In her death the Mission has sustained a great loss.

Perhaps no woman living has shaken hands with as many drunkards and thieves as "Mother Sherwood." She was a woman of indomitable courage, faith, and love, and her bright smile and friendly greeting, and warm shake of the hand, have encouraged hundreds to turn from a life of sin and shame, to Jesus Christ for help. She was powerful in prayer, of strong good sense, and no one could detect a fraud or an impostor, and at the same time know how to help them, more quickly than "Mother Sherwood." She could pick them out in spite of themselves, and no amount of deception could hide their real character from her. Here patience and love were amazing, and while she did uncover their duplicity, it was not to scold them, but to get them into a position where she could help them to be honest, and to begin a Christian life. Many times during her work at the Water Street Mission, tramps and outcasts came in who, after giving their hearts to God, were found to be the husbands and fathers of families, their wives, perhaps, in some distant place, or their children in some asylum. Mrs. Sherwood was particularly successful reuniting such people.

She was possessed of some means, and was not dependent upon her work at the Mission for her support, although she lived there and generously entertained people there. She was always giving. Hundreds of poor fellows who needed help would come to her to borrow. She did not loan money, but she gave it, and when they repaid it, it was received as a gift to the Mission. It was her custom, an hour or two before the meeting opened, to take circulars announcing the service, and go around to the various dens and dives, which until recently abounded in the Fourth Ward. She could walk into the barrooms filled with drinking and fighting men, and with women of vile character, and as she entered the room a hush would come over the audience, and the blasphemies would cease. The proprietor would step forward and bow, and if anyone who did not know her, persisted in unruly conduct, he was sent from the place, and the proprietor would say: "Don't you know who this is? This is Mother Sherwood from the Mission, and she is our friend." Mr. and Mrs. S. H. Hadley, Superintendents of the Mission, with whom Mrs. Sherwood lived, labored together with her for over ten years without a division, and there are no more sincere mourners over her loss than those two. On the way from Ocean Grove to Ridgefield, where Mother Sherwood was buried beside her aged father and mother in the village church-yard, a stop was made, and a short funeral service held at the old John Street Methodist Church, where she had been a member for many years. Although only a brief notice was given of this service, fully two hundred men and a few women, who had, either directly or indirectly been led to Christ by Mrs. Sherwood, passed before the silent form, and shed tears of love and bitter sorrow over the dead one. Most of these men had been lifted from the depths of crime, and the majority of them had come into the Mission absolute tramps and outcasts, but anyone who saw them on that day—prosperous-looking men and women, well-dressed, some with their families with them—would have realized to some extent their loss, and the great loss the McAuley Mission had sustained. Many who have been brought into the Kingdom through Mother Sherwood, have already gone on before, and her sweet and intense individuality, and pure and blameless Christian life will remain to strengthen and encourage those she left behind.

laid, it can only be done by the Gospel. Strikes, riots, disturbances and agitations of the body social and political, can be affected or influenced by no mere human philosophy or argument, however attractive. Only the love of Christ can change the hearts of men and bring about a happier condition of society, restore tranquility and fair dealing to business and purity and integrity to public affairs.

There is food for serious thought, for pulpit and pew alike, in Mr. Moody's declaration. If his advice were taken by a goodly number of churches in our cities and towns, we might reasonably hope for such a widespread spiritual awakening as has not been felt for many years.

among the Chinese. A number of the denominations have taken in hand the christianizing of the Orientals found in our laundries and in the Chinese places of business, and have organized Sunday schools, to which these people are invited to come to be taught to read the Bible, and thus learn about the "Jesus doctrine." Probably the most interesting of these mission schools is one that is continued through the week. It is situated at No. 14 University place. This work is under the auspices of the Presbyterian Board of Missions, and yet is distinct from its regular work. The Superintendent, Rev. Huie Kin, visited China during the last Winter and Spring, returning in June with thirty Chinese lads who came on students' certificates, to be educated here and learn, among other things, our Western ways and methods. These boys are between the ages of ten and sixteen years, and are mostly the sons of farmers who live in remote provinces from the sea-coast; and as their parents are heathen, with one or two exceptions, they knew nothing of the Christian religion; but Mr. Huie assured the parents and guardians he would do all he could to teach them the precepts of Christianity. According to the terms of their certificates, these students are to remain in the United States for several years, in order to obtain the education they have come to acquire, when they will return to their homes beyond the seas; where, Mr. Huie says, they will carry the Gospel more effectually than the average missionary can do.

As they arrived late in June, after the day-school of the Mission had been closed for the Summer vacation, it was not thought that the boys had much to do. But the kindness of friends which made it possible, a home was rented at Metuchen, N. J., where they were kept until the first of October, when they were brought to the Mission in University place. An effort was made to secure them in Chinese homes in New York City, where they would have been able to do some hours, doing domestic service which may be required as a compensation. Mr. Huie would be glad to learn of such opportunities.

Their education begins as soon as they arrive. A Chinese woman, assisted Mrs. Huie in instructing them in culinary and domestic matters, Miss Thixton, Mrs. Marshall and Miss ... daily instruction in matters literary. The ... of everything they saw and handled; but being very wide-awake boys and anxious to learn, they made rapid improvement, and by the time the school was opened for the Fall term in New York City, they had acquired a vocabulary of several hundred words—sufficient for ordinary conversation—and had begun to read.

But these boys have been learning something else. Mr. Huie's evening and morning lessons from the Bible in Chinese are producing results. They have been overheard, talking together, by the Christian helper and teacher. One said, "God pulls at my heartstrings;" another, "God speaks to my heart;" a third, "God says I must pray." So these little fellows of ten years old got down to pray like "Uncle Kin" (Mr. Huie). One prayed aloud, and thanked God for bringing him over the wide, wide waters that he might hear about Jesus; he prayed that his mother might hear of him, too. After this, other boys in the next room began to pray also, before they retired at night. One of them had found a book of prayers printed in Chinese and read that carefully, and said he learned much about God there.

The little fellows come from the Sing Ming district, about 150 miles back of Canton, and they are mostly farmers' sons. All can write the Chinese language, and they have received considerable training according to the Chinese methods of instruction. The present is the fourth year of Mr. Huie's training work here, and already some fifty boys have been educated and sent back to China from the school. The system employed is known as the Verlitz method, and includes conversational and object teaching. In two years the pupils are prepared for the American seminaries. Throughout the entire period of their education, Bible study occupies a prominent place. A number will take the OW is the time to let the gusty winds blow to our feet the many-tinted leaves of Autumn, and to read what is written upon them. For they are full of divine hieroglyphics and old romance; and they may say to our hearts, what can be said in no other speech or language. This morning I went early into my garden. The sky, the air, the trees, rained influence; and the very birds floated about in a dim, prophetic way. I was going to take into the shelter of the greenhouse some palms, and it was impossible not to remember the tales of victory and rejoicing, with which the plant is blended—its memories of Elim and Jericho; of Mount Ephraim and Deborah; of Jewish festivals, and of that wondrous day when Zion's King came to her, and the "very great multitude" went out to meet him with hosannahs! Then the palm spoke for all the trees of the forest, and shouted "Victory!" And well it might, for to this plant is added one grace above its fellows. It is planted for eternity. St. John, in the Apocalypse, shows us the redeemed clothed in the garments of holiness, waving the palms of triumph.

And who can go now under the apple trees, and not remember that they are of an elder creation, and were present at the birth of man; that their fruit higher education here, and all will return to China, taking back with them to their own country the better things they have received while here. There they will be home missionaries to their own people and friends, and carry the Gospel message with them wherever they go.

Truly, God has given his people a great opportunity to help in the work of Christianizing these Chinese boys, and sending them back to their home-land, not as ministers, necessarily, but as missionaries nevertheless, to help bring China to Christ.

The present need of the work is a larger house for the mission work, which shall contain accommodations for the growing day school, and for the services of the Sabbath, as well as a home. A suitable house is at hand, not far from the present building, but the means to secure it are wanting. There are doubtless many friends of the Gospel who may be sufficiently interested to aid in this work of evangelizing China by means of her own sons.

great deities of the North—Woden, Thor and Freya—lie under the apple tree. These deities never intruded into the primeval races of Assyria and Egypt, yet the same tradition is written on all their vast monuments. Kitto indeed tells us that the citron, and not the apple was the Tree of Knowledge; and the Targum of Jonathan says the fatal fruit of sin was neither apple nor citron, but the Vine which intoxicates the world, and in which is also hidden the mystery of the expiation of sin.

But, sitting under my apple trees, I like to think of the traditions which make the fruit taste wondrously—that Adam, when at the point of death, received a branch of the tree of which he had eaten, with orders to plant it, and the promise that it should bear fruit for the healing of all nations. I like to believe, as the tart juices linger on my tongue, that from this tree came Aaron's rod, and the staff of Moses, and

SILHOUETTES FROM LIFE

WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Burden of a Grandmother.

YOU must see for yourself Lucy," said Mrs. Ephraim Beck, pausing in her work of quartering pears for preserves, "that I can't be expected to take the whole charge of grandmother all the year round. I am willing to do my share of looking after my relations, but the old lady has of her own, and they have a look after their mother. Besides, getting to be a great care, flighty and as old people often are, and so she may slip away any moment. Again, she may live a good while. I hope she will." She stopped to weigh her pears, and apportion the neighbor holding the scales. "Ephraim likes to have her round, eh?" said the lady, speaking doubtfully of one who felt her way and did not give offence.

"I replied Mrs. Beck irritably, "Ephraim Beck is a perfect fool about his subjects. But la Lucy, what can I know? He isn't in the house at this time, and he doesn't understand means having an old person under foot. It's worse than a child to play, or to school; but mother's going around, wanting to help, and full as much as she helps. I'm in these pears if I'd given her a encouragement. She used to be a keeper, once."

"I'm hard on both of you," ventured Ephraim who, in her heart, compassed the case of "old lady Beck." "It's hard on me," said Mrs. Beck. "That's all right; and on my young people, too. Things may not do on account of grandmother in the house. I've got to foot down though. I'll keep her flies, but she's got to spend the day with Sarah or Kate. That's all there is, and she swung the kettle of pears to the table to the range as if it had been a feather."

"There was a rustle in the hall, and presiding door of the kitchen was pushed open, and a tiny old lady, white haired and thin, came faltering into the room. "Help me, Amy?" she asked,

"Mother! Great help you'd be. I've done almost," was the answer. "Don't you stay upstairs, where it's so hot in this hot kitchen."

"It's pleasant," piped the quaver-voiced old lady, "but it's lonesome. I don't like to be alone either."

"Come over home with me and stay to see the visitor. 'Aunt Martha's here, and she'll be glad to see you. Come, you are, you needn't stop to change your dress.'"

"I must slip my second-best alpaca," said the old lady, "and then I'll be glad to see Martha."

"It was real good of you, Lucy, to take me out of my way," said the daughter-in-law. "If it wasn't for Ephraim, we should club together and put mother home, but he'd never hear of it."

"Oh!" said her friend, "don't ever do that. You wouldn't make herself contented from the farm. Why, Amy, this is her house, and her children are here. It's natural she should be here. But I see it's hard for you, Lucy."

"Lucy feels that outsiders can't tell her what to do. Ephraim's so sure of his word, you'd think his word was Queen Victoria. Here's the end of the world. All ready? I'll send one of my boys to bring you home, mother."

"I'll come," said the grandmother. "I'll come with me. I'm not infirm. Or, I'll wait for Ephraim when he passes on his way home. Five o'clock. Don't you be worried. Good-bye."

Lucy Peabody and her guest walked slowly through the garden, where the great clumps of white and purple phlox invited the honey-bees, and closing the gate after them, were lost to sight on the road.

Amy Beck, pouring the hot juicy pears into their jars, was uncomfortably aware that her old schoolmate thought her harsh and unlovely to her mother-in-law. Probably the other neighbors and the church-people were of the same mind. It was all very well for them. They might criticize. They hadn't on their hands the burden of an unloved, barely tolerated grandmother. A grandmother who had been a brisk, important person in her day, and who could not be happy laid away on the shelf of a sunny south chamber, even if the shelf had a feather-bed, and a rocking chair, and dainty curtains and a footstool.

friend. "Ephraim's a good son, devoted to you."

"Yes, I have Ephraim, and he's one in ten thousand," said old lady Beck, with pride. "Ephraim's good as gold."

'Tis a true story I'm telling you friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, true as truth and life, so I can't make up a happy ending as I wish I could. The slow years wore on, grandmother occupied the south chamber, summer and winter, made her carpet rags into rugs, patched trowsers for her grandsons, drew more and more into herself, and really, under the repressive influence of her stirring daughter-in-law, and thoughtless granddaughter, grew "cranky" and cross, and as they called it among themselves, childish. To humor her, to take her about with them, to bring pleasures and share frolic and fun with her, did not occur to the heedless, and I fear, heartless people, under Ephraim Beck's roof. She lived a long time, and had a long illness, and everybody, except her son (who was tireless) was tired out before God took her to himself.

The night she lay dead in the south chamber, her son sat and looked wistfully at the old face. Death had smoothed out the lines on her brow. She grew younger and more beautiful every hour. The peace of the Father's hand had smoothed out the

A Royal Family Group.

THE old palace at Copenhagen is annually the scene of gatherings almost patriarchal in character. The children of the King and Queen of Denmark have never lost their affection for their early home. The daughters came regularly from London and St. Petersburg to join the family party, bringing their children with them. The King and Queen cordially welcomed their grandchildren, who made the old palace ring again with the sound of childish laughter. Russian and English boys and girls made the acquaintance of their Danish cousins, and, forgetting all about court etiquette and the forms and ceremonies which restricted their freedom during the other months of the year, gave themselves up to youthful gaiety. Latterly the circle has been growing apace. The boys and girls who romped about the palace twenty years ago are men and women now, with children of their own. But they keep up the pleasant old custom of gathering once a year in the home of their grandparents. The King and Queen still survive to give cordial welcome to their grandchildren, and are delighted and proud to receive their great-grandchildren. A lady photographer of Copenhagen who is a devout admirer of the princesses, took a photograph of the family group this year, from which the illustration on this page is copied. In the centre is the King of Denmark with a great grandchild on his knee. The lady standing on his left is the Queen of Denmark. On his right are his two daughters, the one nearer to him, the dowager Empress of Russia and the other the Princess of Wales. The young man with his hand on the Empress' shoulder is the present Czar. The lady sitting on the King's left with her child on her knee is the present Czarina. Standing behind her, with another great grandchild of the King in her arms, is the Princess Victoria of Wales, who is still unmarried. The lady on the left of the Princess is the Princess Waldemar, whose husband, the third son of the King of Denmark, appears on the left of the picture standing near his sister, the Princess of Wales. The three boys in the foreground are the children of the Prince and Princess Waldemar.

THE KING AND QUEEN OF DENMARK AND THEIR DESCENDANTS.

Ephraim came to the mid-day dinner, a big man, with a merry face and a ringing laugh; a man with a will of his own, but easy to live with if you only managed him right.

"Where's the little mother?" he inquired. His wife said nothing. His daughter answered briefly:

"She's gone out to dinner with Aunt Lucy Peabody."

"That's well," he said. "I hope you won't ever let your grandma feel neglected here, lassie. Sometimes I wish she wouldn't stay by herself so much. She used to take hold of everything that was going, but I suppose she's tired of the rough part of life. Anyhow, I want her evening days to be full of luxury and peace."

Over at the Peabodys, the poor soul, who knew and loathed the knowledge that she was a bone of contention in her son's family, was pouring out her woes to her old spinster-friend, Martha Anderson.

"I don't know as Amy can help it, but she's not congenial, and when I go to Kate's and Sarah's, I can see that they're twice glad; glad to have me come, and glad to have me go. I've outlived my usefulness, Martha, and I've outlived my welcome, and I'll not be sorry when I'm out of it and safe home yonder, with Jabez and the babies that never grew up to be tired of their old mother. I cried when they went, but I've had worse sorrows since."

"You have Ephraim," said the old wrinkles. She almost smiled. She was where she was "wanted" now, with Jabez and the children.

"Aren't you going to bed, father?" inquired a girl's voice.

"Not to-night, dear. I'll never have my mother's face to watch after she's carried out to the graveyard. And I'm not sure that we were as good to her as we ought to have been, the sweet little mother."

So the strong man grieved. But the angels hovered near him with comfort, for he had been faithful and loving to the end. And up above him, in his Father's house, there was a happy, bright mother, ready to greet him by and by, when he should come home.

Progress in Uganda.

That African kingdom where Bishop Hannington was martyred, is the scene of a wonderful Gospel triumph. Mr. G. L. Pilkington, an African lay missionary there, reports that in the capital early this year five hundred were avowed Christians awaiting reception into the Church, and three hundred more at another station. Two hundred churches have been built in native style in which services are held on Sunday and week days for instruction. Sunday after Sunday at the large church in Mengo, the capital, four thousand natives are packed together, listening to the everlasting Word, and about one thousand on week days. About one thousand five hundred candidates are awaiting baptism. Within the capital it is not uncommon to baptize seventy persons week after week.

Outside the capital the capacity of the ordained teachers is tried in the interviewing of candidates for baptism. Natives are also licensed as lay evangelists, teaching in the churches, and receiving support from their fellow-Waganda. One of the brightest signs of this blessed ingathering is the desire of the Christian Waganda to carry the Gospel to the nations beyond. Some of these have gone into adjoining countries, where baptisms have taken place.

Mr. Pilkington said that the native church was working in a radius of two hundred miles from Mengo, but the need was the better supervising of the work which required the presence of Christian men to train the native teachers and send them forth thoroughly equipped. He believes that two European missionaries could evangelize 2000 square miles by means of native helpers.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

Austria's Hardy Peasantry.

Leading Simple Lives, Yet Trained to Useful Employment and Excelling in the Domestic Arts.

It has been averred by many well-informed writers that the German or Austrian lady of station who is not an expert in the arts of housewifery does not exist. As a rule, she is conversant with the minutest detail of domestic management, and has made cuisine a scientific as well as a practical study. Even the princesses of the royal household of Austria have been in the habit of attending a course of lectures from a chef in order to gain proficiency in these matters. Where the heads of a nation set so much store by their accomplishments, they exert an influence that is not likely to be lost upon the beneath them in station. As a result, even the poorest among the people is stimulated to effort in the same direction. Austrian peasant women, in particular, are not only taught early in life to be industrious, but they seem to have the power to turn every task into a pleasure. Many of them are large-limbed, brawny, heavily-muscled, and work in the fields or at other out-door callings, when they are not bound down to indoor routine. But though they may be emancipated from the kitchen, they well know all the requirements, and can meet them with grace whenever occasion demands. Our photographic illustration on this page represents two young peasant women—Slavonian girls—in the odd yet not unpleasing costume of their class. No prettier costume can hardly be found than this simple dress of white lawn or linen, with its broad pleats and loosely drawn waist; the neat, serviceable boots, the Hussar-like cap and the dash of color added to the whole by the strings of bright-hued ribbon that dangle from a belt tied on the neck. It is a dress that would delight the heart of an artist, and reminds one of the costumes of Saxony or the Tyrol.

Among the peasant villages of the Danube valley there is little to vary the extreme monotony of existence. The Hungarian villages, with few exceptions, are not specially attractive, but the people themselves are exceedingly pleasant and amiable, and their lives are patterns of industry and frugality. Every passing day witnesses the same routine, the going forth at sunrise and the sunset return from the fields; the hearty home-coming and greeting, the herds on the hillsides, the cluster of gabled farm-houses, huddled together as if for protection, while the far land stretches for a long distance in all directions. These houses are low, with narrow doors, sloping roofs, and far-reaching eaves, and are usually thatched with reeds or straw. On the shaded verandah of nearly every house is a bench, with the Hungarians call szohord, or "throne of words," indicating the fact that the bench is used as a nook for friendly chat or gossip with a visiting neighbor. Within the house, the floors are of packed earth, more frequently than of boards. Girls, that wander all over the farm village, often stroll through the pretty garden of poppies, acacias, and sunflowers, into the rooms. Rude, strong furniture (decorated with painted flowers, if one of the family should happen to be artistic), fill all the place. Bedsteads in many houses are a luxury, and the beds, with their gay-striped covers, are spread on the floor.

Notwithstanding these disadvantages, the village life of both Austria and Hungary are a splendid people physically, and the latter, especially, deserve all the admiration that has been lavished upon them by writers and travelers. The wedding-day is the great event in the lives of these simple people, and a peasant bridal never fails to attract large gatherings of kinsfolk and neighbors from the surrounding country.

Mother—Live for the Boys.

M. M. E., Minneapolis, Minn., writes as follows: "I have been reading in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD lately, 'A Mother's Thoughts,' in which the writer says that a mother cannot change the impure nature the father may have given his child. I too, believe that the child very often inherits the father's disposition; but what can we say when there are such differences in one family. We often see one bright sunbeam that differs from all the rest. Is there always a Joseph in the family? We would be glad to have the preachers everywhere to preach to the boys, and may which numerous small ornaments and ancient 'cash' are suspended. An earring is put into one ear to fool the bad spirits, and make them think he is a girl. When baby is three days old special thanksgiving is made, and offerings are laid before the family shrine of the goddess 'Mother.' When he is one month old a grand feast is prepared, and relatives from far and near are invited. The great event is the shaving of the baby's head, which is done before the ancestral tablet or the shrine of 'Mother.' The maternal grandmother is the principal guest of the day, and if wealthy her presents are numerous and costly. The most important one is a gay little cap, ornamented with embroidery, and eighteen figures of the disciples of Buddha, which are believed to attract all the good influences toward the little wearer."

A Girl More Than Queen.

A beautiful anecdote is related of the gardener of a queen in Germany who had a little daughter with whose religious instruction he had taken great pains. When this child was five years of age, the queen saw her one day while visiting the royal gardens, and was so much pleased with her, that a week afterward she expressed

THE LAMB.

LITTLE lamb, who made thee?
Dost thou know who made thee?
Gave thee life, and bade thee feed
By the stream and o'er the mead;
Gave thee clothing of delight,
Softest clothing, woolly bright;
Gave thee such a tender voice,
Making all the vales rejoice?
Little lamb, who made thee?
Dost thou know who made thee?

Little lamb, I'll tell thee;
Little lamb, I'll tell thee;
He is called by thy name,
For he calls himself a Lamb.
He is meek and he is mild,
He became a little child,—
I a child and thou a lamb,
We are called by his name.
Little lamb, God bless thee,
Little lamb, God bless thee!

WILLIAM BLAKE.

A Child's Trust.

A SENSITIVE, timid little boy, long years ago, was accustomed to lie down to sleep in a low "trundle-bed," which was rolled under his parents' bed by day, and was brought out for his use by night. As he lay there by himself in the darkness, he could hear the voices of his parents, in their lighted sitting-room across the hallway, on the other side of the house. It seemed to him that his parents never slept; for he left them awake when he was put to bed at night, and he found them awake when he left his bed in the morning. So far this thought was a cause of cheer to him, as his mind was busy with imaginings in the weird darkness of his lonely room, writes Rev. H. C. Trumbull.

After loving good-night words and kisses had been given him by both his parents, and he had nestled down to rest, this little boy was accustomed, night after night, to rouse up once more, and to call out from his trundle-bed to his strong-armed father, in the room from which the light gleamed out, beyond the shadowy hallway, "Are you there, papa?" And the answer would come back cheerily, "Yes, my child, I am here." "You'll take care of me to-night, papa, won't you?" was then his question. "Yes, I'll take care of you, my child," was the comforting response. "Go to sleep, now. Good-night."

A little matter that was to the loving father; but it was a great matter to the sensitive son. It helped to shape the son's life. It gave the father an added hold on him; and it opened up the way for his clearer understanding of his dependence on the loving watchfulness of the All-Father. And to this day, when that son, himself a father and a grandfather, lies down to sleep at night; he is accustomed, out of the memories of that lesson of long ago, to look up through the shadows of his earthly sleeping-place into the far-off light of his Father's presence, and to call out, in the same spirit of childlike trust and helplessness as so long ago, "Father, you'll take care of me to-night; won't you?" And he hears the assuring answer come back, "He that keepeth thee will not slumber. The Lord shall keep thee from all evil. He shall keep thy soul. Sleep, my child, in peace."

And so the child is brought to realize the twofold blessing of a father's good-night words.

Fill the Hours with Work.

There is none so happy as the busy one. Teach the children the Gospel of work. They can serve God in studying art, in doing their lessons, in running of errands, in sweeping the floor, in washing dishes, and in any honorable work, no matter how humble. In one of Murillo's pictures in the Louvre he shows us the interior of a convent kitchen; but those who are doing the work are not mortals in old dresses, but beautiful angels. One is putting the kettle on the fire to boil, and one is lifting up a pail of water, and one is at the kitchen dresser reaching up for plates. The painter depicts every one as so busy, and working with such a will, that you forget pans are pans, and pots are pots, and think only of the angels and the work that seems so beautiful. Here is a beautiful life-thought:

Working quietly and unobtrusively,
Laying the table, and setting the chairs,
In hidden and unnoticed ways,
In household work, on common days.

every Christian mother lift her heart in prayer to God for the precious youths. My prayer is that God may lead them tenderly, and that they may walk before Him, for my heart yearns for the boys."

Dressing the Baby in China.

"Just look at the Chinese baby lying in its big bamboo cradle," writes Rev. G. S. Miner, "its big black eyes peering curiously out of a small round sawtooth face. In the summer the baby is not troubled with much clothing, but in the winter time he is muffled in so many wadded garments that one might easily take him to be a large football. His clothes are not white, but of some bright color, often scarlet. White is the color for mourning. To make the little fellow less mischievous and more obedient in future life, a red cord is tied around his sleeves. To guard him from the attacks of evil spirits, and ward off numerous childish ailments, another red cord is fastened about his neck, from a wish to see the little girl again. The father brought the child to the palace, and a page conducted her into the royal presence. When she saw the queen she kissed her robe and modestly took the seat which had been placed for her by the queen's order. From this spot she could overlook the table at which the queen was dining with the ladies of her court; and they watched with interest to see the effect of so much splendor on a simple child. She looked carelessly on the costly dresses of the royal party, the gold dishes on the table, and the pomp with which all was conducted, and then, folding her hands, she sang with her clear, childish voice:

I would, my father, I might be a queen,
And all the beauties and all the riches
Possess, with thousands of gentlemen,
I'll view the splendors of thy throne.

All the assembly were struck with surprise at seeing so much feeling and piety in one so young. Tears filled the eyes of the ladies, and the queen exclaimed, "Ah, happy child! how far are we below you!"

Philippine Islands in Revolt.

SPAIN'S new trouble appears, from recent cable dispatches, to be more serious than was at first supposed. Her representative in the Philippine Islands, so far from having suppressed the "notorious demonstration" of the people, reports as late as October 15 a defeat of a little army by the insurgents, and expresses his request for immediate assistance. Next to Cuba, the Philippine Islands are the most valuable possession left to Spain. They are a group of about five hundred islands, lying between that island and Borneo. Their aggregate area is about 120,000 square miles. Their population is about ten millions.

The islands are extraordinarily fertile, containing forests of ebony, cedar, iron-wood and gum-trees. Oranges, citron, banana, guava, sugar-cane are among their products, but their rice, tobacco and indigo are their largest exports. The people are chiefly negroes of the Papuan type, but there are a large number of Mestizos, a race of half-breeds descended from Chinese fathers and negro mothers. Spain has held the islands since the sixteenth century, but has never thoroughly subdued the people. She appears to have been intent on getting revenue from the islands, rather than introducing civilization. The trade has gone chiefly into the hands of German, English and American traders, and has been extremely profitable. The English alone amounts annually to fifteen million dollars. Manila and three other ports are the only places open to foreign trade. Spain exacts a high tariff, and besides, retains in her own hands the monopoly of tobacco and cigars. Roman Catholic missionaries have labored in the islands for over a century and some three millions of the natives were reported to be converts, even these are only nominally Christian, and the large bulk of the people are pagans. The present trouble appears to have been of Japanese origin. An outlet for the surplus population is indispensable to the Island Empire, and since she has been excluded by the greed of Russia from Korea, she has turned her eyes longingly to the Philippines. With Formosa as a base of operations, Japan has sent colonists to the islands, who, it is alleged, have fomented discontent among the natives. Nominally the movement aims to establish a republic, but if Japan is really doing it, there is little doubt that annexation and not independence, will be the outcome of success, if it is achieved. Spanish reports compute the insurgent strength at fifteen thousand men and their forces scattered over the islands are about twenty thousand. Insurgent enthusiasm is growing rapidly owing to the heavy taxation and intolerable tyranny of Spanish rule, which the people believe are now a prospect of shaking off. Public sympathy goes out naturally to the people struggling for liberty, but in this instance there is ground for hesitation. Independence to a people unaccustomed to self-government may mean only anarchy; and annexation to Japan would mean the supremacy of a government avowedly unchristian. Neither alternative presents to the islands the true bases of happiness and prosperity. These are to be found only in submission to Christ, of whose rule the prophet sang:

He shall not fail nor be discouraged till he have set judgment in the earth: and the isles shall wait for his law. Isa. 42:4.

Opaque to the Roentgen Rays.

A new discovery has been made in the study of the Roentgen rays. It was at first supposed that metals and bones were the only substances that the rays could not penetrate. A German chemist who has been making experiments, however, adds several articles to the list. The chemist had a number of glass tubes made which he filled with certain liquids. These were submitted to the rays and found to resist them, in various degrees of strength. The liquids were of the kind known to chemists as halogenics, that is, substances which form salts by entering into combination with metals. Chief among them are iodine, bromine, and chlorine, all of which make a deep shadow on the plate when photographed by the rays, showing that the light has not penetrated them. The curious fact was noticed that several of these substances offer no resistance to ordinary light though they are impervious to the Roentgen Rays which penetrate wood and flesh. Carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen are transparent to the rays, and as these are the main elements of flesh, it is easy to perceive why organic substances can be penetrated by the rays. Incidentally the chemist who made the discovery detected a case of adulteration by means of the rays. He was puzzled by the fact that one of the substances which on the new principle should have been opaque, was transparent. He was unable to solve the mystery until he analyzed the substance and found that his specimen had been adulterated. The pure substance gave the shadow under the rays which he had expected it to give. Doubtless the adulterator had no idea that so clear a test would be applied to the material he supplied. A similar surprise awaits many whose characters and work are now respected but which will be declared worthless under the clear light that will be applied to them at the last.

Every man's work shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by him. 1 Cor. 13:12.

Forgot Her Child.

A New York policeman relieved the distress of a young mother a few days ago. He found her in the street crying and wringing her hands. She was too hysterical to explain her trouble at first, but eventually she made him understand that she had lost her baby. She had left it somewhere and could not remember where. By dint of many questions that the woman was too excited to understand, the policeman succeeded in finding out the place she had been to since she left home in the morning with the infant in her arms. She had been hurriedly summoned to Bellevue Hospital to see a relative who had been hurt. She was very much distressed by the interview, and was thinking of it as she went homeward, when she suddenly thought of her child. The policeman took her back to the hospital as the most likely place to find it. At the gate, the gatekeeper recognized the woman at once and took her into his lodge, where the child was lying fast asleep. Seeing her excitement when she went in, he had offered to let her leave the child while she went up to see her relative. After her visit she went out at another gate, and he did not see her leave. She must have been very much pre-occupied to have been so forgetful. Rare as such an occurrence is, the incident shows that it is possible, and therefore the prophet was right when he described the love of God who never forgets his children as greater than even the love of a mother:

Can a woman forget her sucking-child? Yea they may forget, but I will not forget thee. Jer. 13:14.

Prescriptions by Pigeon Post.

A British journal describes the novel device of a physician in Scotland whose practice lies in a widely scattered district. The doctor carries with him when he makes his visits several carrier pigeons. In urgent cases, he writes a prescription and confides it to one of the birds which flies to his home, where his dispenser makes up the medicine and sends it to the patient. Nor is this the only service the pigeons render. When a patient is liable to need the doctor's services in a hurry, the doctor leaves a pigeon with him and if the patient needs the doctor, he simply releases the pigeon and its arrival at the doctor's home is sufficient notification that he is wanted and he mounts his horse and rides off. The patients have full confidence in this novel messenger service. It is much to be wished that Christians had the same confidence in the prayer service placed at their disposal. Then they would more frequently say with the Psalmist:

This poor man cried and the Lord heard him and saved him out of all his troubles. (Ps. 34:6.)

American Mummies.

Egypt does not enjoy an absolute monopoly in the preservation of the bodies of the dead. There are several bodies in the museum of the Smithsonian Institution, at Washington, D. C., which prove that the art of embalming and mummy-making were known to some of the Indians in our own land. They were found in a cave in Alaska, and a bodies wrapped in spices and covered with grass-cloth. They were then placed in a cave and the chief left minute instructions that when he died his body should be treated in the same way and placed in the same cave. He was obeyed and the bodies were found one hundred and seventy-six years afterward in a good state of preservation. Their appearance resembles Egyptian mummies which have been found in the rock tombs in the land of the Pharaohs. Like the Egyptians, the Indians seem to have had a longing for eternal life, but did not know that it was to be attained by the soul, and not by the body. Long before, unknown to them, the patriarch had reached a truer conclusion:

Wedded in Prison.

A wedding took place in the jail of Jersey City, N. J., a few days ago, which effected the bridegroom's release from confinement. He is a restaurant keeper. Some two years ago he became engaged to be married. Lately he changed his mind, and informed the lady that he desired to be released from his engagement. Thereupon she commenced proceedings for damages. As the young man was unable to furnish bail, he was locked up. Two days imprisonment brought him to repentance. He sent for the lady and informed her that rather than remain in jail he would marry her. Her lawyer, who accompanied her, advised her to stipulate for the transfer of the man's property to herself before the ceremony. The man objected, but as he was unable to make better terms he finally yielded. The ceremony was then begun and another hitch occurred. When the bridegroom was asked the usual question whether he would take this woman, etc., instead of answering, "I will," or "I do," he said, "I've got to." The bride objected to so dishonoring an answer and demanded an apology. The man refused, but again yielded when the bride was going away and leaving him in jail. The wedding then proceeded, the bridegroom making the responses properly and meekly. At the conclusion of the ceremony, the bridegroom was set at liberty, and he and his wife left the prison arm in arm. It was obvious to every one that the man was marrying as the only way to escape punishment, and not because he loved his future wife. The same motive often impels people to seek Christ: they are fearful of the doom that awaits the impenitent, and they turn to Christ as the way of escape, and not because they love him or hate sin. That fact accounts for the lack of enthusiasm there is in some who are called Christians.

Not every one who saith unto me, Lord, Lord shall enter into the kingdom of heaven but he that doeth the will of my Father. Matt. 7:21.

To Recall a Letter.

A fact that will be news to many people, even those well-informed on the Postal service is stated by the Evening Transcript, of Boston, Mass. It says that a letter can be recalled by the sender at any time before it is delivered to the person to whom it is addressed. "This can be done, even if the letter has reached the Post Office at its destination. At every Post Office there are what are called 'withdrawal blanks.' On application they will be furnished, and, when a deposit is made to cover the expense, the Postmaster will telegraph to the Postmaster at the letter's destination asking that it be promptly returned. The applicant first signs an agreement indemnifying the Postmaster." This privilege is useful. In many cases persons have made remittances to fraudulent parties or irresponsible firms, not learning their true character until after the letter had gone, and have succeeded in recalling them. There are probably many other letters besides those containing money that the writers wish to withdraw after taking time to consider consequences. Some people have had reason to wish the same thing about their prayers. When people are very importunate in pleading for something they desire, and are not content to let God choose their lot for them, he sometimes gives them what they beg for, and allows them to learn by sad experience that they were unwise to take the management of their lives into their own hands. Many a burden has to be borne, because, as with the Israelites romantic tradition of Indian origin about them was given to a reporter of the New York Herald by an Alaskan priest. He said that the remains were those of a chief and his family, who lived nearly two hundred years ago. The first to die was a beautiful boy, the only son of his father, who idolized him. He was drowned, but his body was recovered. It was preserved by arts known to the Esquimaux, and wrapped in its finest clothes was placed in the best house in the village in the place of honor and a funeral procession to see it was formed. The chief's daughter, who was in the procession slipped on the frozen snow and falling, so injured herself that she died soon afterward. The chief was heart-broken and refused to allow the funeral rites to continue. He had the

He gave them their own desire. (Ps. 78:29.)

Our Superb 1897 Library---Just Out.

TEN Charming Books, Each a Literary Gem, and All Beautiful Specimens of Artistic Book-making, With an Attractive BOOK-CASE, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for One Year—52 Times—all for Only $5.

NEVER has THE CHRISTIAN HERALD been privileged to offer a more useful, a more interesting, a more attractive or a more satisfactory premium, in every respect, than our 1897 Library.

Specially prepared for lovers of pure, wholesome and elevating literature, these ten delightful volumes, (ten splendid Christmas gifts,) aggregating 3,200 pages of large type, and bound in rich olive vellum cloth, with red and gilt titles, combine to make a premium surpassing in intrinsic value and general superiority, all the wonderful premium inducements of the past. This exceptionally fine collection of choice books commends itself at sight, and its possession will contribute to make many a home cheerier, happier and brighter. We unhesitatingly, and without any mental reservation whatever, cordially recommend this Home Library to the favorable consideration of our numerous readers, and we are confident that wherever it is received it will rapidly make sincere friends for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Many people, after having mailed a letter containing money, become prematurely impatient for a response, and feel considerable disappointment in not receiving their premium at an unduly early date. The trouble generally is that they do not make a sufficient time-allocation for their letters to arrive in New York and the goods to reach their hands.

And now to guard against miscalculations that may result in disappointment, we append, for the information of all our friends, at the foot of this article, a table indicating the time which must of necessity elapse between the mailing of a letter and the delivery of the premium to the subscriber, either by express or mail.

If for any reason, our 1897 Library should fail to give entire satisfaction, we will, on its return, and without asking for any explanation, gladly, cheerfully, and promptly refund the full amount involved.

We recommend a careful perusal of the following notices of the ten books which comprise THE CHRISTIAN HERALD 1897 Library, all contained in a handsome book-case, securely packed and delivered to any address in the United States or Canada, all charges prepaid, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one whole year (52 times) for only $5.

1. The Wedding Ring.

By REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.

Marriage is a subject universally interesting and tremendously important. The wise counsel which Dr. Talmage in his captivating volume, "The Wedding Ring," offers to young folks and their parents, his advice on "How to Choose a Husband" and "How to Choose a Wife," and his able talks on "The Relations of Wife to Husband and Husband to Wife," will help his many readers to act wisely and judiciously in matters that may decide the destiny of loved ones for time and for eternity. His two chapters on "Clandestine Marriages" and "Woman Enthroned" should be read by every member of the gentler sex.

2. The Secret of a Happy Home.

By MARION HARLAND.

"The Secret of a Happy Home" is not yet generally in possession of the people. Many homes, in which all the conditions for happiness exist in generous measure, are yet unhappy, and the book which Marion Harland here sends forth into the world is calculated to transform many an abode of comparative misery into an Eden of felicity.

Get this precious volume, and read it aloud in the family circle. It offers suggestions and hints which will help each member to contribute a proportionate share toward making home what it should be, a veritable haven of bliss.

3. Notable 19th Century Events.

By JOHN CLARK RIDPATH, D.D.

The nineteenth century is the most remarkable of all that this old world has ever seen. Never was history made faster, never did men do greater things, and never were discoveries and inventions more numerous and more potent for good. Of course, a volume of this kind cannot contain every event of importance that occurred during the past ninety-six years, but in

"Notable Events of the 19th Century," Dr. John Clark Ridpath, whose name is a synonym for good authorship and erudition, has very cleverly selected and very ably handled those particular events in the political, military, naval, scientific, and religious world that have exerted the mightiest influences during the present century. A marvelous subject and a marvelous book.

4. How to Succeed.

By ORISON S. MARDEN, M.D.

Everybody in this world is eager to achieve success. Countless thousands who are plodding on day after day, making little or no progress, could turn their industry to mighty advantage did they but enjoy the benefit of proper and intelligent guidance. In his grandly inspiring book, "How to Succeed," Dr. O. S. Marden, the famous author of "Pushing to the Front," and "Architects of Fate," supplies just what is needed in that direction, and no one can read this excellent volume without deriving infinite advantage. We keep well within the limits of fact when we claim for this book that it is the best one of its kind ever published.

5. Holiday Stories for the Young.

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Young people will read stories, and it is right that they should; but too much care cannot be exercised in making proper selection. A bad story has often blighted a life that might have been beautiful, and a good story has not infrequently given a tendency in the right direction that has told for time and eternity. In "Holiday Stories for the Young," Margaret E. Sangster has made a contribution to literature for young people which clearly demonstrates the fact that good stories can be made much more attractive than vile ones, and that purity does not necessarily go hand in hand with insipidity. This fascinating collection will speedily commend itself to our young friends, who will find in it a mine of delightful entertainment.

6. The Land We Live In.

By HENRY MANN.

"The Land We Live In." God bless it, and preserve it! No better land in all the world! How we love it! What a privilege to dwell in it! How interesting its history and the story of its growth and its marvelous development! Here is a volume that tells us all about it. It reads like a fairy-tale. Things we never knew, but which every American should know, are told in a manner so captivating that we read on until the eyes tire and we are compelled to lay it aside for awhile, only to take it up again for another draught on its inexhaustible treasures. Mr. Henry Mann, who has contributed this grand volume to our Library, has, through it, done excellent service to his country.

7. Winter Evening Tales.

By AMELIA E. BARR.

Amelia E. Barr's name is a household word wherever pure literature is treasured. Her volume of "Winter Evening Tales" is full of entrancing tales. From beginning to end, it captivates and charms. Mrs. Barr is an admirer of capital tales, and she has a master-hand in dressing them up in a simply irresistible and inimitable manner. The book of this winter will afford few, if any, tales that will be read with greater interest or more genuine satisfaction.

8. Recitations for the Social Circle.

By JAMES CLARENCE HARVEY.

In "Recitations for the Social Circle," James Clarence Harvey, the well-known poet and author, has succeeded in presenting a collection of charming prose and poetry which agreeably combines the elements of light entertainment. We here find hundreds of literary gems, humorous, pathetic, so witty, and so poetic; all pure, elevating, with not a questionable word in the whole collection. Old and young will find amusement and entertainment in this handy little volume, which does infinite credit to its talented compiler.

9. The Fairy-Land of Science.

By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY.

We are very prone to go through the world with our eyes shut. Half the beauties are missed, because we do not suspect their existence, and are blind to see the Read "The Fairy-Land of Science," and learn why we much that we might have enjoyed. Do not think it dry and tedious, for it reads like a romance, and once read, the eyes are opened and things now tame and uninteresting are suddenly and permanently invested with wonderful interest and attractiveness. One hour spent with this delightful volume will reveal a multitude of nearby wonders hitherto hidden from view.

10. Thoughts of Many Minds.

By LOUIS KLOPSCH, Ph.D.

"Many Thoughts of Many Minds" is a volume which will prove exceedingly helpful to many people. It contains quotations from standard authors of recognized ability, on nearly every subject that engages the human mind, and these 2500 extracts from the choicest literature of all ages are arranged, constitute a treasury of thought which, we are sure, will be acceptable and serviceable to all into whose hands this volume may chance to fall.

The Christian Herald Library.

SLIGHTLY REDUCED FROM LIFE SIZE.

These TEN SPLENDID BOOKS, aggregating 3200 Pages of LARGE TYPE, Beautifully and Artistically Bound in Rich OLIVE Vellum Cloth, with RED and GILT Titles, and this ATTRACTIVE BOOK-CASE, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the Brightest and Best Family Paper in the World, for One Whole Year—52 Times—for Only $3.

The Christian Herald,
663 to 679 Bible House, New York.

The Christian Herald for 1897.

IN once more extending our annual greeting to our world-wide circle of friends, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cordially invites them to accompany it into fresh fields of literary and artistic enjoyment, and new avenues of Christian usefulness. As a band of brothers and sisters, they will be associated in a multitude of good works, will visit and explore new scenes in many lands, and will be brought into pleasant and profitable acquaintance with the greatest men and women of our day and generation.

While all the standard features that have made THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a universal favorite will be retained, there are many new and delightful surprises in store for our readers during the coming year. Of course, Dr. Talmage, our Editor-in-Chief, will continue to consider, editorially, the leading events of the day, and his sermons, carefully revised by himself, will appear regularly as heretofore.

Pastor Thomas Spurgeon, who has succeeded his eminent father as pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle in London, and who preaches to the greatest audiences on the other side of the Atlantic, is now on our staff of regular contributors. Mr. Spurgeon has that wonderful pithy, humorous and cheerful good sense, and that marvelous power of condensing a sermon into an epigram, that made his much-lamented father's sermons such delightful reading.

Amelia E. Barr, America's greatest authoress, has written, exclusively for our columns, the most remarkable and fascinating Serial Story that has ever come from her gifted and prolific pen. It is entitled "The King's Highway," and is so charming and dramatic, that it cannot fail to afford exceptional pleasure to all our readers. Mrs. Barr will also contribute a series of unique articles, dealing with questions closely allied to our home and social lives.

Hon. Selah Merrill, first United States Consul in Jerusalem, who has made life in Palestine the subject of closest observation and study, has engaged to write a series of articles on "The Modern Jew in His Ancestral Home." He will describe the street life of the Holy City, the amusements of its people, their festivals, their newly-founded colonies, and many other attractive and picturesque phases of their social life. The illustrations accompanying these articles, being from photographs taken by Dr. Merrill with his own camera. These wonderfully graphic articles afford a truer conception of Jewish home life than can be had from any other source.

Margaret E. Sangster, known to all lovers of sweet poetry and helpful prose, and who has been associated with the sympathetic, will conduct a series of "Home Talks With Margaret E. Sangster," which will, undoubtedly, contribute to a happier, healthier and more beautiful home life. These talks will be read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Ira D. Sankey, whose name is a household word, and whose good music is appreciated, and whose songs are sung in every land and in every tongue, will continue to supply each week some original songs, many of which have been specially adapted to the requirements of the hour.

Another gratifying addition to our staff is the Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage, the great beloved Editor, who has inherited, in no small measure, the genius of his illustrious father. A careful student, and a talented, pleasant and ready writer, his contributions will be read with a peculiar interest by the countless thousands who, for many years, have been accustomed to associate the family name with the highest type of pulpit eloquence.

Gen. John Eaton of Washington, D. C., contributes a series of articles on "Mormonism of the Present Day," a revelation to our readers, while U. S. Commissioner in Utah for many years, had exceptional opportunities for obtaining accurate information, and mask from this our iniquity, or dead nor shows that its meaning the literal life of that its propaganda is rich and powerful, and that its aim is treason and national debasement. These articles, splendidly illustrated, should be read by every one who values national purity, and the permanent well-being of our Republican institutions.

The whole world knows and loves Fanny Crosby, the blind hymn-writer, whose life has been one long, labor, under the auspices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, both as teacher and physician. In her ministrations she will doubtless aid many poor Armenian fugitives, who, by crossing the mountains, have escaped the fate of their massacred friends.

Yoseph's letters, which we will write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be illustrated with photographs, and will be particularly interesting, as they will deal with a remote portion of the world, little known to travelers or to Christian missionaries, and full of serious Gospel opportunities.

Rev. Louis Albert Banks, D.D., the eminent and eloquent Methodist divine, will arouse the spirit of emulation by a series of wonderfully attractive anecdotal articles, on "Heroism of Character," in which interesting and instructive episodes in the lives of the distinguished and noble men and women of our own day will be related for the first time. Dr. Banks is a Master of anecdotal literature, and his contributions dealing with actual events in the experiences of living people, will charm and inspire all who read them. These "Living Stories" will find a warm welcome from all our readers, who cannot fail to feel the spell of this fascinating writer. His ardent sympathy with struggling humanity and his strenuous desire to help them has led him to study the lives of those who have achieved success in all walks of life and his mind is consequently stored with anecdotes, the brightest and best of which he will now recount for the delectation of our army of readers.

Besides those already mentioned, a host of other brilliant writers in all parts of the world will contribute to our pages. There is hardly a country on the round globe that has not added at least one personality to this phalanx of literary talent, thus ing infinite variety to every issue of the paper. Among the contributors are: Grace Kimball, the Missionary Heroine of Van; Sheldon Jackson, the Alaska Missionary and Explorer; Ex-U.S. Senator Henry Blair, of New Hampshire; Rev. C. H. Mead, Rev. R. S. McArthur, Rev. Hawthorne, of Atlanta; Mrs. Baxter, of London; Heli Chatelain, the Albanian Liberator; Rev. A. S. Gilbert, of Boston, the writer of Delightful Sermons for the Young, and Missionary Correspondents in Central Africa, Arabia, Mesopotamia, China, India, Japan, Corea, Asia Minor, and the Islands of the Pacific.

The International Sunday School Lessons, which the topic of the week is interestingly discussed and beautifully illustrated; the Mail-Bag, through which all our readers may ask and receive advice and information on any topic; the Bible and the Newspaper (full of live illustrations for preachers and Sunday School Teachers); the Family and Home Circle, with its pleasant prattle and friendly counsel in behalf of the younger generation and the "old folks" as well; Advance Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic, and the multitude of other features which in the past have endeared THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to its hundreds of thousands of readers will all be continued, including its magnificent front pages printed in many bright beautiful colors, and a thousand and one superlative attractions besides those mentioned above.

SLAVES UNDER ENGLAND'S FLAG.

How the Traffic in Human Flesh is Conducted at Zanzibar, in Defiance of Treaty Promises—Horrors of the Traffic.

THE PORT OF ZANZIBAR, LONG THE CENTRE OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

THE attempt of Said Khalid to usurp the Sultanate of Zanzibar, in opposition to Hamoud, the protégé of the British, terminating in the bombardment and destruction of the palace and in the speedy suppression of the revolt, was probably a manifestation of the wrath with which the Arabs of Zanzibar have received the news of Lord Salisbury's promise that Consul-General Hardinge shall, in the fall, return to Zanzibar with instructions to abolish the status of slavery without delay. The failure of this uprising and this demonstration of England's power will no doubt greatly facilitate the enforcement of immediate abolition; for nobody in Zanzibar now dares to resist any orders of the British rulers. Nevertheless this long-looked-for reform remains a complicated and laborious task for those entrusted with its execution. The attention of American readers has been directed to the anomaly of slavery thriving under the British flag in a recent denunciation in a weekly publication, with no American paper thus far given a full and accurate presentation of this important question. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers who are now interested in the movement which aims at wiping out slavery from the face of the earth, will be glad to read the following account written especially for them by H. Chatelain who has made a special study of this subject. The Protectorate of Zanzibar consists of the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba with a strip of the mainland facing them. The protectorate was assumed by Great Britain in 1890 with the consent of Germany and France to whom Heligoland and Madagascar were given up as a compensation for the relinquishment of their right to the Bights of Benue and Biafra. Since 1890, Zanzibar and Pemba have been administered by British subjects under a puppet Sultan, and England is responsible for whatever the Zanzibar government does or fails to do. Ever since the assumption of the protectorate, the English government, whether liberal or conservative, has promised again and again to speedily abolish the status of slavery; but not until recently has it been possible for the advocates of immediate abolition to compel the British government to fix an approximate date at which abolition shall take place. The principal difficulties in the way of immediate abolition are: First, the Mohammedan law under which the islands are still administered and which legalizes slavery. Second, the fact that the Zanzibar government derives its revenue chiefly from the clove plantations which are entirely worked by slave labor. Third, the fact that the Sultan is himself the largest slave owner and that the British officer who rules the protectorate is at the same time the manager of the Sultan's estates. In these material interests is found the reason why, instead of diminishing, the slave-trade has considerably increased since the advent of British rule.

The actual state of affairs in these islands has been revealed to the British public by Mr. Donald Mackenzie, special commissioner of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, who made a thorough investigation on the spot. The population of Zanzibar and Pemba is estimated at 400,000 souls, 266,000 of whom are slaves. The Arabs, who number about 10,000, are the lords of the soil; the East-Indians, some 8,500 in number, are the financiers; and the Europeans, perhaps 100 strong, are merchants or government officials. The slaves may be divided into four classes: First, Domestic slaves, principally composed of concubines, household slaves and eunuchs. Second, Plantation slaves, who cultivate the shambas (estates) without pay, being allowed Tuesday and Friday in each week to raise their own food. Third, Town laborers (including many women), who do all the hard work in the harbor, the warehouses and the streets. Fourth, Porters who carry goods into the interior of Africa and bring back produce.

so-

low estimate. In most of the dhows which have been captured were found small boys who had been horribly mutilated.

In the province of Zanzibar, women prisoners may be seen every day chained together in gangs of about seven and working under the supervision of a policeman armed with a stick. The greatest slave-holders are: the Sultan who owns 30,000, Abdullah ben Salam, who possesses 18,000, and his principal wife 1,000 more, and the famous Tippoo Tib who has 10,000.

In order to place the present 266,000 slaves on Zanzibar and Pemba, the sacrifice of human lives at the places of capture in the interior and on the road must have been, according to the lowest estimate, over 1,000,000 souls. To supply the local demand of the two islands, 24,000 are sacrificed year after year, and over 40,000 are claimed by the export to Arabia and Persia.

The great loss of life on the road is such that a slave who cost in the interior a few yards of calico is worth at the coast from $50 to $100. As the plantations of the Arabs are all mortgaged to British-Indian financiers, these are the real slave owners hiding themselves behind the Arabs, who cultivate the plantations for them, because British law will not allow them to hold slaves. Even the slave-raiding expeditions to the interior were financed by these British subjects. It was a well known Indian who started that arch-slave Tippoo Tib in business. The rate of interest which the Indians get from the mortgages ranges from called "free-labor" consists of slaves who are hired by British subjects, and have to pay their non-British proprietors half of their earnings. These "free laborers" must find enough work to satisfy their proprietors, or they are punished. The mortality among the slaves is appalling. It is estimated that thirty per cent. of the caravan porters who are taken to the interior die from exhaustion, ill-treatment and other causes.

One explorer went into the interior with 450 men, and he came back with only 190. A slave is said to live on an average only eleven years. Prolific as negroes generally are, the slaves have very few children. This is partly attributed to the ill-treatment of very young girls by the Arabs and others. Owing to this great mortality, it is computed that 7,000 slaves have to be annually imported in order to supply the deficiency. Most of these slaves imported by contraband are now brought from the mainland in sailing canoes which easily escape the attention of the men-of-war.

From Zanzibar the slaves can be transferred to the island of Pemba where there is no European resident (except quite recently an English Vice-Consul), and thence they are shipped to Persia and Arabia without great difficulty. Mr. Mackenzie thinks that 11,000 slaves are annually shipped from the mainland and Zanzibar to those countries. As the dhows used in this trade number 1,516 that would make an average of seven per dhow, which is a cent. The plantations are mortgaged to the amount of $1,100,000.

Commissioner Mackenzie was the first European to explore the island of Pemba, and his description of it is therefore particularly interesting. It lies twenty-two miles north-eastward of Zanzibar, and is like this a coral island. About forty miles long, it is fairly compact on the eastern coast, but on its western side there is a fringe of some one hundred strange looking islands which run parallel with the main island, from which they are separated by a sheet of water perhaps nine miles wide. In the numberless creeks and mangrove swamps of the main island any number of dhows can safely hide, and land or embark slaves, without being detected by Her Majesty's cutters. Pemba is perhaps only thirteen miles wide in some places. Its fertility is unsurpassed. The population is composed of Arabs (5000), Indians (1000), Wa-Pemba, that is, the free natives who hold the eastern side (7000), and slaves (82,000). The free Wa-Pemba buy, sell and hold slaves like the Arabs. The Arabs have given the climate of Pemba a bad name so as to scare Europeans from going there; and they have succeeded so well, that none of the European merchants of Zanzibar have ever ventured to visit this island. Mr. Mackenzie, however, thinks its climate is rather better than that of Zanzibar. The condition of the women is terrible. "They mix mortar, carry loads of sand, stone or any other material, and if hired out, they have to pay all they receive to their Arab masters who live luxuriantly on the hard earnings of these poor women." The plantation slaves are sometimes treated with great cruelty by their masters; "they are often beaten to death in order to strike terror into the minds of the others. The punishment of slaves is left to the masters' own discretion with no check of any sort on the part of the authorities." Some masters, of course, are fairly humane. Toward Mr. Mackenzie, who had a letter of recommendation from the Sultan, the Arabs were very hospitable and obliging. Their questions showed that they had but very vague notions of European nations and politics. But for the curse of slavery, Pemba, with its ridges and valleys and luxuriant vegetation would be one of the pleasantest islands in the tropics.

On his way back, Mr. Mackenzie passed, near Lamu, on the continent, "a place full of human bones. It was said that this was the place where slaves used to be shipped to the Arabian coast, and that these were the bones of the poor creatures who were too weak and sick to be shipped."

Among the British officials with whom he conferred in Africa concerning slavery, the Commissioner found some quite decided in favor of a prompt abolition of the abominable system, some advocating a gradual change, and some cynically enlarging on the virtue of slavery, asserting that the African has always been a slave, that he is not fitted for anything else, and that he is almost in love with the lash, the chain and the fetter. No wonder that on recommending the earliest abolition of slavery, Mr. Mackenzie should add: "Unless the carrying out of such measure is entrusted to a special staff of English officers appointed for the purpose, it will share the same fate as former treaties and decrees." No wonder, too, that his report should have raised a storm in the British press and Parliament. It appears that not one of his statements has been contested by the government or by the opponents of abolition.

Bishop Tucker, of Uganda, has confirmed facts and conclusions in most unequivocal terms. He sent to the London Times a vigorous protest against the rumor that he was in favor of deferred abolition. Provided proper precautions are taken, he strongly urges immediate abolition and claims that "no question of £30,000 a year (revenue from clove plantations), should for a moment interfere with the doing of the right. Our fathers, thank God, had sufficient moral courage to insist on the abolition of slavery in the West Indies, even at the cost of millions. Has England degenerated?" To the stereotyped contention that the African will not work unless he is forced to do so, the Bishop answers: "the African will not work more than he can help in a state of slavery; but, as a matter of fact and experience, he will work and does work in a state of liberty; the abolition of slavery, in my opinion, will not lead to less, but rather to increased production." In reply to the objection that emancipation would increase immorality, the Bishop declares his disbelief in such a condition resulting.

Most of the country papers and a large proportion of the city papers demand the immediate cessation of legalized slavery in all British possessions. Several non-conformist churches have sent memorials to the government urging the same reform. The Society of Friends has done more. It has decided to open an industrial farm on the island of Pemba, where the freedmen may find a shelter, employment, and education in handicrafts and Christianity.

The Philafrican Liberators' League, newly organized in the United States, exists for the purpose of arousing public interest in the cause of Africa's enslaved millions and of bringing practical and permanent relief to those of whom the explorer Cameron said: "The lot of the most miserable victim of the worst of sweaters is paradise compared with that of these poor wretches." Information, pamphlets, constitution and forms of membership will gladly be furnished by Heli Chatelain, 511 United Charities Building, New York.

Gospel Workers ✻ ✻ in Conference.

The Thirteenth Annual Convention of the Christian and Missionary Alliance.

A WONDERFUL series of inspiring meetings has just been concluded in the Gospel Tabernacle at Eighth avenue and Forty-fourth street, New York. As our readers are aware, this is the headquarters of the Christian and Missionary Alliance, which is devoted to the four-fold Gospel: Christ our Saviour; Christ our Sanctifier; Christ our Healer, and Christ our Coming King. Conventions of the Alliance are held during the year in various parts of the country; but in the Fall the great Convention of all is held in New York, when reports of progress are made, missionaries from foreign lands return to tell of their triumphs, and testimonies are given by converts and believers who have been healed by divine power through faith and prayer. The Convention continued this year with three sessions each day from Sept. 27 to Oct. 11, the concluding sessions being held in Carnegie Music Hall, when Mr. D. L. Moody preached to overflowing congregations in the afternoon and evening. In the morning Dr. A. B. Simpson, President of the Alliance, made his annual appeal for funds to carry on the Foreign Missionary work of the coming year, and the unprecedented sum of one hundred and twelve thousand dollars in money, jewels and pledges was contributed. The scene was one of never-to-be-forgotten enthusiasm, people stripping themselves of watches, rings and ornaments and casting them on the glittering heap on the platform, to be used for Christ in the salvation of the world.

These services were the culmination of those of the previous fourteen days, during which the spirit of self-sacrifice and consecration had been growing. They were wonderful meetings. Wonderful not only in the great things accomplished by its members, but wonderful also in the courage, earnestness and consecration of these workers for God and humanity. The men and women who spoke with fire and eloquence in this Convention of the saving power of God in their lives, and through them, the lives of others, evidently knew whereof they spoke.

Of all the series of meetings, none were so productive of interest and good realized as the series devoted to the Rescue Mission Workers of New York and vicinity. Under the direction of Rev. Dr. Wilson, Col. H. H. Hadley, and Dr. S. E. Furry, many representative workers from each mission made brief but forceful addresses at the sessions set apart for that purpose. Some of the speakers who carried conviction home to all of the hearts of those who heard, were Mrs. Booth-Tucker, the sweet-voiced, refined, and courageous daughter of Gen. Booth of the Salvation Army; Col. H. H. Hadley, of St. Bartholomew's Mission; Mr. George Graff, Superintendent of Dr. Parkhurst's Mission; Mother Prindle, of the Florence Crittenden Mission; Mrs. Ballou, of the Jerry McAuley Cremorne Mission, at 104 Thirty-second street; Supt. H. A. Gould, of the Erring Girls' Industrial Home, 208 East Fourteenth street; Miss Ruddy, of the Italian Mission, located in that part of the city known as "Little Italy;" Mr. Law Sing, Chinese Missionary of the Doyer Street Mission; Mrs. Messler, Supt. of the Jersey City Mission; Dr. Simmons, Supt. of the Industrial Home for Men in Newark.

Mr. Watson, a Scotch Missionary from the Coal Mines Mission, and many others; all with histories and stories of deep interest connected with their lives, the growth of their missions, and the lives of other people brought by the hand of God to the open door of the missionary's heart and home.

"I was a homeless, ragged, dirty, penniless, drunken tramp," said Mr. Graff, "when I walked into the door of Dr. Parkhurst's Mission one year ago. After my ... sent among tough people. I went to Chicago, and was given the worst mission in the city. I was twenty-seven years old in God to save. And I wanted tough people. I wanted drunkards—to tell them what I had been, and that there was the same Power to save them that had saved me." Mr. Graff is now actively engaged in Dr. Parkhurst's New York Mission.

A pitiful illustration of the degradation of small boys in big cities, was given by Mr. Frye, Assistant Superintendent of Rescue work in Patterson, N. J. Mr. Frye is an Italian, and has a class of thirty-five boys who are all bootblacks, and have known no home but the street. When this class was organized, Mr. Frye asked three questions of the boys he was seeking to reclaim. "How many of you swear?" he asked. "How many of you drink? How many lie?" And thirty-five small grimy hands went up in answer! Mr. Frye says that an enormous number of young men are now being reached by the Rescue work of Patterson.

The Industrial department is a great feature of the "Whosoever and Gospel Rescue Home," over 90,000 brooms having been manufactured since its organization. A "shelter" attached to this mission accommodates the very worst types who apply for admittance. As an illustration of the depths and heights to which a man may sink or rise by the force or weakness of his own will-power and action, Mr. Raws repeated a striking incident connected with his mission. The incident was an actual fact in which a man who was a scholar, a gentleman, a fine linguist, a civil engineer and an explorer, came to his mission one night a hopeless, forlorn drunkard, begging for a chance to get the mastery of himself and lead a better life. The chance was gladly given, and now that same man, who once stood by Stanley's side as an explorer in his African expedition, is again a man whom men respect, with a good name and a fine position.

Dr. Simmons, of the Newark Industrial Home for Men, said before the convention that he was such a bad man that his own uncle, who was a preacher of the Gospel, refused to recognize him. He opened his home with $7 in his pocket, and unlimited faith in God. The Home has so grown that Dr. Simmons has lodged 7,800 men since last May. Each man who enters must cut and saw an eighth of a cord of wood. His willingness or unwillingness to help himself determines a man's stay, and future opportunity of development of character. The Newark Industrial Home is supported by voluntary contributions, and also by the churches.

The Hudson County Jail Mission in Jersey city, has an interesting Superintendent in Mrs. Messler. The mission was organized four years ago in a bare, untenanted store in the worst part of the city. This mission aims to help and reclaim the most hardened and vicious specimens of depraved humanity. It is self-supporting. Ten of its reclaimed converts were baptized last month in the New York Bay, and it counted five converts at the end of its first month of official existence.

Mrs. Ballou the Superintendent of the Jerry McAuley Mission, told of her work among the prisoners of Sing Sing all last year. She visits them now each Sunday, and reads and sings and prays with them. She says it is an inspiration to her to look into the earnest, upturned faces of seven or eight hundred men listening to the Word of God, some of whom are manifestly sincere in their desire to lead better lives. "I shake hands with each man until my own hand and arm aches for a week after," said Mrs. Ballou when describing her weekly visits to Sing Sing. "These men come to me, to our home and our mission, when they are released, and we do what we can for them all."

The New York Rescue Band has several missions, and forty districts in which to carry on its work of reclaiming and rescuing women and girls from the street, and an evil life. One of the worst of these districts is in the heart of Chinatown, where the Doyer Street Mission is located. The object of this Mission is to reclaim the six hundred white girls who dwell in Chinatown, as the slaves and mistresses of Chinamen inhabiting this locality. To the betrayed girl out of employment, who has nowhere to hide her shamed face and aching heart, there are moments when opium offers relief. Such unfortunates sink into these Chinese dens of vice, and if the Chinaman is kind to her, she is apt to remain. The Doyer Street Mission reaches out for these women, and those who are known to the Bowery. H. A. Gould, Superintendent of the "Erring Girls' Industrial Home," 208 East 14th Street, made the statement that "in one night thirty-five girls were taken out of a cellar like rats in a hole," taken care of by the Rescue workers. "During last year," said Mr. Gould, "One hundred girls were taken out of these holes and put into the Industrial homes." A part of Mr. Gould's personal work is to visit the Jefferson Market Court on Sunday mornings, where, to prevent an accumulation of criminal cases, the Judge keeps open Court until mid-day, disposing of each case as rapidly and indifferently "as an auctioneer would sell articles of merchandise."

In this terrible place Mr. Gould finds from fifty to a hundred girls huddled together in the pen awaiting trial; many of them for their first offense. It is these poor girls, standing shoulder to shoulder with the worst criminals known on Blackwell's Island, that Mr. Gould goes to see and seek, and, if possible, save and reclaim.

The history of Charles Crittenden, and the thirty-two Homes and Missions founded by him and through him in the name and memory of his daughter Florence, are known throughout the entire United States. "Mother Prindle," of the New York Florence Mission, is also widely known and beloved by the women she has helped and saved by her tenderness, her sympathy, and her love, and trust in God and the higher nature of woman. The sweet, calm face and tender eyes of "Mother Prindle" show her to be a consecrated woman. For eighteen years she has given her love and heart and time to the saving of erring and unfortunate girls and women.

"I feel it a great privilege," said "Mother Prindle" in her address before the Christian Missionary and Alliance Convention, "to work in the rescue field. When I first undertook the work, I felt that it would not be possible for me to speak on the subject. But God has given me holy boldness to speak for those who dare not speak for themselves. There are two hundred and fifty thousand erring women in the United States to-day. Not because they love the life, but because the hearts of many of them are bleeding and dying for love! Because the man who promised to protect and care for the woman who loved him has cast her aside, has abused and insulted her, and finally thrust her upon the streets to die."

These are but a few of the testimonies of the power of Christ to save from sin and degradation, that were given at the Convention, and they awoke a responsive echo in that assembly. Songs of praise, and joyful thanks to God were given as the believers heard one and another telling how he was honoring and blessing their lives. There is no jealousy among such people, but all rejoice that by any instrumentality souls are being saved. As, at all other meetings of the Convention, the key note—"Jesus only," was the thought of all, and whether it was in his aspect as Saviour, Sanctifier, Healer, or Coming King, the members glorified him with full hearts.

Among the Star Worshipers. A Strange People in Mesopotamia with a Peculiar Creed and Weird Rites.

SOME interesting facts about a little-known people are published by R. S. M. Zwemer, F. R. G. S., in the current number of the "Missionary Review." Mr. Zwemer says:

In the towns along the lower Euphrates and Tigris, there dwell an interesting people variously known as Sabeans, Nasbeans, or St. John Christians. They call themselves Mandae (Mandaans), although only numbering four or five thousand, they yet have always been and remain entirely distinct from the Jews, Moslems and Christians among whom they have dwelt for centuries. Their origin is lost in obscurity, although traced in a measure to ancient Chaldeans.

Isolated by creed, cult, and language of their own, they love their isolation, and do not intermarry with strangers. Nearly all of them follow one of three traditions; they raise the finest dairy produce of Mesopotamia; they build a peculiar kind of light canoes called Mashhoff; and for rest are silversmiths.

A recently published translation of the sacred writings into German contains one-fourth of the "great book" of the Mandaeans. What is this great book? What does it teach? And what do they really believe? Although meeting beans for the past four years, and being their guest on frequent journeys up and down the rivers, I found no satisfactory answer to these questions from their lips. They turn to the North Star when they pray, and "baptize" every Sunday; these were the sole articles of faith that one could learn. Books gave fragments, and conflicting statements, all hinging around these two plain facts. According to one account they were gross idolaters; another classed them with Christians. Light dawned from an unexpected quarter. An anonymous article was recently published entitled "A Prayer-Meeting of the Star-Worshippers." Whoever wrote must be perfectly acquainted with the religious mysteries, or be one of the selves! Let me quote one paragraph only of this account:

"Toward midnight the Star-Worshippers men and women, come slowly down to the Mishkma by the river side. Each enters the tiny walled hut by the southern wall, disrobes and bathes in the circular reservoir. . . . On emerging from the water each one robes himself in the robe—that is, the ceremonial white garment. . . . crosses to the open space in front of the door of the tabernacle, and presents himself upon the ground, saluting the present with the customary 'Sood Halakh' ('blessing be upon thee'), and receiving the usual reply, 'The sacred body of Sidra Rabbia, is laid upon the altar.' A high priest takes one of the two pigeons handed to him, extends his hand towards the Polar Star, upon which he fixes his eyes, and lets the bird fly, calling aloud: 'In the name of the Living One, blessed be the primitive light, the ancient light, the Divinity self-created.' A kindles a charcoal fire in the earthenware stove by the side of the altar, and the other grinds small some of the barley brought by the deacon. He then presses some oil from the sesame seed, a mixing the barley meal and oil, prepares a mass of dough which he kneads and separates into small cakes. These are quickly thrust into the oven and bake. The fourth deacon now takes the pigeon left in the cage, cuts its throat quickly with a very sharp knife, taking care that no blood is lost. The little cakes are then brought to him by his colleagues, and still holding the dying pigeon, he strains neck over them in such a way that the small drops fall on each to form a cross. Amid the continued reading of the liturgy the cakes are carried around to the worshippers by the priests, who themselves pop them directly into the mouths of the members with the words, 'Marked be thou with the mark of the Living One.' Four deacons inside the Mishkma walk round to the rear of the altar and dig a little hole in which the pigeon is then buried."

What a mosaic of ceremonies! No wonder that Professor Kessler calls Mandaeism a most striking example of religious syncretism. Judaism, Islam, and Christianity engrafted on one old Chaldean trunk of Gnosticism, star-worship, baptisms, love feast, and sacrifice in one confusion.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic
for the Week Beginning November 8.
Acts 17: 16-31.

MANY are the aspects in which it would be profitable to view the question of the topic "What is the most interesting thing you know about foreign missions?" Whether we consider the wonderful progress they have made; the devotion of the missionaries who have given their lives to the work; the amount of money contributed by the Christian community for the expenses; the enthusiasm and fidelity of the converts from heathenism; or any other of the many grand features of the movement, there are innumerable points of interest presented. The fact of the position attained within a century of the birth of the missionary enterprise is in itself deeply interesting. In his recently published work on missions, the Rev. Delavan L. Leonard states that there are now more than twelve thousand stations in heathen lands where the gospel is preached, and that over five thousand men and as many women of European or American birth are now laboring in heathen lands to spread the gospel of Christ. Besides these, there are a great number of native helpers, who, having been saved from heathenism themselves, are aiding the missionaries in their efforts to extend the knowledge of salvation among their countrymen. These, Mr. Leonard believes, number fully forty thousand. Thus, at the end of the century, whose beginning witnessed the birth of the mission spirit, there are fully fifty thousand persons actually engaged in the work.

To this army of laborers must be added the vast number who have laid down their lives in the cause, and have gone to their reward. Scarcely any missionary sphere has been opened without the price of blood. In India, China, Africa, the South-sea-islands, and South America, men have died a martyr's death at the hands of the people whose salvation they sought. Many more have been killed by the deadly climate, and others have toiled on through longer life, and have passed away after seeing the fruit of their labors. Missionary heroism is a chapter of the world's history which has no parallel in all the wars of conquest that have ever been waged. Christ has been served with a courage and endurance and devotion that were never given to any earthly sovereign, and his kingdom has been extended by suffering and death willingly borne for his sake. Of the expenditure of money it is scarcely fitting to speak in this connection. Yet the church at home could tell of sacrifices made in the cause. Individuals and families have denied themselves that they might give money to the support of these heralds of the cross. The authority previously quoted estimates that exclusive of the gifts to Bible societies, which are actively engaged in missionary work of the most effective kind, there are fifteen million dollars a year given directly to missionary societies.

Of the results, any estimate in figures must necessarily be misleading. Dean Vahl gives the number of communicants as eleven hundred thousand, but that number does not include the children and young people who are being educated in Christian institutions, nor that very large class who are Christians at heart, but are held back from public confession by the restraints of government and social life.

PEACE.

If sin be in the heart.
The fairest sky is foul, and sad the summer weather.
The eye no longer sees the lambs at play together.
The dull ear cannot hear the birds that sing so sweetly.
And all the joy of God's good earth is gone completely.
If sin be in thine heart.
If peace be in thine heart.
The wildest winter storm is full of solemn beauty.
The midnight lightning flash but shows the path of duty.
Each living creature tells some new and joyous story.
The very trees and stones all catch a ray of glory.
If peace be in thine heart.

CHARLES FRANCIS RICHARDSON.

Thou Art My Friend.

THOU art my Friend, whatever befell me.
Thou art my Saviour, Helper, and Guide:
Gladly I go wherever thou call me—
Thou art my Friend—with thee I abide.
Thou art my Friend when sorrow shall smite me
Tribal may come, but trial shall cease:
Thou art my Friend, no ill shall fright me.
Thou art my Friend, to whisper of peace.
Thou art a Friend for hearts that are aching.
Bearing them balm for bitter distress:
And if the heart be nigh unto breaking,
Thou wilt be near to comfort and bless.
Thou art my Friend in time of temptation.
Thou art my Friend when foes shall annoy:
Thou art my blessed Rock of salvation.
Light of my life and source of my joy.
Thou art my Friend in holy endeavor.
Patience and wisdom ever to show:
Thou art my Friend, to love me forever.
Thou art my Friend, wherever I go.

A New View.

How One Minister Changed his Attitude Toward the Second Coming of the Lord.

BY REV. J. H. BROOKES, D.D.*

FRIENDS have asked me to print the story of my conversion to pre-millennial truth. During the first years of my ministry the subject had never occupied my attention. There was a vague and indefinite idea in my mind that after a long interval, probably many thousands of years, there would be a general resurrection, and a general judgment; even then there was no thought of our Lord's personal return to the earth. It was supposed that at some place, perhaps in the air, all would together, or one by one hear the sentence that must fix their eternal destiny.

At last a morning came when it was necessary to read the Book of Revelation in family worship. On that particular morning, discovering that the Book of Revelation was before us, some other place in the Bible was found. And when the family went out of the study, the question was put to my conscience and heart, "Why do you omit the last book God has given us?"

The reply made to myself was, "Because I do not understand it. The book is full of strange beasts and mysterious symbols, it does me no good." But did God make a mistake in putting that book into the canon of sacred Scripture? That it had a right there was as clear as the inspiration of John's Gospel, or the Epistle to the Romans, and after all might it not be my fault that it was so meaningless?

Convicted and condemned at the bar of my own conscience, I opened the book and read it straight through at a single sitting. My mind was engaged and interested in an unusual degree, and my attention was arrested by a statement in the very beginning—"Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein," Rev. 1: 3. It struck me that the Holy Ghost had said nothing about understanding it: but, "Blessed is he that readeth."

Then it occurred to me to commence with the Old Testament prophets and the whole of the New Testament, with a lead pencil in my hand, marking every passage and verse that bears upon the future of the church and the world. The four greater prophets and the twelve minor prophets together with the entire New Testament were carefully and prayerfully perused. Probably a month passed in the investigation, and not a single human book nor comment, nor exposition of any sort was touched.

Having gathered up the marked passages and brought them together, three conclusions were definitely reached. First, Jesus Christ is coming back to this world as truly, bodily, visibly, personally as that he was born in Bethlehem of Judea. Second, things shall not always remain as they are now, but "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more," Isa. 2: 4; "The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid," Isa. 11: 6; "The inhabitant shall not say, I am sick: the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity," Isa. 33: 24; "The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea," Hab. 2: 14. This glorious change shall not precede, but succeed that personal coming.

RUNNING THE GAUNTLET.

OR

THE SHIELD OF A CHRISTIAN MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

By W^m E. S. BAKER.

CHAPTER VIII.

It was during Mrs. Seymour's indisposition that Carrie and Milton, one bright afternoon in October, had their second interview in Fisher's grove, beneath the beech tree, upon the bark of which the initials of their names had been cut eight or ten years previously.

Carrie had been requested by her father to take some provisions and clothing to the family of a former workman at the Brookdale Mills, who had recently died, leaving a widow and six children penniless. They lived at a place called Crescentville, quite a distance to the southward, and George Browne, who was now a clerk in his uncle's factory, was engaged to drive the horses and accompany Carrie on her errand of mercy. Being very busy, and, perhaps, unselfishly thinking that the drive would benefit Milton Seymour, George asked his friend to take his place in the carriage; an arrangement which certainly gave great pleasure to Milton and Carrie, although it might not have been approved by her father, had he been consulted.

"Carrie, do you know where you are?" asked the young man, of the charming young woman by his side, after they had delivered the packages, and when the horses were gaily trotting homeward.

"I have not the faintest idea," replied Carrie. "But pray, do not get astray, as papa will be uneasy."

"Don't you fear, Carrie; I will take you safely home. Presently I will show you something which you have seen before. It was a long time ago, but I think you have not forgotten it."

A paper chase was in progress at the time, and several times Milton and his companion caught sight of the gay throng. They watched them for some time, and then slowly climbed the hill memorable to Milton as the scene of that Sunday-school picnic some eight years before.

Passing to the left, Milton and Carrie saw in the distance the old homestead, with its famous coffee-tree, and lovely boulevard of maples, and at last reached the spot Milton had been searching for. He helped Carrie to alight and pointed to the old beech tree, on which were the now distorted letters: "M. S.—C. W.," rudely cut in the bark.

"Carrie, will you renew the promise signified by those four letters," asked Milton, rather bluntly.

She blushed her deepest scarlet at his abrupt query, not knowing what further questions might follow, but, recalling the original agreement, after some hesitation, she replied:

"The promise is, that we let each other know, if we find a friend we think more of—yes, I renew that promise, heartily."

"Thank you, dear friend," said Milton, and taking out his knife, he again cut the bark, so as to improve the form and preserve the memory of the promise.

Hearing the distant applause of the multitude, Milton and Carrie turned to see what was the cause of the commotion. They found a large crowd gathered on the hillside to the mill race bank, where a splendid wood maple spread almost a celestial glow around them, as the lowering sun shot his golden rays through the crim-

"But papa seems to consider the sons of rich men as generally dissipated," replied Carrie.

"I am not sure that your father is altogether right in that, Carrie. Perhaps he has been unfortunate in the specimens he has seen. An old gentleman whom I know who has seen much of men in many lands, says that dissipation, vice, and crime are not confined to any class of people. Wherever the unsanctified heart has full sway, there wickedness abounds, whether in prince or peasant. Many children of wealthy parents have gone to destruction, because they were indulged with too much money, while many a child of poverty has met a similar fate from having too little money."

"But, Milton, doesn't the Bible say that money is the root of all evil?"

"No, Carrie, no; but it does say that the love of money is the root of all evil. There is in this world, nothing more God-like than to see a truly benevolent Christian unselfishly dispense a fortune; but even then the possession of wealth carries with it a fearful responsibility. On the other hand, there is nothing more debasing and corroding than wealth, unaccompanied with grace and wisdom. It almost invariably corrupts and destroys its possessor or his children. Besides, that gay and happy party of hunters are not all wealthy people. In this country a good moral character, taste, education, and politeness, will admit a person into the most favored circles. There may be, here and there, little coteries of exclusiveness, but generally speaking, wealth and brains are the American Shibboleth."

"But I have been told that all our great men descend from poor parents," said Carrie.

"It would be worth while to test that, Carrie, and you can easily do so," answered Milton. "In America we know all about people's origins. My own impression is that the truly great and good come from all conditions of life. The great middle class, who are the conservators of virtue and the bulwarks of society, furnish the larger proportion, because of superior numbers, of their virtuous habits, physical strength and self-reliance. But some of our most noble minds have sprung from the ranks of the wealthy, although to acquire their greatness they had to forego the ease and self-indulgence which frequently accompanies riches. Greatness is seldom rocked in the cradle of luxury."

"I cannot argue the question," said Carrie, "but I do not want to misjudge any class. I will certainly see whether I have not been unjust to the wealthy. But we must not stay any longer now, or papa will worry."

They returned to the carriage, and in a short time, like all other pleasant times, the delightful drive came to an end. Milton was looking happier and stronger than he had looked for many a day when he entered his home and greeted his mother. He found her in the midst of preparations for a sudden journey. The physicians had insisted for some weeks past on a change of air for their patient, and the opportunity for obeying had come. Patterson Green's parents, grateful for the attention Mrs. Seymour had shown their boy during his illness, had often pressed her to come and stay with them; and now, hearing of her wish for change of air, they had sent a more pressing invitation, which Mrs. Seymour resolved to accept without delay. She meant to leave on the following day, and with her characteristic energy, had set about her packing.

Just then, however, a messenger came to the party at the Seymour cottage. George Browne, Frank Blake, and a number of friends, had just arrived, and were waiting to speed to the widow and her son.

Before starting, Frank Blake showed signs of weakness, as he took Seymour's hand to shake "good-bye," for the tears started and rolled down the face of the tenderhearted but misguided youth. He knew that Seymour was his best friend, and felt sorry at parting with him; and after the carriage had started, Blake ran after it, and taking from his scarf a valuable diamond ring (a birthday gift just received from a wealthy, but eccentric maiden aunt, living in New York), threw it at Seymour, saying as he did so, "take it, old fellow, and keep it as a perpetual memento of our friendship. It's yours, by right, anyhow." He then ran away, without giving Milton an opportunity to reply.

The ring, which was admired very much, was a beautiful stone, and it blazed like a ball of light in the soft summer sunshine. Milton put it on and looked at it admiringly.

"Surely you do not intend to keep it?" said his mother.

"No longer than until the next time I see Blake. His feelings overcame him, and a noble sympathetic fellow he is, if he could only resist temptation and let liquor alone. The last time I saw him, he told me something about a handsome present which his Aunt Betsy would send me. Not knowing the lady, I was surprised to hear it. Perhaps he meant this diamond."

"Seymour, I'll bet a big apple," said Browne, "that Blake will go right off and get drunk, because he feels so lonesome."

"I don't bet; but really your prediction distresses me, George, and I sincerely hope it will not be realized."

"Well, it's so; and if he gave you his big diamond ring, just keep it, as he would not retain it a week, and he told me his aunt said it was your's anyhow. I know a strong temperance man who says that fellows who drink, make every occurrence an excuse for doing so. When hot, they drink to get cool, and when cold to get warm; when sick to get well, and when well to avoid sickness; when making money, and when they lose it; when in trouble, and when they are happy; when meeting a friend, and when parting with him; and a thousand other excuses. I suppose it's so. For my part I don't care for it, and I think you are the same, but I feel sorry for anyone who does."

At last, farewells and good wishes were all spoken, and mother and son were alone speeding swiftly toward Atlantic City, where Green's parents were then staying. Little was said between them on the way, for Mrs. Seymour, after the excitement of preparation, was suffering from depression. But a few days rest in the life-giving sear air did wonders for the invalid, and she was soon able to take regular walks on the beach.

The sight there was diverting and cheering, for the faces of the promenaders on the plank roadway were bright and happy. Never is this so marked as on the Saturday evenings when fathers and brothers and lovers who are detained by business through the week join the ladies by the sea for the Sunday. Mrs. Seymour and Milton were interested in observing these meetings, and stayed until the full moon rose and bathed the waves in silver sheen.

"There, mother, did you ever see a grander sight?" exclaimed Milton, rapturously. For half an hour previously the heavens had been aglow with a crimson light, as if coming from an immense conflagration. But now, as the moon advanced majestically and the red rays changed to a golden hue, and then again to a beautiful soft light, floated from the globe of light, down a long sparkling pathway for miles.

"Charming, my son, that fluttering reflection of the moonbeams on the sea, reminds me of Jacob's ladder, with its base at our feet, and its topmost round in the skies! This scene before us ought to draw our thoughts from earth, up to the Creator of all things, in Heaven."

Just then, and for a few minutes previously, Milton's thoughts had been busy with corporeal things. In front of them walked a gentleman of middle-life, with a lady upon his arm. He was a splendid specimen of humanity indeed, standing a head and shoulders above most of the promenaders; while the lady was also tall and graceful, but both were dressed plainly, although tastefully.

"Mother, dear, do you see that couple? I know them, as there is but one lady in the world who has such a neck and shoulders; that young lady is Nellie Price."

There was a refreshing, brisk sea breeze blowing as usual this evening, and it carried Milton's words directly to Nellie. She turned her queenly head, and, as the moon shone directly upon the Seymours, recognized them at once.

"Ah!" said Nellie, laughing heartily. "What unexpected pleasure is this, dear Mrs. Seymour," and leaving her father she first shook hands with Milton, and by the time Mr. Price turned, had covered Mrs. Seymour's face with warm kisses which her loving nature and a sincere affection inspired.

The introductions were soon over, and the party again fell in line, and move, along with the human current; but as Milton and Nellie kept up a continual fire of talk, her father, probably at her suggestion, offered his arm to Mrs. Seymour, which left Milton and Nellie to themselves. They improved the opportunity to the best advantage; and if there is anything in this world calculated to arouse interest in each other, or to develop the latent passions and affections of the heart, it is for a gentleman and lady to take their first stroll together along the seashore under a full moon.

We need not draw up the curtain and expose secrets, but will briefly say that eleven o'clock found Mrs. Seymour in her room, at Green's cottage, with the window open to admit the health-giving air, as she looked out upon the moonlit sea, which reminded her of that "pure river of water of life, clear as crystal." Then her thoughts went from the glorious scene, to that "city, built of pure gold, like unto clear glass, * * * which had no need of the sun, neither of the moon." She was better and happier than for months past, and soon slept sweetly.

The same hour found Mr. Price comfortably asleep in his room at the United States Hotel; while Milton and Nellie stood at the entrance of the ball room of the same, looking in at the hundreds of people, who were seeking pleasure in the mazes of the giddy dance. The full blaze of gaslight revealed to Milton for the first time, that Nellie had grown out of girlhood to be a graceful young woman, beautiful in feature, and charming in manner. The absence of useless finery and jewelry showed that Mr. Price had probably forbidden Nellie to wear them: she had never worn so much as a finger ring; but this evening, on the finger of her left hand, shone in all its oriental splendor, little Frank Blake's diamond. It had not, however, been given to her, and no significance attached to wearing the jewel.

With many adieus, plans, hopes and promises for the coming week, the young people separated before midnight; Nellie to blissful dreams of her first affection for a fascinating young man, which was surely creeping into her heart, and Milton, to excite himself all night over divers heroic and impossible feats of dream-land, performed for the comfort and protection of "beautiful Nellie;" while poor, little, faithful, loving Carrie Walter, stood in tears looking on.

The Sabbath dawned upon the seaside city, and found its handful of native inhabitants swelled to fifteen thousand people. The morning was cloudy and dull, and an easterly wind was blowing, which might increase to a gale before evening. The Seymours were out of doors long before they could find anybody stirring, as an early hour, either in retiring or rising, is not considered a cardinal virtue at watering-places. The usual time of commencing public worship passed by, and found many still in their beds, sleeping off the effects of the previous night's dissipation, and as the bells rang out their lively calls to worship, less than five hundred persons, or about one in thirty, attended service in the different churches—a melancholy comment upon the neglect of sacred duties, by even true followers of Christ, when away from home influences. Mrs. Seymour and her son were on their way to church when Milton informed his mother that Miss Price would go, too, if they called for her. Mrs. Seymour cheerfully consented, being evidently disposed to encourage her son's intimacy with the handsome girl, although for years previously she never seemed so happy, as when thinking of the affection existing between Carrie Walter and Milton; but for reasons only known to herself, she had changed her mind.

Requests for Prayer.

AT the Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Oct. 11, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

For the Conversion of Relatives and Friends.

Widow, Shamokaway, Wash., begs Christians to unite with her in pleading for the conversion of her six wayward sons, who are unconcerned about their eternal interests.—"Trusting Young Heart," that a very dear friend may soon be converted and that father and brother may give their hearts to Christ.—Firm Believer, Conway, Mo., for the conversion of a son, who does not love his home and is given to roaming; also that a mother-in-law, who is a slave of strong drink, may be delivered and made a new creature in Christ.—Subscriber, Williamsburg, O., on behalf of a young man, who is rapidly going the downward road, that he might be delivered from evil habits and evil companions and become a child of God.—T. J. M., Round Top, Pa., for the conversion of a man of remarkable ability, who might do distinguished work for God, but is doing nothing in his service and is not a Christian.—Believer, Denver, Mo., that a son, who is deluded by designing persons and has deserted his family, may be led to see the error of his way, and may turn to the Lord for pardon and be led to Christ. His Christian mother is praying for him night and day.—Anxious Mother, Bram, Ont., for the conversion of a son, who is in danger of going to ruin through drink.—Anxious Mother, Milton, Ont., that a son, who in Chicago exposed to strong temptation, may be led to Christ, and have grace given to him to lead a godly life.—Anxious Mother, La., for a dear son, who once made a profession of Christ, but has been led into sin by a tempter in whose presence he is powerless to resist the evil, but God can deliver him and his other entreats prayer on his behalf.—M. T., Waseca, Minn., that God would change the heart of a son, who is getting wild, and does not agree with his family, and seems to be going to ruin.—Anxious Sister, Newark, N. J., that her brother, who is fatherless and motherless, might give his heart to God and be kept from sin.—Anxious Mother, Rochester, N. Y., that a dear son may feel his need of Christ and seek him with all his heart; he is only one of the family out of Christ.—Anxious Mother, Worcester, Mass., that a son may abandon his bad habits and become a Christian.—Burdened One, Ambler, Pa., for the conversion of her husband, who has come from home and under the influence of wicked people, that God in his mercy would use him to a sense of his danger and give him a new heart.—J. A. B., Farmer, N. Y., that a brother-in-law, who is in urgent need of God's converting grace, may have his eyes opened to the evil of sin, and be led to Christ for pardon and deliverance from an infatuation which is ruining him and making his family miserable.—Widowed Mother, Norton, N. Y., that her family may be truly converted and live godly lives.—Reader, Bethel, N. Y., that a dear friend, who has fallen under bad influence may be delivered, and may go to Christ for help to become a child of God.—Burdened Mother, Pulteney, N. Y., for the conversion of her only son, and that his whole life may be consecrated to the Lord.—K., Chicago, that God in his mercy would look on his beloved husband, and give him a new heart and grace to resist all evil.—Believer, that a dear son, who has strayed away from God, may be brought back and may give himself unreservedly to Christ.—J. R., Clayton, Ala., for the conversion of a mother and two brothers.—Reader, Selma, Ala., for the conversion of husband and sons, who do not believe in Christ or feel a concern about the conversion of their souls.—Reader, London, Ont., that two families who are leading a most unhappy life might have grace to turn to Christ for salvation and be enabled to live in peace.—Believer, Marshall, Minn., that an aged man who is utterly indifferent to religion may be converted to God and of his need of a Saviour and give himself to the Lord; also that a man and his wife, who seem to be almost beyond hope, might be brought through the mighty power of the Holy Spirit to seek salvation through Christ.—S. D., San Francisco, that a beloved daughter might be led to seek salvation, and may be protected in her very trying circumstances.—E. L. B., Alton, Pa., for the conversion of her husband, and that he may be delivered from his besetting sins of drink and profanity.—J. S., Couteau, B. C., that a young man now grown to maturity without giving himself to Christ, may all be brought by the power of the Holy Spirit to seek the Lord.

For the Restoration of Health. Subscriber, Altoona, Pa., who has a young family depending on him for support, that God in his mercy would restore him to health.—Reader, London, C., that an afflicted mother and daughter may be raised up if it be the Lord's will.—Reader, Cayuga Co., N. Y., that her husband, who is very sick, might be healed by the Great Physician.—J., Chicago, Ill., for recovery from sore sickness.—Troubled One, La Fayette, Ala., for the complete restoration of health.—C. L. C., Philadelphia, Pa., that an affliction which is blighting the lives of a mother and daughter may be removed.—Distressed Mother, Monroe, Me., on behalf of a demented son, that Christ would cure him as he cured the maniac when on earth.—Sister, Millersburg, Pa., that a dear brother who is greatly distressed may be healed in body and mind.—D. M. B., Crescent City, Fla., that an active Christian worker, whose usefulness is being hindered by his deafness, may recover his sense of hearing.—Believer, Wynnewood, Ind. Ter., that God would restore her equanimity and relieve her from the nervous affliction which is distressing her.—S. P. R., Fayetteville, N. Y., for the recovery of a dear friend who is deranged.—W. P. O., Arcadia, La., who has a wife and six children depending on him for support, that he may be healed of nervous prostration and be enabled to provide for his family.

For Special Blessings. Troubled One, La Fayette, Ala., that God would remove from her life, something which hinders consistency and usefulness.—Believer, Lond., Ont., that a body of Christians may receive help to erect a plain building for the worship of God.—A. B., Big Bend, Wash., for grace to overcome an unruly temper.—Friend, Hudson, Mass., that a dear friend who has long been out of employment, may be able to get work soon.—Distressed One, Averett, Va., that God in his great mercy would avert an impending calamity.—H. M. G., Marshall, Minn., that a family of professing Christians may have grace given them to lead a more consistent life.—Suffering Mother, San Antonio, Tex., that her sons may, in their new surroundings, get their letters of transfer to a new church, and lead consistent Christian lives.—Believer, that her husband may be delivered from the bondage of the tobacco habit, also that her daughter's family might be provided for in their great need.—Reader, Bethel, N. Y., that a bereaved family may look to God in their extremity, and may be comforted and have all their needs supplied.—Sister, Elkton, Va., that her son who is a professing Christian may have grace given to him to live a consistent Christian life.—Reader, Lyman, Neb., that a beloved one who is alienated may be reconciled to one who grieves over his absence.—Grateful Friend, Newtonville, Mass., that God would interpose to avert an almost intolerable injustice.—E. S., Fairbury, Neb., that farmers who have lost their crops, might in some way be helped in their extremity, and may be enabled to live and support their families.—S. C. R., Union Grove, Wis., that a poor and aged minister of the Gospel may find a home where he will have opportunities to work for Christ.—One in Trouble, Boston, Mass., who is in sore affliction through business depression and who has a family dependent upon him, that God would in mercy send him such financial aid as will relieve his embarrassment, and give him a measure of former prosperity.

Found Christ as She Went.

B. Fay Mills, the well-known evangelist, relates this beautiful instance of saving faith: A young lady was very much concerned about her spiritual interest, and after a severe struggle started to visit her

We know that Cod-liver Oil is a fat-forming food because takers of it gain rapidly in weight under its use and the whole body receives vital force. When prepared as in Scott's Emulsion, it is quickly and easily changed into the tissues of the body. As your doctor would say, "it is easily assimilated." Perhaps you are suffering from fat starvation. You take fat enough with your food, but it either isn't the right kind, or it isn't digested. You need fat prepared for you, as in Scott's Emulsion.

pastor to ask him to show her the way of life. As she entered the horse-car, in carrying out her purpose, she saw seated there several of her friends, who asked where she was going. The tempter immediately said, "Don't tell them where you are going, but answer them in some evasive way." At the same time the Spirit whispered to her: "Be brave and conscientious about this. Tell them of your purpose, and ask them to go with you." She obeyed the latter voice. Her friends declined to accompany her, and she went alone. When she came to the minister's house he came to the door to meet her. She paused from embarrassment for an instant, and then said: "Doctor! I started to come to see you to ask you to lead me to Christ; but now that I am here I have come to tell you I have found him on the way as I came."

Lost Girls of The Bowery.

Ms. Bird's Effort to Reach and Rescue Them—A Gospel Tea Service for Women at The Bowery Mission.

AN "Afternoon Tea" in the Bowery Mission. Just think of it! But that is just what has taken place; for the writer was present at the initiatory Tea, and can testify to the innovation.

know that "Five O'Clock Teas" have been the fashion in select circles of society, but seldom elsewhere. New and common as the fact may seem, it is really true, that the afternoon of Saturday, October 17, 1896, saw the same pleasant social feature inaugurated in the Bowery Mission.

Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, the "Mother of the Bowery Mission," and the beloved worker Christ among the lost men and boys that great, wicked thoroughfare, was the leader in the new departure. She had long had in mind a special Woman's Meeting to take place once a week at the rooms of the Mission. Dr. Klopsch fully approved her plans.

Thursday and Sunday meetings for men already established features of the mission, through which many a wanderer has been drawn from a wicked life, to testify to the saving power of Jesus. But there are throngs of women—poor, suffering, sinning women and girls—to reach, and the Bowery Mission now stretches out its hands to these also, with welcome intention. The Mission's proximity to Chinatown, where hundreds of American girls in twelve years and upward, lead lives of pain and shame, has been a great incentive to throw open its doors one day in the week, with the hope that women and girls who pass and repass to their homes in that black spot, may be induced to stop at the center, and perhaps be reclaimed.

We want to start weekly meetings in the Bowery for women and girls, because we think much good can be done," said Mrs. Bird, during her afternoon talk. And because the movement may be the means of saving others who have erred, as many of you who are now present, have been saved. We especially want to reach the young girls of the neighborhood to our meetings. We want them while they are young, so that they can be trained to serve God, and save their companions, perhaps their fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters. We want every girl twelve years and over, to feel that their doors are open especially for her, one afternoon in each week. We want her to feel that we love her, and that we are here to call we can to lead her to the love of God, and a pure life. This is a wonderful work for us, I believe. I never thought that a Woman's Meeting and Mission could be held in this place, surrounded by rough, wicked men; in this room now consecrated to work, and which was once a dance hall, and a godless place! But your presence here to-day, your sympathy, interest, and courage in coming, all show that the work we wanted to do, the work of women and for the women in this place, has already begun, and in a spirit and way that make me feel strong in the belief that God is with us, and will bless our undertaking and our prayers."

In addition to many other young women who were present at the first "Tea Drink and Gospel Service," there were thirty or more young girls from Chinatown, the eldest of whom was scarcely seen. Many were old and faded in appearance, though young in years, dirty and unwashed, but the eyes of all shone with interest, and in a short while the song books were all opened and the voices of the thirty rang out sweetly in the chapel hymns. The sight of those young girls from Chinatown stirred the soul of the Christian mothers and daughters present. One after another arose and appealed directly to the hearts of the gathering, who had entered the Mission hall attracted by the singing, the lights, and the music. "You are each of you God's own child," said Mrs. Bird, "and I want you to come and see us every Saturday afternoon. We will try to teach you how to love God, and to grow up to be good women."

Interesting and helpful testimonies were given by saved women. Such life's histories! And they came from the lips of sweet-faced, comely young women, who had been rescued at the peril of their souls and the souls of others. One frail-looking girl, with delicate face and modest bearing, stood and confessed her love for strong drink acquired through sinful habits. She begged the prayers of the Mission to help her overcome her horrible thirst. Another, of older years, made a passionate appeal to the young girls from Chinatown and declared that she stood there saved, through God's grace, from her own evil desires and love of intoxicating drink. Many others spoke in a similar touching strain.

After the meeting was over, a social hour followed in which hot tea and cake were served to all present, seventy or eighty in number, including the young girls from Chinatown. Several solos were sung by the girls present, and many brilliant-hued autumn leaves and big chrysanthemums, brightened with a touch of crimson and gold the platform and desk now consecrated to God, and the efforts of Christian women, to secure and save their sad and erring sisters.

Church Education in Syria.

A missionary letter from Beirut, to the Y. M. C. A. of New York City, contains the following: "Every year the Protestant Syrian College sends forth a dozen or so qualified men to the mission field to preach or teach their countrymen, and many of them have proved to be eminent leaders in the Syrian army of evangelization. Some thirty years ago the students of the American High School of Abeih held the leadership and effected a great part of the evangelization of Syria and gained many victories for the Syrian Mission. At present our college, with several High schools in Beirut, Sidon, Tripoli and Suk-el-Gharb continue to send forth annual reinforcements to furnish and maintain a larger army of Syrian evangelists. This force is put under the direction of the American missionaries, whose reports contain the blessed results and outcome of its actions and proceedings. Educational centres alone could furnish such a strong army. These centres have gained more souls for Christ. No educated Syrian youth, though he be a non-believer, could keep his trust in the erroneous and misleading teachings of his native church or sect. Education alone and the scientific light it gives are sufficient to create in him a distrust of the religious teachings and superstitions of his old faith, no matter how intense his former conviction may have been. These facts and others of my experience in this land, and other mission lands makes me believe that education is one of the chief and indispensable factors in the evangelization of the world. Most of our students are unable to pay their whole college fees, so we do not expect them to send help and missionary aid to foreign lands. But we train them, and rejoice to see them earnest and well devoted to their mission."

A Hindu Fakir's Hymn.

In the report of the work of a native evangelist of the London Missionary Society in India, the following instructive experience is related: As the evangelist was one day visiting a country district, he saw a Vishnuvite mendicant approaching and supposed that, according to the habit of men of his class, he was going about among the houses and shops with his instrument singing hymns of praise of Vishnu. For such service these mendicants usually receive from the people a small gift.

But as this man drew near, and began to sing, the evangelist was astonished to find him singing a Christian hymn instead of one in praise of the Hindu God. It seems that the man had bought a little book of Christian hymns, and they pleased him and his hearers so much, that now as he went his rounds, he was singing them in place of his old Vishnuvite hymns. He was also reading to his small audiences a translation of an English tract, entitled, "The Mine of Salvation."

The most interesting feature of this incident is the fact that the people welcomed the Christian utterances rather than the Hindu, even when uttered by one who knew not the full meaning of the words he sang.

MARAH.

GOD sends us bitter that the sweet.
By absence known, may sweeter prove;
As dark for light, as cold for heat
Brings greater love.

God sends us bitter, us to show
He can both sweet and bitter send:
That both the might and love we know
Of our great Friend.

He sends us bitter, lest too gay
We wreath around our heads the rose,
And count our right what heaven each day
As alms bestows.

He openeth our eyes to see
(Eyes that our pride of heart had sealed)
The sweetness of life's heavenly tree,
And grief is healed.

And lo, before us in the way
We view the fountains and the palms,
And drink, and pitch our tents, and stay
Singing sweet psalms.

NEPHRITIC COLIC.

WM. C. WILE, A.M., M.D., LL.D., of Danbury, Conn., reports the following (New England Medical Monthly, December 15, 1888): "In a recent outbreak of NEPHRITIC COLIC in our own person, the attack, under the treatment of Buffalo Lithia Water, was speedily cut short, the stones quickly passed, and the debris which followed showed a thorough cleansing of the kidneys and bladder of all foreign substances. All of the distressing symptoms and sequelae were promptly relieved, and we feel under a deep debt of gratitude to this most excellent Water for wonderful relief."

CONVERSION.*

WE may think of a father intent upon the happiness and success of a beloved son. In his own mind he has already fixed upon a plan for the life of the lad. He desires him to enter a certain vocation. To secure this he brings to bear all possible influences upon his son's mind and heart. He fits his education with the cherished object in view. He speaks favorably of the profitable trade or profession. He watches the aptitudes and tendencies, and strives to guide them in the desired direction. His wish and effort is to mould the young man into that form which satisfies his own mind. In due time the son comes of age. He must enter upon his life's work. To his father's great joy he chooses that vocation upon which the father had set his heart. In thus choosing, the young man is conscious of no constraint upon his will. His decision is left with himself, and he makes his choice, and enters upon his accomplishment. And now he learns that this has been his father's will concerning him from the beginning. He discovers that parental love all along has guided his young life to the very result which appears in his own free choice. What is his feeling? Certainly one of loving gratitude that he was not left to his youthful impulses in choosing his life. And as he grows in years, and becomes more fully satisfied with his chosen path, he will more deeply appreciate the wisdom and wisdom which denied him the freedom of unbridled inclinations, and secured to him the true liberty of his desires. And if asked who chose him this way, he will reply, "My father chose it for me. I chose it myself." Such an event, which has occurred substantially thousands of times, fairly illustrates the bearing of God's choice of us upon our choice of him. We have only to remember that God's choice is eternal, and his resources for shaping our course are finite. The earthly father might not securely secure his end; the heavenly Father cannot fail. Having chosen he guides events to the accomplishment of his will. His choice becomes the sinner's act, and that is conversion. There is no act; there is man's act. There is no grace; there is free will. It is not necessary to try to "reconcile" these two things. They are harmonized in the experience of every converted heart. Do not roam the one from the house-top and the other in the closet. Each is only true. Each rests upon incontestable evidence. The Christian is conscious of the freely chosen God at the time of his conversion. He is just as conscious that nothing was done in him at the time when he did not do. These two pillars upon one foundation and support the roof of his hope. Do we then fully comprehend that change in the soul's life which we call conversion? No more than we comprehend the soul itself. Fully explain your conversion and you never were converted. Neither can we comprehend the height of day and the sight of the eyes. But we know what it is to see. Results we comprehend. And we know that this is what we name conversion has been effected through the action of God's will in our own.

The Choice of Books; a Fable.*

THE more and more useless to try to read all books. As Holmes has said, we might as well try to race with a locomotive as with the modern printing press. On an shake hands and say a word to every one he meets along a country road, but in a city. Literature was once like the country, but is now like a metropolis. But we go at once to the great books and master them, we shall in a measure be masters of all other books. If we have seen Niagara, we have seen the essence of all cataracts. If we have seen the big trees of California, we do not need to go to visit smaller trees. If we have been in a storm at sea, no other storm can teach as much. If we have heard Webster or Demosthenes, we have heard the best that any orator can say. When we are masters of Milton and Browning, a few glances will give us all that we need from a lesser poet. Great books are like great cities. As London contains more Irishmen than Dublin, and more Scotchmen than Edinburgh, and more Jews than Palestine, so Shakespeare contains more lyric beauty than Shelley, more of historic interest than Scott, more knowledge of the human heart than Browning, though these, too, are great. When we are masters of a book that has been the seed of a new literature, we are masters largely of that literature, and more broadly when we are masters of the book that has been the seed of a new civilization.

But beyond dispute the greatest of all books is the Bible. Each year this book towers up more emphatically into supreme importance. The more sin and evil accumulate as a present fact or as a record, the more valuable do the great remedial principles in this book become. As the details of life increase and become multitudinous, the importance of the general principles in the Bible increases. Whatever adds to the sweetness or brilliancy or blessedness of life adds to the value of the Bible.

In the Arabian Nights we read of a princess who, having heard of three wonderful objects, a talking bird that could reason, a singing tree every leaf of which made delicious music, and a yellow water which when put in a dish could rise of itself and form a cooling fountain twenty feet high, was pining away with longing to possess them. In order to gratify her, her two brothers, having discovered after long search the hill on which these objects were, proceeded in turn to ascend it. A host of demons gathered behind them, and shouted threats and insults. On turning about to face these demons, they were turned into stones as had been the fate of multitudes of others before them in making the same attempt. The sister, more unhappy than ever, resolved to attempt the achievement herself, and what manly strength and courage had failed to do, feminine ingenuity succeeded in accomplishing. For putting some wax in her ears, she safely reached the top of the hill, and there possessed herself of the three treasures. The talking bird told her that if she would sprinkle some of the yellow water on the stones on the hillside, they would all change back into men. Under the magic touch, up sprang princes in full armor, the brave and handsome of many ages, and among them to her infinite delight her lost brothers. The final scene has a chief meaning to us here. The hillside covered with stones is a bookcase full of books. The princess sprinkling water on the enchanted stones and causing them to spring up living men and brothers, is that faculty of man, part of the divine breath breathed into him at the beginning, a spiritual imagination, which changes books from lumps of matter to breathing, thinking, human beings. It causes the fraternal essence of printed fact and story to stand out alive, and enables us to clasp it to ourselves in a tie as of one blood and one soul, and to face the world with a fuller creative power.

New Cure for Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.—Free to All Readers.

All readers will be glad to know that the new botanical discovery, Alkavis, has proved an assured cure for all diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or by disordered action of the kidneys or urinary organs. It is a wonderful discovery, with a record of 1200 hospital cures in 30 days. It acts directly upon the blood and kidneys, and is a true specific, just as quinine is in malaria. We have the strongest testimony of many ministers of the gospel, well known doctors and business men cured by Alkavis, when all other remedies had failed. Many ladies also testify to its curative powers in disorders peculiar to womanhood. So far the Church Kidney Cure Company, No. 478 Fourth Avenue, New York are the only importers of this new remedy, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the kidneys or urinary organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. It is sent to you entirely free, to prove its wonderful curative powers

THE CHANT OF THE STARS.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., } "Who laid the corner-stone thereof, when on the Text: Job 38: 6, 7: } the morning stars sang together."

WE have all seen the ceremony at the laying of the corner-stone of church, asylum, or Masonic temple. Into the hollow of the stone were placed scrolls of history and important documents, to be suggestive if, one or two hundred years after, the building should be destroyed by fire or torn down. We remember the silver trowel or iron hammer that smote the square piece of granite into sanctity. We remember some venerable man who presided wielding the trowel or hammer. We remember also the music as the choir stood on the scattered stones and timber of the building about to be constructed. The leaves of the note-books fluttered in the wind, and were turned over with a great rustling, and we remember how the bass, baritone, tenor, contralto, and soprano voices commingled. They had for many days been rehearsing the special programme, that it might be worthy of the corner-stone laying.

In my text the poet of Uz calls us to a grander ceremony—the laying of the foundation of this great temple of a world. The corner-stone was a block of light and the trowel was of celestial crystal. All about and on the embankments of clouds stood the angelic choristers unrolling their librettos of overture, and other worlds clapped shining cymbals while the ceremony went on, and God the architect, by stroke of light after stroke of light, dedicated this great cathedral of a world, with mountains for pillars, and sky for frescoed ceiling, and flowering fields for a floor, and sunrise and midnight aurora for upholstery. "Who laid the corner-stone thereof, when the morning stars sang to-

The fact is that the whole universe was a complete cadence, an unbroken dithyramb, a musical portfolio. The great sheet of immensity had been spread out, and written on it were the stars, the smaller of them minims, the larger of them sustained notes. The meteors marked the staccato passages, the whole heavens a gamut with all sounds, intonations, modulations, the space between the worlds a musical interval, trembling of stellar light a quaver, the thunder a bass clef, the wind among trees a treble clef. That is the way God made all things a perfect harmony.

But one day a harp string snapped in the great orchestra. One day a voice that had been the one clear, unobscured, harsh and terrific, grated upon the glorious antiphon. It was sin that made the dissonance, and that harsh discord has been sounding through the centuries. All the work of Christians and philanthropists and reformers of all ages is to stop that discord and get all things back into the path of harmony.

My dear friends, I have been talking to you this morning about sin. I have told you that it is a terrible thing, and I have made it plain that sin is discord and righteousness harmony. That, in general, things are out of tune is as plain as to a musician's ear is the unhappy clash of sweep upon neighborhoods and cities. Where you find one person with sound throat and keen eyesight, and alert ear and easy respiration, and regular pulsation and supple limb, and prime digestion and steady nerves, you find a hundred who have to be very careful because this or that or the other physical function is disordered.

The human intellect out of tune: the judgment wrongly swerved or the memory leaky or the will weak or the temper inflammable, the well-balanced mind exceptional.

Domestic life out of tune: only here and there a conjugal outbreak of incompatibility of temper through the divorce courts, or a filial outbreak about a father's will through the surrogate's court, or a case of wife-beating or husband-poisoning through the criminal courts, but thousands of families with June outside and January within. Society out of tune: labor and capital, their hands on each other's throat. Spirit of caste keeping those down in the social scale who are struggling to get up, and putting those who are up in anxiety lest they have to come down. No wonder the old piano of society is all out of tune, when hypocrisy and lying, and subterfuge, and double-dealing, and sycophancy, and charlatanism, and revenge, have for six thousand years been banging away at the keys and stamping the pedals.

On all sides there is a shipwreck of harmonies. Nations in discord without realizing it; so wrong is the feeling of nation for nation that symbols chosen are fierce and destructive. In this country, where our skies are full of robins and doves and morning larks, we have our national symbol the fierce and filthy eagle, as cruel a bird as can be found in all the ornithological catalogues. In Great Britain, where they have lambs and fallow deer, their symbol is the merciless lion. In Russia, where from between her frozen North and blooming South all kindly beasts dwell, they chose the growling bear; and in the world's heraldry a favorite figure is the dragon, the fabled winged serpent, ferocious and dreadful. And so fond is the world of contention that we climb out through the heavens and baptize one of the other planets with the spirit of battle and call it Mars, after the god of war, and we give to the eighth sign of the zodiac the name of the scorpion, a creature which is chiefly celebrated for its deadly sting. But, after all, these symbols are expressive of the way nation feels towards nation. Discord wide as the continent and bridging the seas.

I suppose you have noticed how warmly in love dry-goods stores are with other dry-goods stores, and how highly grocery-men think of the sugars of the grocery-men on the same street. And in what a cultured and elegant disputation and homoeopathic doctors speak of each other, and how ministers will sometimes put ministers on that beautiful cooking instrument which the English call a spit, an iron roller with spikes on it, and turned by a crank before a bonfire, and soon if the minister being roasted cries out against it, the men who are turning him say: "Hush, my brother, we are turning the spit for the glory of God and the good of your soul, and need not be upset, while we turn the spit for you."

have heard what is called the "Anvil chorus," composed by Verdi, a tune played by hammers, great and small, now by mighty stroke, and now with heavy stroke, beating a great iron anvil. That is what the world has got to come to—the anvil chorus, yard-stick chorus, shuttle chorus, trowel chorus, crowbar chorus, rake chorus, gold-mine chorus, railroad chorus, locomotive chorus. It can be done, and it will be done. So all social life will be attuned by the Gospel harp. There will be as many classes in society now, but the classes will not be regulated by birth, or wealth, or accident, but the scale of virtue and benevolence, and people will be assigned to their places of good, or very good, or most excellent. Also, commercial life will be attuned, and there will be twelve in every dozen, sixteen ounces in every pound, and scales at the bottom of the barrel will be as sound as those on the top, and silk will not be cotton, and sellers will have to charge honest people more for the right price because others will not pay, and goods will come to you corresponding with the sample by which you purchased them, and coffee will not be chicoried, and sugar will not be sanded, and milk will not be chalked, and adulteration of food will be a State prison offense. All things shall be attuned. Election in England and the United States will no more be a grand carnival of defecation and scurrility, but the elevation of virtuous men in a righteous way.

In the sixteenth century the singers called the Fischer Brothers reached the low compass ever recorded, and the highest ever trilled was by La Bastardella, and Catalini's voice had a compass of three and a half octaves; but Christianity is ever wonderful, for it runs all up and down the greatest heights and the deepest depths of the world's necessity, and it will encompass everything and bring it in accord with the song which the morning stars sang at the laying of the world's cornerstone. All the sacred music in homes, and concert halls, and churches tends towards the consummation. Make it more and more hearty. Sing in your families. Sing in your places of business. If we with proper spirit use these faculties, we are reaching for the skies.

Heaven is to have a new song, an entirely new song, but I should not wonder if, sometimes on earth a tune is fashioned out of many tunes, or it is one tune with variations, so some of the songs of the redeemed may have playing through them the songs of earth; and how thrilling, coming through the great anthem of the saved, accompanied by harpers with the harps, and trumpeters with their trumpets, if we should hear some of the strains of Antioch, and Mount Pisgah, and Lebanon, and Lenox, and St. Martin's, and Fountain, and Ariel, and Old Hundred. How they would bring to mind the singing circles, and communion days, and the Christmas festivals, and the church fellowship in which on earth we mingled! We have no idea that when we bid farewell to each other we are to bid farewell to all these old Gospel hymns, which melted and captured our souls for so many years. If sin is discord, and righteousness is harmony, let us get out of the one and into the other. After our dreadful civil war was over, in the summer of 1869, a national peace jubilee was held in New York, and as an elder of my church had been honored by the selection of some of the music, to be rendered on that occasion, I accompanied him to the jubilee. Forty thousand people sat and stood in the great hall erected for that purpose. Thousands of wind and stringed instruments, and thousands of trained voices. The masses of pieces of all ages rendered, hour after hour, and day after day—Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," Spohr's "Last Judgment," Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," Haydn's "Creation," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Meyerbeer's "Coronation March," and on and on up in surges that billowed against the heavens. The mighty cadences within were accompanied on the outside by the ringing of the bells of the city and cannon on the commons, discharged by electricity, in exact time with the music, thundering their awful bars of a harmony that astounded all nations. Sometimes I bowed my head and wept. Sometimes I stood up in the enchantment, and sometimes the effect was so overpowering I felt I could not endure it, especially when all the voices were in full chorus, and all the batons were in full wave, and all the orchestra in full triumph, and a hundred anvils under mighty hammers were in full clang, and all the towers of the city rolled in their majestic sweetness, and the whole building quaked with the boom of thirty cannon. Parepa Rosa, with a voice that will never again be equalled on earth until the archangelic voice proclaims that time shall be no longer, rose above all other sounds in her rendering of our national air, "The Star-Spangled Banner." It was too much for a mortal, quite enough for an immortal to hear, and, while some fainted, one woman only spirit released under its power, sped away to be with God.

O Lord, our God, quickly usher in the whole world's peace jubilee, and all islands of the sea join the five continents, and all the voices and all the musical instruments of all nations combine, and all the organs that ever sounded requiem of sorrow sound only a grand march of joy, and all the bells that tolled for burial ring for resurrection, and all the cannon that ever hurled death across the nations sound forth eternal victory, and over all the acclaim of earth and minstrelsy of heaven there will be heard one voice sweeter and mightier than any human or angelic voice, a voice once full of tears, but now full of triumph, the voice of Christ, saying, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last." Then, at the laying of the top-stone of the world's history, the same voices shall be heard as when, at the laying of the world's corner-stone, "the morning stars sang together."

Homeless on the Streets.

The Misery Caused by Evictions Among the Poor of the New York Tenements. Two Typical Tenement Localities.

HOMELSS and homeless! The words convey a sense of misery and wretchedness that makes the reader shudder, yet they describe the actual condition of many poverty-stricken families in the tenement districts of the great metropolis. Hardly a day passes that does not witness the infliction of the cruel summary process that follows the service of a "dispossess warrant" on some wretched household to whom prosperity and plenty have been strangers. Indeed, the tenure of the poor in their meagre domicile is at all times a very slender one, and when lack of work or sickness or other misfortune overtakes them, making it impossible to pay the rent or to satisfy the landlord or agent with well-meant promises, it generally results in the inevitable "warning" to vacate. Should this be unheeded, after a few days' grace, the formal dispossess warrant is served, and the little stock of domestic belongings is taken from the rooms bodily and deposited on the sidewalk. Then, and not till then, do the poor bewildered creatures realize the full meaning of what they may long have dreaded and bravely struggled to avert.

Out in the cold world,
Out in the street.

Our artist in the colored illustration on the first page has given us a realistic and faithful representation of an eviction in process of accomplishment. The poor mother, stricken dumb with her misery, scarcely conscious of her surroundings, sits on the sidewalk straining her baby to her breast, while a wee tottler clings to her skirts. The day is wet, but to the men who are acting under the landlord's orders, rain or shine, makes no difference: the rooms must be cleared, so the few cheap and well-worn pieces of furniture are being tossed with no gentle hands out on the curb. Already the mother's thin gown is soaked with rain, and the chill may mean death to the babies or to herself; but she heeds nothing. She is thinking of the little fireside that is to be theirs no longer: of the crib that will not hold her two darlings to-night when the darkness comes down, and of her poor "man," who is perhaps many miles away, searching for work, and unaware that his wife and little ones are now on the sidewalk, and may have to pass the night with only heaven's starlit canopy for a covering. Her heart is too full, too sad, to send even a moan to her dry lips. It is such mute sorrow that makes suicides, and drives to madness. What will not a mother do for her children—for the poor innocents that cling so close to her in their new terror, and who have done nothing that should make them suffer? What more can a mother do, in such a case, than breathe a prayer to Him who hath pity when all human pity fails?

But, while there is unquestionably much misery in every large and populous city, it is also true that there is much sympathy. All are not cruel and harsh, and there are many who are quick to offer sympathy and practical aid to the homeless and friendless. As the picture shows, the passers-by, like the good Samaritan in the parable, are touched with the scene of suffering and destitution. It is a story without words, but eloquent to the last detail. They know just what has happened without being told, and as they pass, some of them drop a coin or two in the palm of the poor mother—enough probably to secure her a shelter for her babies and herself over-night, and possibly a bit of supper. But it goes hard with the honest poor when they are confronted with the alternative of begging or starving, and one can readily imagine the pain it costs this homeless mother to accept the gifts of charity, even though she feels that it is God-sent, and that she must take it if the children are to be saved from exposure and possibly from death.

The duplicate of our illustration may be witnessed on the East Side of New York almost any day the year round. Just now, with winter near at hand, the fate of the dispossessed is peculiarly hard. God grant they may all find good Samaritans in time to avert still deeper misery, and they may learn, by their sad experience, to look to their Heavenly Father for succor in all their troubles, and to put their trust in him.

The tenement-houses of New York are from four to six stories high, the better class of them with twelve rooms to a floor, and housing from four to five families on a floor. There are instances, however, where a family of parents and five or six small children are all living in one room, their only home and abiding-place. Both classes of tenants, however, are subjected to what is known as the "dispossess" warrant, the fear of which hangs like a black and dreaded shadow over all these sad pretences of a home, as found in the typical New York tenement-house. An instance lately came under the immediate observation of the writer, in which a thoroughly respectable and worthy little woman of thirty, with six small children, the youngest three months, the oldest nine years, was ordered to pay her rent within three days or be put upon the street. In addition to the six half-starved children clinging and calling to her, and the fact that her husband, a steady worthy man, was out of work, the woman in question was in constant attendance at the bedside of her sick brother, a young man of eighteen, dying of consumption and heart disease. Almost as the breath was leaving this poor lad's body, the landlord came and threatened the distracted woman with an immediate "dispossess" if she and her family were not out of the house on a certain day. Unable to pay the rent, or to leave her dying brother, to whom she was devotedly attached, the mental misery and agony of this poor but good woman may be better imagined than described. The brother died, and as his corpse lay in the room the landlord came once more to exact what the now distracted creature could not possibly pay. On going to court an extension of a few days was granted, and in the mean time help came, and the woman and her family of little ones were saved from spending a wretched night in the street.

Another case, in which a tyrannical landlord figured, was that of a woman whose child lay dying of scarlet fever, and who being unable to pay her rent when it fell due was immediately served with the dreaded "dispossess." Half mad with misery, this woman also appealed to a court of justice. Time was allowed for the child's death and burial, and then, in the first hours of her grief and sorrow, the now childless and widowed mother, with all her meagre belongings, was set forthwith into the street to fare the best she could, a piteous object for the highest love and charity of mankind.

The incidents related occurred on the East Side within a stone's throw of Chinatown, and the dark, narrow, evil-looking Mott and Doyer Streets, which swarm day and night with the saddest phases of forlorn humanity.

God's Blessing upon Solomon.

Sunday School Lesson for November 15.

1 Kings 9:1-9. Golden Text, Prov. 10: 22.
By Mrs. M. Baxter.

SOLOMON had completed the great work with which God and his father had charged him; and moreover he had finished the building of his own house. It had occupied twenty years. (11. Chron. 8:1), and during this time of much business, not only was God true to Solomon, but Solomon was true to God, and a blessing to his people, for he brought them near to God. "I will bless thee, and thou shalt be a blessing," or "be thou a blessing," (Gen. 12:2), are two things which are inseparable. A blessing from God which does not bless others through us soon ceases to be a blessing.

The king had done "all Solomon's desire which he was pleased to do," or (11. Chron. 7:11): "All that came into Solomon's heart to make in the house of the Lord, and in his own house, he prosperously effected." And now the Lord, who had so graciously appeared to him at the commencement of his reign, "appeared to him the second time, as he had appeared to him at Gibeon." Some people mourn that God seems never to draw near to them as they would wish. Very often people act as spoiled children, and desire a manifestation of God for the sole purpose of enjoying the feeling of satisfaction that God is near them without expecting any permanent result for the advancement of the glory of God. Our Lord has linked the manifestation of God to the obedience of his children: "He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me, and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him," (John 14:21). Solomon had been till now walking in obedience to his God, and the Lord appeared to him. He did not sulk or get discouraged during the intervening twenty years because he had no special manifestation, but went on quietly and continuously obeying his known will, and had the testimony of a good conscience that he pleased God.

God's communication to Solomon at this time was on this special point of obedience. In the first place he assured him that he was accepted in his intercession for his people at the time of the temple dedication: "I have heard thy prayer, and thy supplication, that thou hast made before me: I have hallowed this house which thou hast built to put my name there for ever, and mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually." (1 Kings 9:3). "I have chosen this place to myself for a house of sacrifice," (11. Chron. 7:12). It was by night, when the king was alone, that God vouchsafed him this answer to his prayer. It is mostly when we are alone with God that he makes his communication to us. Solomon's people might be permitted to hear the breathing of his soul to God on his own behalf and on theirs, but no one must stand by and listen.

It was especially necessary for a man who of late that he should maintain an inner life of communion with the Most High. All which the king had asked for his tion entirely to the king in person. "And as for thee," if thou wilt walk before me as David thy father walked, in integrity of heart and in uprightness, to do according to all that I have commanded thee, and wilt keep my statutes and my judgments, then will I establish the throne of thy kingdom upon Israel for ever, as I promised to David thy father, saying, 'There shall not fail thee a man upon the throne of Israel.' (1. Kings 9:4, 5). It was David's solemn charge to Solomon, "Know thou the God of thy father, and serve him with a perfect heart and with a willing mind. Take heed now," (1. Chron. 28:9, 10). It was his prayer for his son: "Give unto Solomon my son a perfect heart to keep thy commandments," etc., (1. Chron. 29:19), and he repeated this exhortation to Solomon on his dying bed, saying, "Keep the charge of the Lord thy God to walk in his way . . . that thou mayst prosper . . . that the Lord may continue his Word if ye shall at all turn from following me," implying the tremendous responsibility of the high position of the king. If he turned away, his people would be sure to do so, too. "If ye shall at all turn from following me, ye or your children, and will not keep my commandments and my statutes which I have set before you, but go and serve other gods and worship them; then will I cut off Israel out of the land which I have given them; and this house which I have hallowed for my name, will I cast out of my sight; and Israel shall be a proverb and a by-word among all people." How terribly has this threat been carried into execution! Israel has indeed been cast out of their land, and what people is there which has not, at some time or other, made Israel a proverb and by-word!

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the use of Sunday School Teachers.

WHETHER this second vision of Solomon occurred immediately after the dedication of the Temple, or thirteen years later, is not certain. The paragraph in this chapter from the second to the ninth verses inclusive, like the parallel passage, 11. Chronicles 7: 12-22, has the appearance of being parenthetical. If the first verse of the chapter has been misplaced, and should come between the ninth and tenth verses, as seems probable, the account would agree with the history of Josephus, who represents the vision as coming at the close of the dedication ceremonies. It seems more likely to have been then, as the assurance to which he spake concerning me, saying, 'If thy children take heed to their way, to walk before me in truth with all their heart, and with all their soul, there shall not fail thee (said he) a man on the throne of Israel.' (1. Kings 2:14; 11. Sam. 7:25; Ps. 132:12). The Lord, when he appeared to Solomon, spake in the same strain (1. Kings 3:14), and now, for a fifth time in his life, the same message of warning is brought home to him. Would this constant repetition ensure the obedience which would be a necessary condition if the Lord should continue to commune with the king?

Alas, the latter days of the highly favored, highly gifted man prove the contrary. It was possible to serve God fully under law; "Moses was faithful in all his house" (Heb. 3:5), but few, indeed, there were, under the law, who kept the beginning of their confidence firm unto the end. (Heb. 3:14). "The law made nothing perfect," (Heb. 7:19), and it was only those, under the Old Testament, who broke through to an immediate knowledge of and walk with God, who continued steadfast unto the end. We of the new Covenant may draw nigh. There is no excuse, now that the rent veil has opened the way into the Holiest by the blood of Christ; we can draw nigh and live nigh to God. We only fail to continue to the end if we fall back under the law, "I ought, but I can't," instead of living in the glorious fullness of the Gospel: I am crucified with Christ; but Christ living in me can, by his precious blood, and shall live out his perfect life in me, to do the will of God.

A solemn warning was spoken to the king. God had said to him, "If thou wilt walk before me," etc., but now it is, "But

Solomon that his prayer was answered, would not, without some very weighty reason, be delayed thirteen years, if it was to be given at all. That question, however, is not so important to us as is the tone of the assurance. The answer to the prayer is wholly conditional. Solomon is not to suppose that his sacrifice, the magnificence of the Temple and his singularly beautiful prayer, placed the Lord under an obligation. God will grant him all that he has asked; and the Temple shall be all that he hoped it would be to the nation; and his own dynasty should be perpetuated, on one condition. He and his people must serve God with undivided hearts and must serve him exclusively. There must be no divided allegiance. They must not regard this gorgeous Temple as a bribe offered to God for his continued favor. The only terms on which the king and the nation would be blessed were that they should obey the Commandments and be faithful to God. If they set up idols and worshipped them, or ascribed their prosperity to some mythical deity of the Egyptians, or Canaanites, God would be offended and would cast them off. Their Temple and their offerings would count for nothing, and beautiful and imposing as their Temple was, it should be so utterly destroyed, that even the heathen would wonder. The condition of Jerusalem to-day shows that the warning was not superfluous. Indeed, such warnings would not be superfluous even in our day. Costly churches and gorgeous ritual do not commend themselves to God, though men often think they do. No man can buy his way to heaven. The rich, like the poor, can enter the kingdom of God only in one way—they must love and serve God, honor him by living according to his will. No individual, no nation can hope to win his favor by splendid churches or services, if they are living in sin. God's demand is for a clean heart and a pure life. A man who hopes to compound for self-indulgence by making large gifts to churches or colleges or missions in his lifetime in his will is under a delusion. God accepts our gifts, but he will not accept them as a substitute for righteousness.

If thou wilt walk before me. Solomon was in danger of making an attempt which must always fail. He wanted to live a life of self-indulgence while posing as a servant of God. His offering of sacrifices, and building a magnificent Temple, and making a beautiful prayer, could not rectify the inconsistency. Two could not exist together in one person. It was like the ice palace built for the Empress of Russia, which was beautiful as a dream, with elaborate architecture and glistening like a jewel in the sun. But it was intensely cold, and the Empress ordered a fire to be built in it. The architect had to explain to her that the fire would destroy the building. She could not have an ice palace and warmth at the same time. A man may live for God for himself and the world, but he cannot live for both at the same time.

Serve other gods and worship them. This prohibition may seem to some to have lost its force. In this Christian land there is no idolatry. It is true we do bow down to blocks of wood and stone, but if men of ancient time came among them they would say that the worship of Bacchus had not ceased when they were men staggering about the streets. There are libertines among us now who are as great sinners as those who worship Venus, and avaricious men who see Mammon as if it were a god. When a man does things that God forbids, he is not serving God but some other power, may be his own propensities which, being a rival of God, are practically in the place of God to him. "If I had a plant," said Dr. Maclaren, "which I had watered and tended for ten years, and it had never forth a leaf or a twig, I should be justified in thinking it was dead, and if a man is not in ten years shown any of the graces of Christian character, yet persists in calling himself a Christian, am I not right in saying, his Christian character is dead?"

Will keep my statutes. "I have not forgotten," says an aged minister, "an experience that I had in childhood. It is burned into my memory by a sorrow I shall feel to the end of my life. My father I do not remember to have seen. He died when I was little more than an infant. My mother I loved with all my heart. She was a frail, delicate creature with a face like an angel's. All her love was centered on me, all her prayers were for me. I was very sick and I, a lad then of ten years of age, was in her room. She was falling asleep when she said to me, 'Do not leave the room on any account until I wake; I may need you to give me medicine!' She was soon asleep. I stood at the window looking out into the garden. There were beautiful flowers there. I pleased my mother would be to see a bouquet on her table when she awoke. I looked at her and saw that she was sleeping soundly. I should not be away more than a few minutes, and I thought I might venture. I was longer than I realized. When I turned she was on the floor, gasping for breath. She had risen in one of her paroxysms, and as I was not there to tell her the medicine, had tried to get it myself, and in her weakness had fallen to the ground. When she was able to listen, I told her why I had gone from the room, and showed her the flowers. She would not look at them. 'My boy,' she said, 'caused his mother to suffer much pain by his disobedience. Never forget that obedience is better than sacrifice.'"

If thy hath the Lord done this? A group of mourners in a palatial mansion in New York passed, one by one, by a casket which lay the remains of a white-headed man. One young man wept bitterly; a well he might, for his conduct had led to whiten those hairs. A few days later he wept again. He had read his father's will, in which his father had left him small income, and divided his fortune among his other sons. "I have often warned him," the old man had written, "but he paid no heed. He would not waste the money if I left him his share."

GREETING TO THE EXILES.

Great Public Demonstration at Carnegie Hall—Sympathetic Addresses and a Stirring Cable Message From Mr. Gladstone

SURELY, since the days of the wanderings of Israel in the wilderness, subject to war, pestilence, famine, and persecution, no people of any land under the sun have been so buffeted, and bruised and driven from place to place as the exiles from Arme-

CRACKED ARMENIAN HOUSES IN STAMBOUL.

Escaping from the cruel fate decreed them by the Turk, they found no rest in the soles of their feet in Russia, Germany, France, or England. Wherever they halted for a momentary respite, they were "moved on" by the authorities. They are a quiet, orderly, law-abiding, simple Christian folk, whose sole wish is to see God and live at peace with all men; but through fear that interference with the Moslem time-honored prerogative of massacring Christians might breed undesirable complications, the impotent "Powers" decided to make no attempt to save them. To afford them no lasting shelter anywhere in the event of the Armenians coming within their borders. It was natural, therefore, that the refugees, sick of the hypocrisy of European governments, should turn their faces toward America. But our immigration laws have been made very much more stringent in the last decade, and United States Commissioner S. B. Lusk, in charge of the great immigration depot at Ellis Island, even on a most liberal construction of the existing law, could do no more than permit a portion of the hundreds and upward who arrived last week, to leave the island and join their waiting friends. Those who were detained, were to be further interrogated as to their eligibility under the law. It was believed that few if any would be sent back to the port of sailing. Meanwhile deputations from the Salvation Army, W. C. T. U., and similar organizations appealed to the Commissioner on their behalf, and an offer of securities and even bonds was tendered. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offered to supply the wants of the detained exiles and to send delicacies to any weak women and children. Those newly-arrived Armenians who were liberated were soon scattered in various directions, some going to employers who had written to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in response to its appeal for offers of employment; and others to the Salvation Army farm settlement, at Ramsey's, N. J., on the Erie Railroad, there to await offers of employment. Two hundred pairs of warm blankets were sent to Ramseys by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to aid in making the new arrivals comfortable. It is particularly desired that all offers of employment, coming from readers of this journal should be received as soon as possible. Address all such letters to the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

A popular demonstration of welcome was held at Carnegie Hall on October 26 under the auspices of the Salvation Army, in honor of the refugees. The great building was crowded. On the platform were many prominent people, including Rev. B. Fay Mills, the well-known evangelist, Rev. Dr. David J. Burrell, New York, Dr. Grace N. Kimball, the heroine of Van, Rev. Josiah Strong, Dr. Louis Klopsch, proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Commander and Mrs. Booth-Tucker, and many others. There were also a number of the exiles upon the platform, accompanied by an interpreter. Addresses of welcome were made, and most of the speakers were eloquent in their denunciation of Turkey's frightful barbarity and Europe's supineness. All the speakers agreed that the case of the Armenians was not one to be treated like that of ordinary immigrants to these shores; they were fleeing from a persecution worse than that which beset the mediaeval Christians, and to deport them, on the ground of a technical noncompliance with the immigration laws, was virtually to send them back to death.

Dr. Kimball was enthusiastically welcomed, and made one of the most interesting speeches of the evening. She reviewed the causes that drove the Armenians from their native land to these shores, and graphically pictured the forlorn condition of that persecuted people and their sufferings. She spoke of the Sassoun and Constantinople massacres, and the 100,000 who had been martyred by the Moslems. America should glory in being the helper of the oppressed—the land of freedom. Her reference to the aid rendered to the Armenians by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at a most critical time, when thousands were perishing, was enthusiastically cheered. "Dr. Klopsch cabled $15,000," she said, "and we soon had six bakeries running, and were saving the people from death by hunger." She also briefly outlined the history of her industrial bureau which had given employment to many thousands in Van alone. Her realistic picture of the terrible barbarities perpetrated by the Moslems. Of the Armenian character she spoke in the highest terms. Fourteen years spent among the Armenians had qualified her to say that they would make good American citizens. They are most temperate, law-abiding, industrious, and not the kind who will in any event become tramps or a burden on the community. In a word—they are fellow Christians who deserve our warmest aid in their extremity. To welcome them is good business and an act of the highest Christian charity. Speeches were also made by Mrs. Booth-Tucker, Rev. Dr. Strong, Rev. Dr. Burrell and others.

Dr. Klopsch read the following cable message from Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone: "I rejoice in the rescue of any fraction of Armenians from the fangs of the great assassin. So long as the inaction of the powers continues, the situation will be shameful as well as sad; but the deeds are recorded both in heaven and before man, and constantly accumulating horrors may yet work the downfall of that crying iniquity known as the Turkish Empire." GLADSTONE.

Tremendous applause followed. Letters of regret were read from a number of prominent people expressing sympathy. Among the well-known writers were Rev. Lyman Abbott, D.D., Rev. John Hall, D.D., Justice David J. Brewer, of the U. S. Supreme Court, Bishop L. M. N. Stevenson, President W. C. T. U. for Maine, Rev. Henry Wilson, Mary Lowe Dickinson, General Secretary Kings Daughters and Sons, Rev. W. Cuthbert Hall, and many others. Amelia Barr, the famous author, wrote: "It is meet and right that we should bear their sufferings on our hearts, and make their urgent necessities our immediate care. We are ready to go wild over some barbaric prince; we empty our purses for foreign artists and singers; shall we not also go to meet the martyrs and confessors of our own day with welcome, and bless them in the name of the Lord?" Suitable resolutions were adopted urging the United States Government to extend specially lenient consideration people as may come to this country with the view of making it their permanent home. The meeting was a most sympathetic and enthusiastic one. Ira D. Sankey, the sweet Gospel singer, delighted the audience with his fine solos. A collection was taken in aid of the Relief Fund. Dr. Klopsch pledged $1,000 toward the support of the exiles, until they are permanently provided for. Our illustrations on this page show two widely apart phases of the Armenian question, one being a view of the principal street in which the recent Constantinople Died for Christ in Africa. INTELLIGENCE was received in New York City a few days ago of the death in the heart of Darkest Africa of Miss Louise Collins, a devoted Christian missionary. Miss Collins went to the Congo, the scene of her loving labor for souls, on May 20, 1896, under the auspices of the Christian Alliance. She landed at Matadi, and after an eight days' journey inland, reached her station at Dyema, on the Chiliango river. The deadly African climate soon taxed her physical strength, and within a month after her arrival, she was stricken with African fever. Her illness lasted thirty-eight hours, during seven of which she was unconscious. Toward the end, however, consciousness returned, and her last afternoon on earth was one of great joy, and was spent in praise and rejoicing. Miss Collins' grave is the first in the little mission plot at Dyema. The natives, who had learned to love her much, gathered around it in awe and wonder, and were deeply grieved over the loss of their dear teacher, who "being dead, yet speaketh" to them through the sweet and helpful influence of her work! Miss Collins, before leaving for Africa, was engaged in active service in the Baptist Church at Greenpoint, N. Y., where her loss is keenly felt. She spent a year and a half in the Christian Alliance College, preparing by the study of missionary methods and the African language, for efficient work in the distant field. Her sister is Miss Helen J. Collins, a well-known city missionary in New York, and who for several years has been associated with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, where as matron she had charge of the work last summer.

CHRISTIANS IN COUNCIL.

How the Coming Conference in Cooper Union, New York, may be an Influence of Potent Force in the Evangelization of the City.

PRAYER is earnestly desired of all Christians throughout the country that God's blessing may attend the meetings which commence next Monday in New York. As announced in this journal last week, Mr. D. L. Moody is to preach every morning in Cooper Union, the services commencing at ten o'clock. In the afternoon there will be another service, beginning at half-past two, when several eminent evangelists will speak on the different days. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, Rev. George C. Needham, Dr. A. C. Dixon, Evangelist R. G. Pearson and other famous preachers have promised to take part in the meetings. How long the services will continue depends largely on the interest that may be aroused, but it is hoped that there will be such an outpouring of the Spirit as will give an impetus to Gospel work in New York that will be felt in every church in the city, and will make the coming winter a memorable one in New York.

The movement is based on the principle of the true revival in the proper sense of the term. It seeks to make every Christian an active force in soul-saving effort. If the Christ-life in the soul of the believer can be quickened so that he not only realizes his own privileges, and draws nearer to his Lord in love and holiness and consecration, but is stirred to go out and win souls and use his opportunities for service, a far-reaching influence will be exerted which must result in blessing. No Christian is so isolated that he does not come in contact in the course of his life with people who are strangers to Christ. Some of these would probably pay more heed to words from his lips than from any other. Yet how often are they unspoken! How many unsaved people there are who daily come in contact with Christians in society or in business, without knowing that they are Christians! Sometimes there are inconsistencies of word and conduct which would make the statement of their being followers of Christ a surprise. Their worldly friends do not suspect them of being Christians, as they see little difference between them and themselves. And even when the Christian does not dishonor his Lord by worldliness, he often manifests no concern for the salvation of his associates, his employees, or his neighbors. In the home, the family, the store, or the cars, his conversation might easily be a testimony for Christ, and without being obtrusive, might so declare the joy and happiness that religion brings to him, as to lead others to seek the blessing for themselves. A layman has frequently more power in this personal influence than man using the terms of every-day life bears a witness to the comfort and peace he enjoys, and tells his friend what Jesus has done for his soul, his words carry weight through their very disinterestedness. Mr. Moody and his associates are therefore acting wisely in trying to get the Christian people of New York to use this influence.

The leaders in the movement are men in the forefront of Christian activity, who have been blessed in many cities to the salvation of souls. Mr. D. L. Moody is too well known to need any introduction to our readers. Though in his sixtieth year, he has lost none of the energy and power that have made his name famous for a quarter of a century throughout Christendom. On both sides the Atlantic the people have gone in thousands to listen to his preaching, and the largest buildings have been inadequate to hold the multitudes who desired to hear the Gospel from his lips. Probably there is no living man to whose labors so many people ascribe their conversion as to him. Yet there is little of the grace of rhetoric, or what is commonly called pulpit eloquence in his sermons. Mr. Moody does not preach learned sermons, or controversial sermons, but he is tremendously in earnest and he has the faculty of presenting the Gospel in most convincing terms. A plain, simple, common-sense presentation it is, which wins the attention and commands respect.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, though comparatively a young man, being under forty years of age, has a grand record as a revival preacher. Born at Richmond, Ind., he studied at Lake Forest University, and soon became known in the churches of the State as an energetic, earnest preacher. After holding a charge at Schuylerville, N. Y., and subsequently at Albany, N. Y., he was called to succeed Dr. A. T. Pierson as pastor of Bethany Church, Philadelphia, where he labored successfully until his calls from the evangelistic field became so imperative that he recognized it as a duty to devote his time to that sphere of labor.

Dr. A. C. Dixon is the pastor of Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn. He is a Southerner by birth, the son of an indefatigable frontier preacher, to whose devoted labors the South and West owe the organization of many of the churches now centres of Gospel influence. His son was converted in childhood, and in his early years had charge of two pastorless churches near his home. After his theological course he labored at Asheville, N. C., and at Baltimore, Md., before settling in Brooklyn, where he has done a great work in the cause of Christ.

Another effective worker whose voice is to be heard, is Evangelist R. G. Pearson, who labored in New York in 1893. Mr. Pearson is a native of Mississippi and is about forty-three years of age. His early connections were with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and he had charge of churches of that denomination at Nashville, Tenn., and other places, but for thirty years past he has devoted himself exclusively to evangelistic work.

Rev. George C. Needham, who is widely known through his "Bible Readings," which he has held in all the great cities of the country, and Great Britain, is a true Christian by faith, and a true worker. He has spent his life in the work under the advice of the late Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, who continued to the close of his life to take a warm interest in the young Gospel worker. Mr. Needham is a man of one book. He has made the Bible his life-long study, and he uses it with wonderful power and effect in all his work. Many ministers who have attended his "Bible Readings" have said that not until they heard Needham talk had they any conception of the fullness and beauty of the Scriptures. Mr. Needham's services in New York are sure to be among the most valuable of the series.

Two Experiences that Caused the Temples to be Neglected in a Hindoo Village.

MISS HATTIE L. BRUCE, a missionary at Satara, India, in a recent letter to the Indian Witness, relates the following remarkable incidents as having occurred under her own observation:

One evening a young Marathi woman, Banubai by name, living in the village of Arali, was bitten by a venomous snake. Her friends in great alarm took her to the temple of their goddess Wadzai. They would not hear of the suggestion that remedies be given the dying girl. Wadzai was all their confidence, so through the night-watches they poured out their lamentations before her. "Mother, mother, look upon us and be gracious. Oh, thou who art chief amongst the goddesses, whom have we in all the world but thee? Mother, to whom shall we go? Thou alone canst heal. Restore the sick one, we beseech thee!" Alternately with these pleadings they blew the temple horns as though to awaken the slumbering sympathies of their stone goddess; but "there was neither voice nor any that regarded." Thus the long hours of the night wore on till sunrise, when Banubai died. As it was now evident that Wadzai either could do or would do nothing for her worshippers, they bestirred themselves to take more practical measures for the resuscitation of the corpse. Two men were sent to Mahuli, five miles to the southeast, two others to Limbgova, five miles to the west, and two to the Christian preacher at Waduth, an adjoining village on the opposite bank of the Krishna river.

"Come!" said the breathless messengers upon reaching their respective destinations, "A woman has been bitten by a snake. If you can do anything, hasten!" "Is she dead or alive?" was the first inquiry elicited by this news in each of the three villages. "Dead. She died at six this morning. Oh, hasten!" "Has the breath left the body?" "Alas, yes!"

Said the holy man at Mahuli, "My charms are ineffective outside my own district." Said the sorcerer at Limbgova, "Return, and bid them not to await my coming. The spells I know are potent only while life lasts."

Said the Christian preacher at Waduth, "It is too late to give medicines now. Is not this what I am continually telling you, while life lasts, make provision for the needs of body and soul? For there is no remedy after death." So, when the six messengers returned to Arali at about ten o'clock, hope expired in the mourners' hearts, and they took the body to the banks of their sacred Krishna for burning.

In Waduth, just across the river from Arali, a Marathi lad named Yadu was bitten by a cobra as he stepped out of his house one evening not long after Banubai's death. Immediately there was a confused clamor of noises: "Let incantations be pronounced, or medicines given!" "Take him to the Christian Master's house!" "No, to the temple! To the temple!" Mahatoba is our village god! he will save!" The grief-stricken mother stepped forward and silenced them all by saying: "The temple is near, only a stone's throw from us, and the Master's house beyond it. Think you Mahatoba would be honored by taking the boy directly past his temple to any one else? No, we will trust in the village god." So Yadu was taken to Mahatoba's temple where Vitba, the Christian preacher, soon followed, attracted by the outcries of the worshippers. Upon his offering to help in some way, either by giving medicines or waiting through the night, the boy's mother answered: "No, we have committed it to the care of our god. There is to be no implication that others would do more for him than the guardian of our village stands ready to do. He will save."

Vitba reminded them of Wadzai's conspicuous failure of the week before—to no purpose. The people were confident that their superior deity, Mahatoba, would most assuredly manifest his power. "F give us our sins, and in token of forgiveness heal the sick one!" thus they continued praying aloud with renewed enthusiasm till twelve o'clock. No need to pray longer, for by that time Yadu's sufferings were over.

A day or two afterwards, Vitba reported the event to us: "The people knowledge their foolishness in placing confidence in Mahatoba," said he, "They will never trust them idols again."

Thanksgiving for the Homeless.

A special effort is now being made Superintendent Wyburn and Assistant Superintendent Mershon, of the Bow Mission, to provide a Thanksgiving dinner for as large a number of the homeless and destitute persons as possible, and also provide the material for a "home dinner" for such poor families as are known to be in need and really deserving. Any read of this journal who are interested in Mission and its work, may aid this benevolent project by sending contributions potatoes, apples, fowls, fruit, etc., to the care of Mr. Wyburn, Superintendent of the Mission, at No. 105 Bowery. All such gifts will be acknowledged.

A friend at Quaker Hill, N. Y., Mr. F. Osborn, writes:

DEAR BROTHER WYBURN. I ship you

day as freight by Harlem R. R. nine bushels potatoes and one barrel apples. The freight is paid to New York. Enclosed find bill lading.

Mr. Osborn's gift will go towards the Thanksgiving dinner plan, and will doubtless be the means of appeasing hunger some poor household at that time of general rejoicing.

SILHOUETTES FROM LIFE

WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Sue's Organdie Gown.

SUE EVERETT had saved her money for three months to buy an organdie gown. From her weekly wages she had to help her mother pay their room rent, and she clothed her little sister as well as herself, so the purchase of a new gown was a matter of no slight importance. Bit by bit, a car-fare saved to-day, a piece of pie left from her luncheon to-morrow, Sue accumulated the amount she needed—twelve yards of fine sheer organdie skin, with linings, and ribbon and lace trim it with, and now, the money in her little pocket-book, she set out to make the purchase.

Her employer had given her an afternoon off, and she went tripping down the stairs and out into the street as merrily as a girl started on an errand in the world. There is, to the average mind, a good deal of enjoyment in shopping, and she was prepared to extract the full sweetness from her visit to the great Broadway store. Yet she knew precisely what she wanted to buy—an organdie, with a white band, over which should go trailing wreaths of faintly colored roses, with dim green leaves—fady-green, she called it to herself, and fady-pink; she would have something loud or showy in this dainty summer costume. She had seen something like her ideal in a window, and she had bought it, and talked of it till it stood before her mind's eye, clear and distinct as a picture. And she had eight dollars to spend on it, and could spend the whole of it if she chose.

Sue went gayly along the street, and in a career, whom should she meet but little Harold Ginty, her youngest Sunday School child, for Sue had a large class mission, and attended to it very faithfully. Harold greeted her with a joyful exclamation, and then walked very soberly at her side.

"Is mamma well?" asked Sue.
"No, teacher," said Harold, "she's sick, and baby's sick, and we fink baby's goin' to die wiv the heat. The heat's awful."
Sue knew it must be. The heat had been dreadful for days. In the streets men and horses were falling and dying, from its effects, and in the crowded tenements the babies withered like flowers on their stems. Days and days passed in the race-like flame of the sun, and the heats were gone before the blistering cements were cool; people sat all night on the doorsteps longing for a breath of air to relieve them, and the deadly heat held its sway, unmitigated even by under-showers.

Sue thought quickly. She had eight dollars in her pocket, and she longed for an organdie gown, but she could do without it. Her old white muslin could be altered, and made to do. Sue turned to Harold smilingly, and took his small hot hand in her cool clasp; it was characteristic of Sue to have firm, cool hands, and never to look flurried or heated, let the temperature mark what it might; the two went straight to Harold's home.

"Mrs. Ginty," she said, as she met the tired-looking woman, scarcely able to stand on her feet, and glanced at the white cradle of the babe in its cradle, "I've come to send you to the country."

"That's what the doctor says would cure up, but, Miss, what's his advice worth, when there's no money to be had, and the children's wanting bread?"

"I know a place where you can go with the old and the baby, this very day, and I'll pay nothing while you're there, and I'll have money enough to keep the house going on while you're gone, and to your next month's rent in part, and Mr. Ginty earns something, doesn't he?"

He do pick up odd jobs at times," said wife, her face kindling as she thought of cool breezes and the plash of waves, and health coming back to herself and her little ones.

Sue bundled them away that afternoon. There was little time to lose, and the fare to the Seaside Home she knew was a mere trifle. She had an aunt who was matron at the place she sent her friends to, and she knew that even if it was crowded to the overflow, this lady, being a person of resources, would secure some spot for Mrs. Ginty and her children.

Sue's friends wondered when they saw her wearing her old muslin, for there were none of them but had heard of the organdie she had meant to have. But she kept her own counsel. "At the last moment, something happened that made me change my mind," she said, cheerfully, and thus her left hand did not know what her right hand did. It was a small bit of self-denial, regarded from the standpoint of the world's great givers, but in the sight of him who accepted with praise the widow's two mites, the gift of Sue Everett's organdie gown was not despised. For he, looking on the heart, and at the motive, saw that the young girl had put herself and her own wishes aside for one of his little ones, and he sent her the blessing, which comes to those who may claim the "Inasmuch."

Moody and the Students.

How the Great Evangelist Quelled a Disturbance at Cambridge.

ON the occasion of his visit to the English University at Cambridge, some time ago, Mr. Dwight L. Moody, the well-known evangelist, had a singular experience, which he thus describes: "We received a pressing invitation—Mr. Sankey and I—to go to Cambridge when we were in England, and I refused. I thought I had got no call to go to universities. But when we were over there again, another call came, signed by a list of names six or eight feet long; and I said, 'I will go.' The first Sunday night we were in Cambridge, the students tried to break the meeting up. I had preached to all classes of people—to the hoodlums of California—and never had that happen before. It looked very much as if they were going to snatch the whole thing out of our hands. I don't believe there were fifty students out of that roomful that heard the songs of Mr. Sankey, and right on through the whole meeting it was just the same.

"On Monday night the disturbance was just as bad or worse. On Tuesday the outlook was darker than ever. But on that day, a lady—a bedridden saint—who was very much interested in the work, sent around an invitation to a few Christians to get together in a little upper room and plead with God for a change in those students. That turned the tide. It wasn't the preaching. They had heard better sermons. They had had sermons from the best preachers of the Church of England. It was these Christians in that upper room praying with God that made the difference. And how they did pray! It seemed as if their prayers burst into heaven, and I said, 'The victory is ours.' That night I preached. I don't think I had much power. When I asked, 'If any man in this audience wants to become a Christian, will you go into the inquiry room?'—they had their gowns on—of course they were known—if you know anything about universities you know it is pretty hard to get them moved. When I gave this invitation I didn't know there would be a man. But there was a hush over that audience, and fifty-two men sprang to their feet and went up in that gallery, and that night we had all the inquirers we could attend to. About one o'clock—I was getting pretty tired—a man came to me, saying, 'I wish you would come and talk to this man.' They were on their faces crying to God for mercy. God had broken not only their stubborn wills, but their hearts were broken.

"It wasn't the preaching; the preaching was pretty weak that night. I talked to this man, and the tears were running down his cheeks: but he found Christ that night. Some one said to me, 'Do you know who that was? That is the head wrangler in Cambridge,' the highest in books. Among the three thousand students at Cambridge, he was the best—the leader. There he was on his knees, and the power of God just came in answer to prayer. Next Sunday night there were two hundred or three hundred broken hearts, of men who wanted to be for God.

"It isn't preaching we want, it is prayer. I would rather be able to pray like David than to preach with the eloquence of Gabriel. We don't want any more preachers in this country—we have got enough. What we want is to pray. Let us open up communication with heaven, and the blessing will come down."

A Boy Missionary.

He Comes Across the Ocean to Tell of the Gospel Needs of His People.

THE young African lad Samuel, whose portrait appears on this page, is a native of Sierra Leone, having been born at the village of Robonke, about seventy-five miles from the coast. It is a village of the powerful Temne tribe, and the local chief, who is named Bifoke, rules over a large territory which skirts the coast for a considerable distance, and also extends far inland. There are a number of other Temne villages under his control besides Robonke.

When Samuel was ten years old he was adopted by Rev. Matthew Francis, and he went to the Christian Alliance Mission

SAMUEL, THE BOY MISSIONARY.

School at Robethel, where Mr. Francis was stationed as missionary. Samuel visited the United States recently. He is training to be a missionary, and he expects to stay here three months longer, when he will return to Africa. He will ultimately do good service for the Master among his own people. There are not very many Christians out there, but the missionaries are teaching the boys, and the prospects are very encouraging. In the Christian Alliance School there are now about twenty-five boys, and there is, besides, a girls' school, where there are fourteen attendants, Mr. Trice being the missionary in charge. After the pupils leave school, on finishing their educational course, they go out to teach their own people.

Mission schools have now been in operation in the Temne territory about three years. Samuel has been taught reading, writing, arithmetic, and grammar, and he has a remarkable knowledge of Scriptures.

Samuel is the young lad who made a notable address at the Missionary Alliance meeting on Sunday, October 11th, at Carnegie Hall, New York, when he touchingly appealed to an audience of 5,000 to help to send missionaries to his country. Mrs. Twining, a Christian lady of Boston, and other friends are taking a warm personal interest in his welfare and advancement. He will yet doubtless be a valuable worker in the Gospel field.

A Christian Countess.

Adeline Schimmelmänn's Sacrifices for the Master—Work Among Baltic Fishermen.

THE name of the Countess Adeline Schimmelmänn is already a familiar one to many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The daughter of a wealthy Danish nobleman, she has devoted her whole life to Christian work and the labor of saving souls. Her history is a remarkable one, and her experience as a Gospel worker, of a nature seldom met with in the life of an ordinary evangelist or missionary, at home or abroad. Her religious convictions carried her as a very young girl to visit prisons, penitentiaries, and other criminal and reformatory institutions, where her spiritual ministrations were a source of help and comfort to the wretched and often depraved human beings with whom she constantly came in contact. In the very beginning of her career as a fisher of souls among men, she was met by the violent opposition of her family and friends, many of whom were known to the highest circles of the German Empire. So high in favor was she, in fact, with the potentates of royalty, that she held the enviable position in Germany of chief lady of honor to the Empress Augusta. As her work grew and spread in the great German cities and villages, and the fact of her own life of denial and sacrifice became known abroad, her relatives at the Prussian Court began to look upon her work and ways as of one demented. Unable to comprehend or appreciate her motive in thus bestowing all her means, time, and energies in seeking out the wretched, lost, and vile, she was stigmatized as insane, was arrested, and finally placed in an asylum. After a short period of test and imprisonment in the insane asylum, the Countess was released and allowed to return to her chosen field of labor.

Much of the Countess's work has been confined to the fishermen of the Baltic provinces, men noted for drunkenness, and for rough and riotous living, who have been helped and redeemed through her efforts to lives of Christianity and material prosperity. As a direct evidence of God's love for those who work in his name, and for the souls he loves, this persecuted but zealous servant of the Lord seems to be hearing the "Well done, thou good and faithful," even in her earthly habitation. Most encouraging accounts have been given of her recent work along the Baltic shores, and her seamen's home at Gohien, formerly demolished by her persecutors, has been rebuilt and is now filled with the fishermen who owe their redemption and better lives to the sympathy, prayers, and efforts of the Countess Schimmelmänn. She has also been especially successful in Pomerania, even among the middle and upper classes of society.

Recent meetings held at Strasland, and in the Duchy of Mecklenburg, show that not only the seafaring men and working classes have been interested and reached, but many of the most worldly-minded people in what is known as "high life." A number of the proudest of these people have been seen in tears and private conversation on the days following the meetings. Many have been converted, and others are still ardently seeking salvation. Incidents come to hand which tell of a young nobleman who wept like a child at one of the meetings because of the aimless, unfruitful life he had always led. At another meeting, a Prussian general offered his money to build a home for sick children. And so the good work of the faithful Countess grows and spreads, to the glory of God and the salvation of immortal souls.

A Buluwayo Kraal.

AN idea of the kind of people the British are trying to subdue in South Africa may be obtained from the picture on this page of a Matabele Kraal, or village near Buluwayo, which is the capital of Matabeleland. That they are a people who will not easily be governed on British principles is evident from the risings which have just been put down. It originated in an outbreak of the Rinderpest which extended through Matabeleland and Mashonaland. In England the government finds no difficulty in stopping an outbreak by slaughtering suspected cattle. The people understand that the slaughter is for the general good. It is the only effectual means of stamping out the disease, and they accept the sacrifice. The British seem to have expected similar acquiescence in the Matabeles, and were amazed when the natives, rather than lose their cattle, rose in revolt. That they were unprepared for the outbreak is evident from the fact that more than a hundred white people were murdered, including four women, before a sufficient military force could be collected to suppress the rebellion. As in our own Indian wars, the disciplined forces, when on the ground, easily defeated the savages. The superiority of their weapons and equipment more than counterbalanced the inferiority of their numbers. The Matabeles fought with reckless bravery, and came in overwhelming numbers to the combat, but the British maxim guns, firing over two hundred rounds a minute, mowed them down with a menacing slaughter. The survivors fled to the caves in the hills, whence, it may be hoped, return safely to their villages. It is recorded by the British that these outbreaks are the work of only a few among the survivors of Lobengula's army, who cannot forget the insults of their youth and the prestige of the Matabele as the invincible warriors of South Africa. They claim that the majority of the people are naturally peaceable and will ultimately to civilization. The slaughter is one of those deplorable results of the contact of civilized people with barbarous races with which our experience with the Indian has familiarized us. It may be hoped that missionary work among them will be tried with better results, and that in the propagation of the Gospel the colonizers will find a better protection than in maxim guns. For their sakes, as well as for the sake of the Matabele people, the white settlers should make no effort to bring their colored neighbors under the power of Christ, which alone can change their natures. Until then they will surely realize that, as the Scriptures say:

The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of violence. (Ps. 74: 20. R.V.)

An Explosion in a Subway.

Several persons had a narrow escape of their lives in a New York street last week. There is a subway in East Twenty-third street in which there is a gas main and several cables carrying electric wires which give light and power to factories in the neighborhood. The subways are supposed to be gas and water proof, but the water filtered in at the manhole at the corner of the street and surrounded the pipes. There was a defect in the gas-main at the corner which was to be repaired as soon as a gang of men could be set to work upon it. The rainy weather had delayed the job for two or three days and had increased the water around the pipes. In one place, the insulation of the cables was imperfect, and the water acting as a conductor, electric sparks leaped from one cable to another. No doubt would have been done if the gas, which was escaping from the main, had not penetrated the subway, but the narrow tunnel grew thick with it. The electric sparks fired it; there was a rumbling like an earthquake for a minute and then the heavy iron cap of the manhole was sent flying into the air, and fifteen feet of stone pavement was torn up, and the stones lying higher than the heads of the lamp-posts. Fortunately, few persons were passing at the time, and these escaped with slight injuries, but if the explosion had occurred a little later, when the street was crowded, many lives would have been lost. It is through an analogous combination of destructive causes that the moral convulsions by which characters are destroyed, are brought about. Temptation can do no harm to a man unless he has in his nature the elements on which it can operate. The man who is safe is he who can say with his Lord:

The Prince of this world cometh; but he hath nothing in me. (John 14:30.)

The Ascent Failed.

An officer of the Signal Service made

A MATABELE KRAAL NEAR BULUWAYO, IN SOUTH AFRICA.

an experiment a few days ago at Governor's Island, New York, which failed, but happily without causing serious injury. The Lieutenant has invented a plan for ascending without a balloon to a great height, from which, in time of war, he could survey an enemy's position. His method is to have a series of three enormous kites attached by a rope. Two of the kites are covered with ninety square feet of cloth, and the third, which is the lowest, with twenty-four. Attached to the lowest kite is a kind of swing, such as children use in their play. In this he seated himself, with a loose rope at hand, two thousand feet long, which was to be used for guiding purposes. The rope by which the kites were raised was a half-inch manila, which was wrapped around a windlass. He had previously experimented with a dummy soldier, which the kites carried to a height of twenty-five hundred feet. As all had passed off well on that occasion, the Lieutenant felt sure of making a safe and successful ascent. He seated himself in his swing, when the highest of the three kites had risen to a height of two hundred feet. He had not ascended more than four feet, when he was suddenly thrown to the ground. The spine of the highest kite had broken under the strain. The Lieutenant is now busy making a new kite with a stronger spine, and feels sure of being able with its assistance, to ascend among the clouds. His dependence, of course, is on the strength of the upper kites, which must be capable of bearing his weight. Should this fail when he is far above the earth, his life will surely be lost. We may be thankful that no soul can ever be lost in that way. They who hope through Christ to ascend to heaven at death, can be sure that no failure on his part is possible.

I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. (John 12: 32.)

A Strange Election Bet.

A novelty in election wagers is reported from Wisconsin. We are familiar with men who undertake, if the candidates they favor are defeated, to allow their hair to grow uncut for a term of years, or to do other ridiculous things, but the two Wisconsin men have pledged themselves to something more serious. The election of President will involve one of them in lifelong exile if the terms of their bet are fulfilled. A local journal reports that two prominent business men of Milwaukee, who are on opposite sides in the pending campaign, have set their hands to a contract, duly recorded by a notary, that in the event of the election of McKinley one of them, who is a supporter of Bryan, shall sell out his business interests and leave the United States never to return, while, on the other hand, if Bryan is elected the McKinley man pledges himself to like expatriation. The loser is to have time to dispose of his business, but he is to use his utmost endeavors to be out of the country by January 1, 1897. The friends of the two men expostulated with them when they heard of their making the rash contract, and pointed out to them how serious it would be for a man in the prime of life to quit his home and old associations to begin life anew in a foreign land. Their protests, however, did not avail. Each man and reduced to ashes, and the doors and wainscoting burned. Each operation has been highly productive. Gold of the value of sixty-eight thousand dollars has been recovered from the ashes and scrapings. The company have completely gutted the building, sacrificing everything that they may get the gold. So, at the last, when everything is to be tried in the fire, God will gather that which is more precious than gold—the righteousness of his people.

The trial of your faith being much more precious than of gold, that perisheth though it be tried with fire. (1. Peter 1:7.)

Attacked by a Fish.

A mysterious leak in a ship was explained recently in the harbor of San Francisco. The Examiner, of that city, says that the crew of the barkentine Irving were puzzled during their voyage from Honolulu by the leaking of the ship. When its cargo was taken out and the ship rose about five feet out of the water, the cause was discovered. Protruding about two inches from the side of the ship was the sword of a sword-fish. The fish had attacked the vessel with such fury as to drive its sword completely through the ten-inch planking. Its point extended three inches into the hold. The fish had been unable to withdraw it, and it had broken off short. The planking had split on each side of the weapon, and the water had made its way in through the apertures. The injury to the vessel will be easily repaired, but the fish must have been badly, if not fatally, injured. It probably thought, if a fish can think, that the hull of the vessel was an enemy, and instinctively attacked it with suicidal effect. It could not be expected to know any better, but it is surprising that men should act after the same manner, and, as predicted, with similar results.

His mischief shall return upon his own head; and his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate. (Ps. 7:16.)

Hemmed in by the Tide.

The narrow escape of an American girl from drowning is reported from Brittany, in the North of France. She is being educated at a Parisian school, and is now nineteen years old. During a vacation at the school, she, with her mother, sister and brother, went to Parnichet, a picturesque resort by the sea, for a few days' recuperation. The girl made friends with another lady from Paris, who was staying there. The two went for a walk along the cliffs, which run along the coast and rise to a height of over one hundred feet. A circuitous path at the extremity of the cliff leads down to a sandy strip, like a tongue, which at low water runs out for about a mile. The young ladies followed it, and at the base of the cliff found themselves in a depression like a narrow valley. Climbing its side they reached a lovely stretch of level, sandy tableland, hard and smooth. They sat down to admire the prospect, and must have remained longer than they knew, for when they rose to return to the cliff, they found that the tide had come in and filled the valley they had crossed on their way. The tableland was now an island around which the waves were dashing, and they could see that in a short time it would be submerged. The American girl lost hope, but the French girl determined to save herself and her friend if possible. She swam across the little valley, scaled the cliff, and ran to the coast-guard station for help. It was impossible to send a man by the same route, as the tide beat heavily against that side of the cliff. But on the more sheltered side, which was precipitous, a descent could be made by lowering a man by a rope. He went down, and fastening a rope around the waist of the half unconscious girl, he carried her to the base of the cliff, where she was drawn up. The rescue was only just in time. The sand on which the girl stood was wet when she was taken off, and fifteen minutes later it had disappeared beneath the tide. The prompt action of her French friend, which was the means of saving her life, was an example which might well be followed by Christians who have friends in danger of perishing eternally. Their efforts may not only save their friends from a terrible doom, but may bring a blessing to themselves.

Let him know that he who converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death and hide a multitude of sins. (James 5: 20.)

declared that his candidate would win. They accordingly signed the document, apparently with the full intention of fulfilling its provisions. There can be little doubt that the loser will bitterly regret his wager. He will probably find in his adopted country, wherever it may be, political and social conditions more galling than that of seeing the candidate to whom he is opposed installed as President. So long as men are free, they will never be of one mind as to the man most fit to be their ruler, until that long-desired day arrives when Christ shall come to reign in all his glory, and all men shall serve him.

His name shall endure forever; and men shall be blessed in him: All nations shall call him blessed. (Ps. 72:17.)

A Gold Mine in a Factory.

An extraordinary recovery of gold has been going on for several weeks in Brooklyn. A company has had a factory on Warren Street where, for twenty-five years past, watch cases have been made. The company are removing their plant to Sag Harbor, L. I., and are closing their Brooklyn factory. It was suggested to them that before renting the factory they should make an effort to recover some of the gold that might have been lost during the past quarter of a century from the lathes which do the turning on the watch cases. As great care has always been taken to prevent waste, there was some doubt whether an attempt would be worth the trouble and expense. Work was begun with the ceilings, which were scraped. Then the walls were thoroughly washed and the water sifted. Lastly, the flooring was torn up

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Old Subscriber, Newark, N. J. 1. Will there be any more issues of the Christian Herald than that of the Bible in issue of Oct. 7th, and when will they be announced? 2. In writing a story, about how many words would be required to make a chapter?

1. Yes; the new list of premiums will be announced shortly in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. 2. Different writers vary in the size of their chapters, but a fair average is from 1,500 to 2,000 words, if the story be a long one.

C. E. Y., Jackson, Mich. Is the Book of Job a true story?

There are no means accessible at this distance of time of proving that Job actually lived. All the inferences are in favor of his being a real person. Probably he was an Arab sheik, who, although a good man, was heavily afflicted. The absence in the book of any reference to the law or ritual of Judaism, appears to indicate that he was not a Hebrew. It may be that the question of God's providential dealings puzzled some deep thinker in early times, as it does us. He may have been afflicted himself, and in his misery been stung by cruel suspicions that he had committed some grievous secret sin, for which his affliction was a punishment. Such a man might have taken the history of Job and woven it into dramatic form, putting into the lips of Job's friends the aspersions uttered against himself. The purpose of the book is to show that it is conceivable that a man may have been much better, rather than much worse, than his fellows, and that God suffers him to be tested in that severe way to prove to others how good a man he is.

Alexander P. W., Wheeling, W. Va. Who was the boy that held the basket containing the loaves and fishes that fed the multitude?

Tradition declares that the lad was Ben Sion, son of Mattai, sister of Philip, one of the twelve disciples.

F. W. H., Olinda, Ont., Can. 1. Who answers the questions in THE MAIL-BAG? We are delighted to hear that a young minister should study and practice elevation and rhetoric, or preach the Gospel in a dignified and interesting manner. I am interested in the affairs of his children each day, or has he simply established laws which account for their fortunes? 5. Is there an valid objection to church socials as a means of raising money?

1. The editors jointly. 2. It is stated by travelers that no people, however savage, have yet been discovered who do not possess some form of religion. 3. They are very efficient aids to ministerial effort, and should not be neglected. 4. See Matt. 10: 10. 5. None, if properly and decorously conducted. They are, however, in building.

Reader, Belmont, Mass. 1. Did Christ's cry on the cross, "My Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," indicate a failure of faith? 2. Does Galilee because the Jews sought to kill him, therefore did not possess divine power? 3. Is it true that the Jews were not allowed to enter the temple grounds?

1. The cry was a prayer for the forgiveness of his enemies, and it was a sign of his perfect faith. 2. All through his life Christ showed extreme reluctance to use his divine power for his own benefit. He wished in all things, except sin, to lead a human life. Nevertheless, his withdrawal may have been on account of his work rather than to insure his safety. He could not hope to do much good in a region where the authorities were plotting to kill him. 3. Yes. It is not known who wrote Kings, Chronicles, Esther, Ruth, Job, and many others. 4. The oldest Bible in existence is believed to have been transcribed in the fourth or early in the fifth century.

T. S. Robie, West Hawley, Mass. Our answer was a perfectly proper one, for human beings or animals will in moments of peril cry aloud for their protector, whether that protector be within hearing or not. Consequently, the question of deception does not apply in such a case.

Robert S., Syracuse, N. Y. Can the extermination of the Canaanites, men, women, and children, be justified? Was not the massacre as repugnant to Christian ideas as the recent massacre of the Armenians?

The massacre did not take place in the Christian dispensation, and Joshua is not to be judged by Christian standards. The revelation of God's character has been progressive. Joshua's conception of him was as a God of justice and righteousness. The Canaanites had obtained possession of the land by just such methods as were used against them. They were, moreover, reeking with horrible the Christian religion first of all; to wean them from their idols and heathen practices, and then, with the love of Jesus implanted in their hearts, to educate their minds. All missionaries find this method the best. The rest of your letter refers to the talk of a sceptic, to whom you should give no attention.

I. A. H. What is the proper course for one who believes he is called to preach, but who realizes that only the well-informed can succeed, and that his education has been limited? If he is sincere, to whom and where could he go for the necessary aid, he being only twenty-two years old?

There are excellent institutions established for the training and equipment of young men, who are situated just as you are. Among them are the Moody Schools at Northfield, Moody Institute, Chicago, and Baptist Training School, Chicago. The fees are almost nominal. If you cannot go to any of these, however, you can doubtless find some means of supplementing your education near at hand, and you can meanwhile undertake such simple lines of Christian work as are open in your own locality, trusting and waiting for the development of future opportunities in larger fields.

Subscriber, Alburts, Pa. Where is the guardian angel of an innocent child, for which parents prayed every day for protection of soul and body, and still the poor child is suddenly taken away? We do pray now, but are under a dark cloud.

The Christian religion teaches us that death is not the evil that the unspiritual mind holds it to be; that there are many things to be far more dreaded than death. The old Greek mother, so runs the legend, prayed that her two sons might receive the highest blessing heaven could bestow, and she found them both dead, which proved to her heart that her petition had indeed been heard, and that the greatest of all blessings was to be released from earthly trials and sorrows, and received into the heavenly mansions. We are overcome by human sorrow on the death of a loved one, but if we could only see behind the cloud—as should happen to know such a person, kindly persuade him to let a little Christian brotherly love into his heart. It will be a great comfort if you win him over.

Miss Emma Nason, the missionary among the Michigan lumbermen, writes us from Ute Ste Marie as follows:

Received yours with $15 from your generous readers for the work here. We cannot express thanks for this timely help. We had been sent from home after a poor young orphan girl who was in a disreputable log-cabin in the woods. We had hardly money to reach home, but through your help we received the girl, and since then have helped three others. One we had prayed almost a year to find.

J. A. L. Why did not Zebedee follow Christ as is recorded in Matt. 4: 21. His sons left nets to go after him?

There is no mention of Jesus having him. Perhaps his age may have been advanced for him to endure the hardship the disciples had to bear. There is no mention of his being afterwards identified with Christ, though Salome, his wife, is mentioned among the women who ministered to him watched him on the cross. It is conjectured on several grounds that Zebedee died early in the career of Christ.

Reader, Pleasant Grove, Pa. Is there any natural warrant for the statement which a parrot made in my hearing, that once the parrot's voice is heard, God will keep him safe the day of Christ?

There are several passages which encourage the hope that none who have been united to Christ by saving faith will ever perish. Of the most important is John 10: 28: "unto them eternal life and they shall not perish." Another is 1. Cor. 1: 8, 9: "Who also confirm you unto the end," etc. Another is 1. Peter 1: 5: "Who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation." But these, there are many passages in the Testament, implying the unchanging love of God, who is able to keep those who trust him faithful to the end. The doctrine

AKHOR-KAPOU LIGHT-HOUSE, ENTRANCE TO THE BOSPHORUS . . . IMPERIAL PALACE OF BEYLERBEY, ON THE BOSPHORUS.

The cables have lately brought intelligence of the probability of an American warship being allowed to enter the Dardanelles and act as a guardship for the protection of American interests on the Bosphorus. Such a vessel would pass the places shown in our illustrations after entering the Straits.

vices, a people who must contaminate any who came in contact with them. As a matter of fact, those who were spared did infinite mischief to the Hebrew people. God designed to have a pure nation, who should become the teachers of religion to the whole world, and in those times the utter extermination of the foul and filthy nation of the Canaanites was in accord with the spirit of justice. The Armenian massacres are not parallel in any particular. They committed no crimes deserving such savage vengeance as was meted out to them.

W. O. R., Pa. 1. Is it lawful to use God's name in novels? 2. The members of a certain congregation are in the habit of visiting each other on Sundays after the church services are over. Can it be the right thing to do? If not, how can it be remedied? 3. How would you spend the Sabbath in case you would receive visitors on that day?

1. It depends entirely on the manner in which it is used. 2. No; the day is not to be devoted to social recreation, but to "rest" or abstention from all that relates to secular employments and pleasures. Still, a gathering or reunion of friends or neighbors might be turned to advantage by choosing topics of a religious nature for conversation, or by joining in a song service, as many families do. 3. A Sabbath "Hour of Song" would be enjoyed by all, and could not give offence to any visitors.

S. D. B., Waterville, Minn. Are you taking contributions now for the suffering Armenians?

Yes. Notwithstanding our intention of closing the Armenian Fund months ago, the great sympathy of our readers, and the urgent appeals to continue the good work, left us no alternative. All contributions for this purpose will be gratefully received. The money has been applied to the relief work in the field, the money being distributed through the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

Mrs. J. L., Fortyfort, Pa. A friend of mine says that the Bible is a book of promises, and that the promises are all that count. Is this true?

we shall both see and know hereafter—our sorrow would be turned to joy. Children who depart early are saved from many of the temptations that might have beset them. They are lambs safely folded in the Shepherd's bosom. See Matt. 19: 14; Acts 2: 30; Isaiah 40: 11.

Mary, J. A., Boise Valley, Idaho. 1. Who was the founder of the first Sunday School, and where did it start? 2. Also, what was its denomination?

1. It was founded by Robert Raikes, a printer, of Gloucester, England, in 1784. 2. As he was a regular attendant at Gloucester Cathedral, it is fair to assume that he was an Episcopalian, but the school he founded was un denominational.

E. S., Egan City, Ill. 1. How may a person, who works in the night, keep the fourth Commandment? 2. Does the Scriptural Sabbath include all the time from 12 o'clock, Saturday night until 12 o'clock Sunday night?

1. Only works of necessity or mercy are justifiable, and the individual conscience must discriminate whether the work in question belongs to either category. 2. It is almost universally so construed in Christian communities.

J. Mc. A., Detroit, Mich. What is the object of the proposed observance of a "Bird Day," as has been suggested in some quarters for our public schools?

It is a humane suggestion, intended to stimulate the love of the children for the feathered race. It is understood that the Agricultural Department of the United States Government regards the proposition favorably.

J. H. Black, Halifax, N. S. Some time ago I forwarded some questions to THE MAIL-BAG, which have not been answered. Will you kindly answer? . . .

Your questions were answered in our issue of August 12 on page 500. As the questions you now ask are practically the same as those to which we replied then, you must excuse our repeating the answers. We would specially ask you to note, however, that a man may be both a Christian and a gentleman. On the other hand, it is inconceivable how one who loves to parade as a bully, who makes false charges and supplements them with senseless threats, can lay claim to either title. If you he bring reproach on the name of Christ.

S. S. Teacher, South Manchester, Conn. How long did Solomon reign? 2. Was he the author of Proverbs, Solomon's Song and Ecclesiastes?

1. He was probably about twenty years of age. Josephus says he was fourteen and historians say twelve, but as Rehoboam was born before the commencement of Solomon's reign, he was little likely to have been young as that. He reigned forty years (1 Kings 11: 42), and Rehoboam was four years old when he succeeded him. (1 Kings 14: 21.) 2. A portion of the Book of Proverbs is expressly attributed to other men; another portion to Agur and another to Lemuel. These, we may take it for granted, were not written by Solomon. Of the remainder, probably he was the author, though they may not have been written by him. They were treasured up by persons about the court, and compiled with similar literary matter at a later period. Modern scholars do not think Solomon wrote either the Song or Ecclesiastes. It is believed that both books are of late date, but the inspired author, in the former, with an incident of Solomon's reign and, in the latter, described Solomon's experience. They are so true to life, that it is difficult to determine whether this theory is true, or whether Solomon actually wrote the book.

Reader, Denver, Colo. Was Job justified in his challenge (Job 6: 24), "Cause me to see wherein I have erred?"

The author is depicting a man under affliction, who is distressed because his friends assume that his suffering is inflicted as a punishment for some grievous sin. Job feels unjust is such a charge and he naturally turns to his accusers "I am not conscious of having committed any sin so heinous as to call for such punishment. Show me, if you can, I have sinned?" As we know from the chapter of the book, Job's affliction was not punishment, but in those days any man specially afflicted was liable to be suspected of secret sin. The book was probably written with the object of correcting that cruel theory. After all these centuries, however, there are many people who still hold it.

Indian Peasants of Mexico.

Home, Social and Industrial Life of a Picturesque People.

MEXICAN STREET PEDDLER

ut unique and unequaled as its picturesque soil and people undoubtedly are, like Aladdin's lamp, the magic soil of Mexico has always some new wonder, fresh, novel and beautiful, with which to charm the eye of the tourist, the pen of the poet, or the brush of the artist.

Class distinction in Mexico is almost as great as that of India. Since the disunion of church and state in 1857, however, the native Aztec—Indian peon and laborer—and the mestizos, or half-breed, have gained, with freedom, many educational and industrial advantages, without losing, as yet, quite all of their native picturesqueness and flavor. When the old ecclesiastical institution and University of Mexico was abolished and replaced by special schools of law, medicine, letters, agriculture, sciences, commerce, and the like, together with numerous lower and public schools, supported by the State and public grants, the peon and the mestizos (half-breed Indian and white) were given their first chance by Spain for industrial improvement and education. As the Indian and mestizos element predominate in Mexico, forming a total of 8,000,000, the backwardness and foresight that provided better equipment for the native tillers and workers of the soil must be commended. At least for the advantages thus gained by the poor peon and peasant, looked upon as they are by the Spanish andee and cultured Creole.

With 8,103 public schools and a large number of mills and factories, employing, in one instance, upwards of 1,400 operatives, it will be seen that the educational and industrial condition of the Indian and mestizos of to-day is steadily advancing and improving.

The bulk of population in Mexico is confined to its high plateaus, thus affording the native residents of the country the great advantage of living in the tierra templada, or temperate land or climate. This division of her three zones is charming, fertile and productive, having none of the climatic drawbacks peculiar to the tierra caliente, or hot land, or the tierra fria, cold land, which covers half the country. The tierra templada, or temperate land, grows coffee, sugar and vegetables in abundance. From the "cold" come the cereals, hardy vegetables, and the maguay, or aloe—out of which native liquor is made—with paper, bread and cord. The hot region furnishes cotton, rice, vanilla, hemp, sarsaparilla, peppers, anise-seed, cocoa, cassia, and other original local products, and tropical fruits. The native vegetables are fully all grown on the famous "Floating Gardens," and towed down the Viga canal to the city markets. Our illustration on this page shows how some of these products, raised by peasant truck farmers, are brought to market.

The future industry and commerce of Mexico is largely dependent on her natural products, and while agriculture is limited to topography of land, it is the Mexican's one powerful resource. Everything can be grown in Mexico; and as the rainy season comes in summer, the farmer and gardener sows in May and in October usually gathering two equal crops of wheat and Indian corn.

In Vera Cruz, three crops are realized. The farm lands of the Indian peasant in Mexico are not such as are known in New England. Their methods are primitive, and climatic lassitude has its effect. Threshing machines, reapers, ploughs, and mowers are now seen at work, however, in northern and central table-lands.

As the climate is mild, and the demand for daily necessities less than in the United States, the peasant class of Mexico live cheaply. The scale of living lies between the luxuries of Eastern civilization and the frontier life of the West. It is far inferior to the scale of living among the poorer classes of the South, and home life, as we know it, is wholly absent. There are no independent peasant houses, and the rooms occupied by the family are usually on the ground floor, badly lighted and ventilated. The country peasantry own the mud or adobe cabins in which they dwell, and their domestic life is a strange one. All its details are seen by the passer-by, and the common laborer has no use for chairs, tables, or bed. A roll of rush matting is used for the latter. The women employ the morning hours grinding corn on a "metate," or flat stone for making the tortillas, which are eaten with "frijoles," or boiled brown beans. The native dress of the peasantry is quite picturesque. The men wear straw hats, white cotton shirts and trousers, and carry the brilliant hued zerape or blanket for the chill of early morning and evening. The costume of the women is equally simple, consisting generally of a white bodice and skirt, with a shawl or rebozo of gay colors, wound gracefully about the head and shoulders. Their petticoats are also gay in color, and much cheap jewelry is worn. Sandals of rawhide are worn by both sexes.

The most lovable side of Mexican character centres in domestic virtues and qualities: tenderness towards the young, and veneration and care for the aged being fixed rules of conduct with all classes. Manual labor is seldom performed by the upper classes, and while ingenuity and skill are not lacking, there is everywhere need of good technical training.

The hold of Protestantism on the Mexican people has doubled in the last ten years, and while the Mexicans are not a reading population, nearly 4,000,000 pages of religious literature is annually published. True bravery and a spirit of courage has been needed for effectual missionary effort in Mexico, but all that can be done for the protection of missionaries and religious liberty to-day is done by the Liberal Government. Protestantism is represented by the following missions: Methodist Episcopal Church (South) 1886, 3 missionaries and their wives, 21 out stations, 17 churches, 445 communicants, 18 Sunday Schools, 337 scholars, 269 students, 1 theological seminary, 10 students, 5 girls' schools, 110 scholars. Methodist Episcopal Church (North) 1873, 1 missionary and wife, 2 other ladies, 219 church members, 145 Sabbath scholars, 128 day scholars. Presbyterian church (North), 2 missionaries and wives, 2 other ladies, and 2 native preachers.

Worried to Death.

TO say "we are worried to death" is a common expression; but do we really comprehend the terrible truth of the remark? Do we realize that the hounds of care, and anxiety, and fretful inability, may actually tear and torment us into paralysis, or palsy, or dementia; and as virtually worry us to death, as a collie dog worries a sheep, or a cat worries a mouse? And yet, if we are Christian men and women, worrying is just the one thing not needful; for there are more than sixty admonitions in the Bible against it; and the ground is so well covered by them, that between the first "Fear not" and the last, every unnecessary anxiety is met, and there is not a legitimate subject for worrying left.

Are we troubled about meat and money matters? We are told to consider the fowls of the air; they sow not; neither do they reap nor gather into barns; yet your Heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?

Have we some malignant enemy to fight? Fear not! If God be for us, who can be against us?

Are we in sorrow? I, even I, am He that comforteth you.

Are we in doubt and perplexity? I will bring the blind by a way that they know not. I will lead them in paths they have not known. I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight.

Do we fear that our work is beyond our strength? He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might, He increaseth strength.

Are we sick? He has promised to make all our bed in our sickness.

Do we fear death? He has assured us that in the valley and shadow of death He will be with us.

Is the worry not for ourselves, but for wife and children that will be left without support and protection? Even this last anxiety is provided for. Leave thy fatherless children to me, and let thy widows trust in me, and I will preserve them alive.

Now, if we really believe that God made these promises, how shameful is our distrust! Do we think that God will not keep his word? Do we doubt his goodwill toward us? When he says, that he will make all things work together for our good, is the Holy One lying to our sorrowful hearts? Thirty years ago, I was thrown helpless, penniless, and friendless upon these assurances of God; and in thirty years, he has never broken a promise. He is a God that keepeth both mercy and truth. I believe in his goodness. I trust in his care. I would not, by worrying, tell him to his face, that he either has not the power or the goodwill to help and comfort me.

Worriers live under a very low sky. They allow nothing for probabilities and "Godsends." They suffer nothing to go by faith. All times and all places, supply them with material. In summer, it is the heat and the dogs, and the hydrophobia. In winter, it is the cold, and the price of coal. They take all the light and comfort out of home pleasures; and abroad, their complaints are endless. Yet to argue with worriers, is of little use: convince them at every point, and the next moment, they return to their old aggravating, vaporing credo.

What remains for them then? They must pray to God, and help themselves. Egotism and selfishness, is at the bottom of all worrying. If they will just remember, that there is no reason why they should be exempted from the common trials of humanity, they may step at once on to higher ground; for even worrying is humanized, when it is no longer purely selfish and personal.

It is usually idle people who worry.

Men and women whose every hour is full of earnest business, do not try to put two hours' care and thought into one. Even a positive injury or injustice, drops easily from an honestly busy man. He has not time to keep a catalogue of his wrongs, and worry about them. He simply casts his care upon him, who has promised to care for him—for his health, and wealth, and happiness, and good name: for all the events of his life, and for all the hopes of his future.

Worriers would not like to see written down, all the doubtful things they have said of God; and all the ill-natured things they have said of men;—besides, they might consider, that they are often righteously worried; and only suffering the due reward of some folly of their own. Would it not be better to ask God, to put right, what they have put wrong? to lay hold of all that is good in the present; to refuse to look forward to any possible change for the worse. I know a good man, who when he feels inclined to worry over events, takes a piece of paper, and writes his fears down; and so faces "the squadron of his doubts," finding generally, that they vanish as they are mustered.

Come, let us take Cheerfulness as a companion. Let us say "farewell" to Worrying. Cheerfulness, will bid us ignore perplexities and annoyances; and help us to rise above them. God loves a cheerful liver; and when we consider the sin and sorrow, the poverty and ignorance, on every side of us, we may well hold our peace, from all words, but those of gratitude and thanksgiving. Worrying is self-torment. It is always preparing "for the worst," and yet never fit to meet it. Cheerfulness, is a kind of magnanimity; it listens to no repinings; it outlooks shadows; it turns necessity to glorious gain; and so breathing on every gift of God, Hope's perpetual joy, it enables us, mild pleasant yesterdays, and confident to-morrows.

To travel on life's common way,
In cheerful godliness.

An Infidel's Late Repentance.

REV. HOWARD OSGOOD, the eminent Biblical scholar and critic, is the authority for the following remarkable story, for the truth of which he vouches: Abraham Kuenan, the leader of the destructive school of critics in Holland, published a book some time before his death, entitled: Prophets and Prophecy in Israel. The book was written, as it now appears, at the request of a wealthy man, who delighted in Biblical studies, but who was a disbeliever in the supernatural, and who denied the authority of the Scriptures.

The book appeared in London, with a long preface by the man who had called it forth, and who paid the cost of its publication. The year of its publication was 1878. Suddenly, in 1881, the sale ceased; no copy could be bought from the publishers in England, or the Continent. The remnant of the edition unsold had been evidently suppressed. Only a Dutch edition of the book could be had.

Dr. Osgood wrote to Prof. Kuenan for an explanation of this withdrawal of the volume from sale. Dr. Kuenan explained that a year before his death, the proprietor of the book began to suspect that he and Dr. Kuenan were both wrong, and immediately ordered the circulation thereof to be stopped. In other words the man who had sent it forth, repented of his deed, and, as far as possible, attempted to repair the damage done.

His earlier belief in the supernatural seems to have come back to him. Slowly, but surely, the Bible regained its authority over him, and, as Dr. Osgood says: "The strongest book written against the Bible and published in England in this generation was withdrawn by the very hand that sent it forth."

Slavery in the Soudan.

The Traffic in Human Flesh Still Prevails in Hausaland—Slave-Raiding Chiefs.

THAT the slave trade with all its horrors still continues to flourish in the Western Soudan, within the French sphere of influence, and in the Eastern Soudan, under the rule of the Khalifa, we have shown in previous articles. In the intervening region, the Central Soudan, or Hausaland, within the British sphere of influence, the inhuman traffic is to-day, as in years gone by, claiming annually its thousands of hapless victims. Some time ago, a contributor to the Pall Mall Gazette, who had traveled through Hausaland, gave an interesting account of that country, and also of the slave trade he had witnessed there. His statements have been corroborated by members of government expeditions, and by the British and Foreign Anti Slave Society.

The great centre of the slave trade in Hausaland is to be found in its commercial capital, the City of Kano, situated at about equal distance from the Niger River, the Benue River and Lake Tshad. Kano has rightly been called the London and the Manchester of the Central Soudan. Here "the Tuareg of the desert comes in touch with the natives of Adamawa and the South: the Arab merchant meets with traders from Lake Tshad on the one side, and from the Niger or the Atlantic seaboard on the other. Here, too, are to be found Mussulman pilgrims, from far and near, on their way to or from Mecca." The caravans which come from North, chiefly from Tripoli, bring about 1,200 camel loads per annum of European produce. The importance of the town as a commercial centre is due as much to its extensive native industries as to its position. Chief among these industries is the weaving of cloth from native cotton, and the making and dyeing of various articles of clothing. Kano-made cloth is sold at many points of the British West Coast, where, owing to its superior quality, it still holds its own in competition with European makes. The height of the city above sea-level is 1,690 feet, and it would be tolerably comfortable for European residents, but for the presence of large pools of stagnant water and the lack of sufficient drainage. The population, which is certainly not inferior to 100,000, is enclosed within a high mud wall, which is from thirty to forty feet in height, and fifteen miles in circumference. Their language, the Hausa has become the lingua franca or trade language of Central Africa, from the Niger to the French Soudan, and from the Sahara to the tribes of the Guinea Coast. Fifteen millions are said to speak this language, and it is the only one which is understood by the French, the British, and the Germans. The House of Commons of Great Britain has been founded with a view to develop a Christian literature in this most important language.

Hausaland is made up of a number of semi-independent provinces, the rulers of which pay annual tribute to their feudal lord the Sultan of Sokoto (the political capital is at Zaria). This tribute is paid partly in cloth and partly in slaves, the latter forming the bulk of the tribute. The Sultan of Sokoto receives from the rulers of the provinces about 10,000 slaves per annum to the Sultan of Sokoto.

In order to raise this tribute, a sultan makes war, first with this vassal chief, then with that, then with a third one, and so on, until the required number of slaves is obtained. "From Loko to Egga, a distance of 800 miles, we had frequent opportunities of seeing this system at work," says a writer, who traveled in that country. "At Nassarawa, the chief was absent on a slave-raiding expedition; at Jimbamboro, the chief was not 'feeling sweet,' owing to the fact that twenty of his people had that very morning been seized and carried off as slaves by the people of an adjacent town; a little further on, fifteen native merchants had been seized and sold as slaves; still further a similar fate had befallen five other travelers. At Zaria, where 200 slaves were exposed for sale in the market; the Emir was absent on a slave-raid; at Kano itself, as many as a thousand slaves were brought into the town on a single occasion as the result of another such expedition. In the course of our march from Kano to Bida, we passed so many towns and villages that we ceased to keep count of them, all of which had been recently destroyed, and their inhabitants sold as slaves, not by any foreign invader, but by the king in whose territory the places were situated. Every town of any size throughout the Hausa States possesses its slave-market, where Hausa slaves are traded off by Hausa people."

Four principal slave-routes leading to Kano have been distinguished. The first is that to Tripoli, 1,800 miles in length, mostly through desert tracts; the second leads to Karka, the capital of Bornu, a town of 60,000 inhabitants; the third leads to Loko, on the River Benue; the fourth is that from Kano to Sokoto the political capital of the Hausa States.

As Hausaland lies within the British sphere of influence, we may hope that as soon as British occupation becomes effective, the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, and those members of Parliament who have the honor of Great Britain at heart, will use all their influence to induce the British Government to take such measures as shall first, stop these suicidal intertribal wars, and then gradually abolish the legal status and the practice of slavery. Let us hope that when that time comes the Philafrican Liberator's League may be enabled to enter this needy field.

Our illustrations on this page are from recent photographs taken in the Congo district, where the hottest warfare has been waged against the Arab slavers. The Congo warriors belong to a remote tribe, whose members practice a peculiar mutilation of the ears.

Gospel Among Pima Indians.

Mr. W. U. Gill, Missionary of the A. S. S. U. at Phoenix, Ariz., has sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a brief account of a very interesting Gospel work in his vicinity. He says: "Within four miles of my home is a branch of the Pima tribe of Indians who, until very recently, have been almost entirely deprived of Gospel privileges. Prof. Geo. Blount, of the Union High School at Phoenix, his daughter, myself, wife, and others have been holding meetings with them since June last. We have been meeting under a brush arbor, but will soon need a house of worship even in this warm climate. I suggested to the Indians that if they would go to work and make the adobes and put up the walls, I was confident that their white friends would put on the roof and otherwise finish the building. This they have agreed to do, and have selected the site and cleared off the ground in the middle of their reservation. We need several hundred dollars for the work."

Explorers Slain by Cannibals.

NEWs has been received of the massacre of a party of Austrian explorers, on the Island of Guadalcanal, the most savage of all the Solomon Island group in the Southern Archipelago. The intelligence was brought by the seaman; Gustave Chalanpak, a native guide from Titari, and Petty Officer Marasca.

This tragedy of the Guadalcanal is of double significance, coming as it does immediately after the catastrophe in Madagascar of this year, in the same group of islands. A crew from a trading schooner be-steamer Monowai, which reached San Francisco on October 22. Guadalcanal is the only island that explorers had not entered for the purpose of scientific investigation. Its mountains rise to an altitude of 8,000 feet, and there is an active volcano and a mountain called the "Lion's Head." The exploring party left Sydney in the Austrian man-of-war Albatross for a cruise around the islands, and Baron Foulton von Norbeck, Lieutenant Budick, two midshipmen, twenty sailors, the Baron's two servants and two native guides started for the summit of the mountain. After a fatiguing march of two days one midshipman and seven sailors returned to the ship, the Baron, Lieutenant Budick and their men continuing their journey up the mountain. Several bushmen were met on the way. As the party neared the mountain top Baron Norbeck suddenly observed a bushman, who appeared to be a chief. The bushman came into view, near the summit, two shots were immediately heard lower down the mountain in direction of the camp, seemingly a signal for attack. A score of bushmen rushed out from hidden places, and the Baron was struck on the neck with a tomahawk. The bushmen attacked the party with clubs, but were repulsed by the sailors, many of them being wounded. Baron Norbeck died three hours after his return to camp. Of the party who remained in camp, Midshipman Debenfort had been cut to death, two sailors and a native guide had been killed, and five sailors and a guide wounded. A relief party was sent from the Albatross to convey the dead and wounded back to the ship. The Austrian officers and men who lost their lives are: Henry, Baron Foulton von Norbeck, Midshipman Arand Debenfort, Jacob Dokivio, Ore Wagon Trains of the West.

RUDE and rough as its surroundings usually are, there is always a certain picturesqueness and fascination about the atmosphere of a mine. A feature of interest connected with the mining districts and towns of Colorado, Utah, Idaho, Montana and other mining States is the ore wagon mule train used to carry the crude product from the mines to what is called the smelters. These trains are often seen passing through such western towns as Ouray, Silverton, Leadville, Creede, Fairplay and Cripple Creek. Colorado and New Mexico they are very frequent, the mules often having miles to travel with their heavy loads. The train is usually composed of two or sixteen mules and as many wagons as the output of ore calls for. As will be seen in our illustration, two or more wagons are often linked together and drawn by the whole train of mules in front. The still more primitive and burdensome method of strapping sacks of ore upon the backs of the patient little "burros," is still to be met with in some of the rougher and more mountainous districts. Later methods and improvements show tunnel, railroads, and cable tracts, sometimes down the steep incline of a great mountain, where the ore is sent down a chute to the distant smelter short order.

After the ore reaches the smelter it is crushed and reduced, and the gold and silver extracted by "leaching." In the process of leaching tanks are filled with two-thirds of the pulverized ore, water turned on, and the running mass is allowed to filter through and run to waste. After passing through other processes, the material left is heated in crucibles, again reduced to the metallic state, and cast in bars.

Why Birds go to the Arctic.

The number of birds that go to the Arctic region is inconceivable. They go by thousands, but by millions, to rear their young on the tundra, or vast, barren, bound fields of the North, where, strange to say, there is abundant vegetation, consisting of cranberry, cloudberry, crowberry bushes, bearing heavy crops of fruit during a short season. Each year the snow descends on this immense crop of ripe food before the birds have time to gather it. It is then preserved beneath the snow, fresh and pure, and the melting of the snow discloses the bushes with the unconsumed last year's crop hanging from them, or lying, ready to be eaten, on the ground. The frozen meal stretches across the breadth of Asia.

NATIVE WARRIORS OF THE CONGO.

A Good Education.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning November 15.
Proverbs 6: 1-11; 9: 9, 10.

WHAT education is, and what it is for, are matters on which there are wide differences of opinion. In these latter days we have resorted to the system of loading a child's mind with a quantity of facts which he is expected to remember, and to be able to state when required. We try to make him a living encyclopedia of useful information, so that the scholars of whom we are most proud can tell in the moment the distance of the sun from the earth, the date of the battle, and the Latin name of a plant. All this is useful in its way, and the child, when he comes into the business of life will find it an advantage to know all these facts. Some of them he may have no occasion to use, but that cannot be foreseen and if he is well-equipped he will have the information he does need as a nucleus which can be enlarged, and the facts that are useless to him in his walk of life, can be forgotten. But when all this has been done, is the child educated? No, there is more to be done, he needs various accomplishments. He has to be taught to read, to write, to cipher, to speak grammatically, and to reason. If the child belongs to the classes that are called the upper classes, there are other things that the parents want him to be able to do, such as to speak one or two other languages besides his own, to dance, to know how to bear himself according to the laws of etiquette. So we have two features of education, the acquisition of knowledge, and the training to do certain things. When these two objects are accomplished, is the child educated? In too many cases, the answer is in the affirmative. But the one quality which can preserve the child from evil, and provide for his exerting a wholesome influence on society, has not been touched. We can conceive of a young man having a thorough knowledge of science and history, and being an expert logician and mathematician, yet being an altogether bad man, a Frankenstein's monster without conscience or moral sense. The better educated such a man might be, the more mischief he might do. So something more is required in order that the world may be a better world than it now is, and that the generation may be more elevated than the present one. The child needs to have right principles, to know right from wrong, and to be trained to keep his animal propensities in subjection. It is precisely this important feature which is so often omitted in education. The child does not get it at school where the teacher is too busy imparting information, and giving mental training to teach righteousness, unselfishness, and purity of soul. Nor does he always get it at home where the father is exhausted by his hard labor, and the mother is engrossed by her domestic duties. In the Sunday school once a week, the child may get the glimmering of the needs of this neglected part of his being. With this poor assistance, the youth is thrust into a world full of strong temptations, and we wonder that he falls into sin! We have to re-constitute our ideas of education if we are to get better results, and to begin where the wise king advised us to begin: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy is understanding."

WHAT SHALL I DO?

WHAT shall I do lest life in silence pass?
And if it do.
And never prompt the bray of noisy brass.
What need'st thou rue?
Remember aye the ocean deeps are mute;
The shallows roar;
Worth is the Ocean—Fame is but the bruit
Along the shore.
What shall I do to be forever known?
Thy duty ever.
This did full many who yet slept unknown—
Oh! never, never! [unknown]
Think'st thou, perchance, that they remain
Whom thou know'st not? [blown—
By angel-trumps in heaven their praise is Divine their lot.
What shall I do to gain eternal life?
Discharge aright
The simple dues with which each day is rife;
Yea, with thy might.

Ere perfect scheme of action thou devise
Will life be fled.
While he, who ever acts as conscience cries,
Shall live, though dead.

OUR CHRIST.

HOLDING His hand, my steadied feet
May walk the air, the seas;
On life and death His smile falls sweet,— Lights up all mysteries:
Stranger nor exile can I be
In new worlds where He leadeth me.

Not my Christ only: He is ours;
Humanity's close bond;
Key to its vast, unopened powers,
Dream of our dreams beyond—
What yet we shall be, none can tell:
Now are we His, and all is well.

International Combinations.

Prophetic Aspect of the New Grouping of the Great Powers of the World.

BY DR. B. O. KINNEAR.*

EVENTS are now taking place of a most striking nature, not only to the prophetic student, but to every thoughtful observer, in every country and in every nation. Many secular writers upon the actions of the various great Powers of the world in late years forecast vast territorial changes all over the earth in the near future.

This is an era of mighty combines—both financial and national. A combination of European Powers extending from the Euphrates to Spain has long been the dream and hope of a multitude in Europe.

For twenty years, with an increasing longing, the British race have dreamed of and hoped for "Imperial Federation," until, in this present year, it is spoken of as feasible, and a probability in the near future. And not only a federation of Great Britain and her colonies, but an earnest desire is expressed for an alliance between the two great English-speaking nations—the United States and Great Britain.

Russia is rapidly extending her control of the East in China, to the South in Persia, and at present has the chief attention of the "unspeakable Turk" or Edomite. France, under Russia's potent influence, may hold out her arms to Prince Louis Napoleon, who is now a Russian officer, and may presently obtain either supreme power or great power in France through Russian influence. That he will become a prominent figure before the world a little later on we have but small doubt.

Here, then, we have three great combinations of powers believed to be imminent by thinkers and statesmen.

How do such unions agree with the "Word of God" in its presentation of the conjunctions of peoples in the days previous to the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ to rule the world personally? In Ezekiel (chapters 36-39) we have a minute account of the final union of the two houses of Israel (Judah and the Ten Tribes) into one nation, upon the mountains of Palestine, received again into God's favor, and of a great battle between Gog [Russia], the chief prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal, and the "Merchants of Tarshish, and the Young Lions thereof," which is simply another name to represent Great Britain and her colonies, with which may be joined the United States, forming a vast and mighty confederacy.

Such a combination, impossible as it once appeared, and even now astonishing, is not only dreamed of, but considered seriously, as a possible event. God says that this union takes place only at a time when he will deliver Israel from all her enemies, and make her one nation for evermore. The inference from this is, that the Lord's coming to do this must be near at hand.

We are told in Isaiah 26, that at the end of this age God is coming out to punish the Gentile nations for their iniquity, and Israel is told to "enter into her chambers and close her doors (or strong places) about her, until this indignation is overpast;" therefore, the whole nationality of Israel must form an offensive and defensive alliance in the last days.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

Adriatic Fisher-Folk.

Their Lives Passed on Sea, Lake and Canal. An Industry that is Never Dull.

Among the many "lovers of the sea," the fisher-folk of the Adriatic may be said to constitute a distinctive class. Their calling is one in which they take a peculiar pride, and it has, in many instances, been the chosen industry of families through many generations. In and out among the numerous islets of the Venetian Archipelago, along the shores of the beautiful city, their picturesque boats—still rigged after a fashion prevalent more than a century ago—have drawn their nets and brought to market their living cargoes. There are few coasts in any country that afford better fishing-grounds. The city itself stands on 117 islands intersected by 150 canals, and this vast network is, in turn, almost completely surrounded by the Mediterranean tide-waters. No wonder that Venice is still the paradise of gondo liers and fishermen, as it once was the haven of the greatest navies and the richest merchant fleets in the world.

One of our photographs on this page, shows a typical modern Venetian fishing-boat. Strongly built and seaworthy, it has something of the appearance of the ancient caravels of the days of Columbus. The second illustration gives us a glimpse of a nook of the fish-market, where the vender, with his stall covered with newly-caught fish of the species peculiar to the Mediterranean waters, is carefully displaying them to best advantage and awaiting the arrival of customers, while several persons, some of them doubtless fishmongers like himself, stand about. The slow, easy-going life of the Venetians, rich or poor, is in strange contrast with that of our own people, as any visitor to an American fish-market, such as that in Fulton Street, New York, cannot fail to remark. But everything is slow in Venice, and time, which seems to fly with the speed of lightning in our Western latitude, seems to drag on leaden wings on the shores of the beautiful Adriatic.

Have You a "Thinking Corner"?

It would be well if every young man and woman had some nook where they could get away by themselves occasionally—at regular intervals, if possibly—for study and reflection. He should have a time to himself, free from all distractions and without interruption. Parents should see that their children have their own place, any place won't do, and they cannot share with another. They should encourage their children to study and reflect. A child who shrivels a boy's budding thought, encouragement will ripen it. Then, too, get away by yourself for prayer; you will enrich your soul. (The Christian Herald) The influence over all your life if you make it a resort where you can examine your own heart and let it come into harmony with God.

Health in Wood and Field.

It is every housekeeper's duty to keep her house in sanitary condition, says a thoughtful writer, but there are many ways of economizing time and labor if pride is put away. There are many superfluous trifles in our rooms, attractive no doubt, but they must be cared for, which may be put away for awhile; we can make our cooking plainer, perhaps; and the family's health will not suffer if the kitchen stove is not polished every day, and the floor may be slighted a little; less time spent in the "corners." If we only try we can find the time to spend with the children in the open air, in woods and fields. The benefits will come to the mothers and children alike, in better health, closer bonds between them, and an increase of the love and knowledge of the ways of dear, beautiful, old Nature.

Borrowing Trouble.

The world is full of borrowed troubles—troubles that never come. It is related that an aged man when dying, said to his sons: "I have had a great deal of State. The greatest possible lung capacity involves the highest possible physical conditions. We should have systematic, definite physical training, under experienced instructors, just as mental development is secured. The district school must not be left out, if the country boy and girl secure the all-around development which makes efficient men and women in the various avenues of life."

The Passion for Display.

There are few persons who can resist the temptation to display their possessions at times. It is a touch of vanity that seems almost universal. A writer on this subject relates a recent experience, which shows a trait of character that most of our readers will recognize in some of their own acquaintances. "I went four miles to call on a friend who is usually a delightful conversationalist, and what do you think she did? She spent every minute showing me her dresses and bonnets." It is well, in our own homes, to repress any temptation to vain display of our own belongings or abilities. Pride and vanity are poor diet on which to feed the youthful minds of our children, and are certain to injure in the end. A boastful purse-proud father, a vain or frivolous mother, are unfit examples for the rising generation.

A Hint for Young Men.

Carry your religion with you and don't be ashamed of it. People will respect it wherever you go and will trust you and like you all the better for it. It is learned that a prominent bank in New York recognized this principle in a very emphatic way, recently. A young man was wanted for a responsible position and there were many applicants. The following questions were asked by the president of the bank: What church do you attend? What Sunday

MY WORK.

MASTER, to do great work for thee, hand Is far too weak! Thou givest what may be Some little chips to cut with care minute, Or tint, or grave, or polish. Others stand Before their quarried marble fair and grand And make a life-work of the great design Which thou hast traced; or many skill combine To build vast temples, gloriously planned. Yet take the tiny stones which I have wrought Just one by one, as they were given by thee Not knowing what came next in thy thought;

Set each stone by the master hand of grace Form the mosaic as thou wilt for me, And in thy temple pavement give it place.

FRANCIS RIDLEY HAVERGAL

Going to School in China.

ETIQUETTE is carried almost alarming excess in China. Probably no more interesting description of the extravagant language, and, to our eyes, almost absurd forms in use in Chinese society has ever appeared than this truthful picture of the reception of a new scholar at a Protestant school. The narrator is F. L. H. Pott, a missionary and the principal of St. John's College, Shanghai: "The fathers of the boys attending college," said Mr. Pott, "are usually physicians, merchants, or scholars. They are all Chinese gentlemen. Of course I have to adapt myself to the etiquette of the Chinese; and so, when a father arrives with his boy, I escort them to my Chinese reception-room, where the father and each shake our own hands most heartily and bow profoundly. I then say to him: 'What is your honorable name?' He replies, 'My mean, insignificant name is Wong.' Then I say, 'Please be seated and point to a seat in the back of the room, at the left of the table. He immediately takes the right-hand seat nearest the door—the post of lowest honor. I tell him to go up higher. He declares that is unworthy. Then I catch hold of him to force him to go higher, and he holds me to prevent it. We have quite a vigorous struggle, lasting some time. Finally he accepts a compromise, and takes a seat about half-way up the side of the room. I sit down on the lower side.

"Before beginning our conversation I send for tea, and when it arrives I say, 'Please use tea.' When he has taken some tea we talk. He asks innumerable polite questions about myself. A Chinese gentleman never comes to business for a quarter or half an hour. Time no troubles an Oriental. He begins by saying, 'What is your honorable name?' of course, reply that my mean, insignificant name is Pott. The next question from him is, 'What is your honorable kingdom?' And I am obliged, much as I dislike it, to say, 'The small, petty district from which I come is the United States of America.' 'How many little stars have you sprouted?' he says. That is the way he asks how old I am. 'I have vainly spent thirty years,' I reply. 'After my father, he says, 'Is the honorable and great man of the household?' 'It is shocking, I know, but I have to answer, 'The old man is well.'

"Then he comes to business and says, 'Venerable master, I have brought a little dog here, and worshipfully introduce him to your charge.' The little fellow, who has been standing in a corner of the room, comes forward, kneels before me, puts his hands on the ground, knocks his head on the floor, and worships me. I raise him up and send him off to school and arrangements are made about a dormitory, course of study, etc. The gentleman rises to take his leave. I have tormented you exceedingly to-day he remarks. 'Oh, no!' I answer. 'I have dishonored you.' As he goes toward the door he keeps saying, 'I am gone, I am gone,' and I reply, 'Go slowly, go slowly.' As I follow him to the gate the garden he says, 'Please refrain from golden footsteps.' When we arrive at the gate we bow reverently to each other, and he is gone."

The Blessing of Kind Words.

Never think kind words are wasted; Bread on waters cast are they, And it may be we shall find them Coming back to us some day, Coming back when sorely needed. In a time of sharp distress: So, my friend, let's give them freely, Gift and giver—God will bless.

trouble in my life, but most of it never happened." A clergyman of Virginia told his congregation one Sunday, "I declare unto you, brethren, the sharpest troubles that I ever had are those which never reached me." Others can deliver like testimony. Most people will anticipate, get into fanciful moods, imagine with great and sore imaginations what will happen, and thereby get into the sorrows. They will do it, and there is no help. What they need is a little wisdom and a little faith, and borrowed troubles will cease to annoy, either in home life or in business, or anywhere else.

Making the Children Strong.

What shall be done to make the children strong and healthy where there is a predisposition to weakness? On this subject Frances W. Leiter, who has given it much study, writes these helpful suggestions: "It is of little consequence that our children become mental prodigies if, so far as vital force is concerned, they are feeble. Weakness in the body is a handicap in all grades and classes of public schools. It is a disadvantage to the child, even if it must be secured at the expense of some other privileges provided by the School, and who is your teacher? Where do you spend your evenings? Who are your associates? Do you ever use intoxicating drinks or tobacco?

So much for the commercial value of religious profession and good habits. But there is a higher value, which the world cannot estimate.

Pleasant Home Gatherings.

Don't be too exclusive if you want to really enjoy life. Home is all the pleasure for being thrown open occasionally to our friends. A farmer's wife even can have her social chat with neighbors in her own cozy rooms, and can find it much nicer than the old way of gossiping across the fence, or at the store in the village. The wife of a farmer in Illinois declared: "The cry that the farmer's wife has the hardest of lives is not true, as a general thing; life is usually what we make it. I believe in being kind and pleasant with one's neighbors; the less you have to do with some, the better. We run in and out, go to town together, share our good things in the way of fruits, vegetables, ice cream, etc. One requires help, the rest are ready to lend a hand. This is what I call an ideal social life among farmers. The farmer's wife or daughter usually has her horse and carriage, and goes and comes where she pleases at her own sweet will."

A Rich Damascus Home.*

FROM the outside it looked like a dozen other houses in the narrow, winding street: the front having a dingy, ill-kept air. We knocked at the low door, and were admitted by a gorgeously liveried porter, who ushered us into a small, dark corridor. Opening on this corridor were several little rooms, with the usual sleeping-mat on the floor. These rooms were used as sleeping places for servants and for such messengers from a distance as were obliged to stay in town all night.

It was, doubtless, in some such lodging that the Hittite captain lay, when, recalled from the field, he foolishly "slept at the door of the king's house with all the servants of his lord, and went not down to his house"; an act of fidelity that cost him his life.

Crossing the corridor, we came into the court around which the house was built. Here, for the first time (except at Turkish baths), I saw the fabled Oriental magnificence. The court in which we found ourselves was paved with white marble and surrounded by walls of black and white stone. A fountain, shaded by blossoming orange trees, played in the center, the breeze throwing a silvery spray half-way across the marble pavement. The orange blossoms were fragrant, and an atmosphere of drowsy coolness filled the whole place.

Beside the fountain stood a tall, dark-eyed slave-girl, with a Greek or Circassian face, dressed in a long robe of some clinging, white material, her sandaled feet half-hidden by its folds. She held a tray on which were glasses and a decanter of mastic (a colorless Syrian drink, like anisette); and on the ground beside her were two nargilehs. I had scarcely seen her when the master of the house came forward to greet us. He was one of the richest men in Damascus, and a Jew. I shall call him "Ismail." His real name is too well known in Syria to mention here.

I had been expected, the mastic and nargilehs having been prepared beforehand. My host, after examining the camera, led the way to his "winter parlor," as he called it. The floor of this was of black and white marble. From the door and running to the opposite wall, was a space about five feet wide, where the floor was on a level with the outside court and doorway. This space was unfurnished, and it is here guests take off their shoes. As a foreigner, I was luckily exempt from this custom.

A platform three feet high formed the flooring of the rest of the room. This platform, a room by itself, was heavily carpeted in soft rugs, and furnished (shades of Mohammed!) with a regulation "parlor set" of pale blue silk upholstered furniture, evidently imported from Paris or London. About the wall, however, ran a low Eastern divan, which partially atoned for the glaring chairs and sofa. The walls had a groundwork of colored marble, but were paneled with inlaid mother-of-pearl and ivory. A heavy chandelier hung from one end of the carved ceiling, and

In a corner at the back of the room was a bookcase that held a few Arabic tomes; English and French works; but foremost and evidently most used were copies of Rousseau. I believe that I have long since forgotten his teachings. Still, I saw here common ground to work on, so, calling my host's attention to the remotest knowledge of the subject, my defeat is hardly to be wondered at.

My declaration that I was unable to contend against such an homme des lettres as he evidently was, completed the conquest; and, charmed with his easy victory over a foreigner, he himself proposed what I had longed to ask—that he should show me over his house.

Recrossing the court, we came to the "summer parlor"—I use Ismail's terms—which was twice as large as the room we had left, the lower floor being about ten feet wide, with a fountain in the center. Two platforms, one on each side, rose from this, furnished like that in the winter parlor. On a wall shelf stood fragile vases and antique pottery (Ismail is a famous collector of such things), and the walls were paneled like the others we had seen. Directly over the fountain hung a chandelier; thus placed that its light might be reflected by the water.

We visited several other rooms: sleeping rooms (these were on the floor above), dining-room, etc. A sort of summer house opened on the court. This was built in on three sides, the fourth being entirely open to the air. The walls were formed of three large mirrors, the floor was mosaic, the ceiling frescoed and inlaid; a low stone bench covered with carved figures served as a divan.

Next to this was the synagogue. Most wealthy Jews have a private synagogue, and a rabbi who officiates there at stated times. This synagogue was the most plainly furnished room in the house. The furniture consisted of a few wooden benches and a reading-desk. On the walls hung two cheap, uncolored French prints: one representing Ishmael and Hagar; the other, Ruth and Naomi. These, except for an oil painting representing Ismail in his uniform of foreign ambassador, were the only pictures in the house. Two cupboards were let into the walls and held two religious books; one, a part of the Old Testament, the other, the Talmud. These works were written on huge parchment rolls, fastened within gem-studded silver cylinders. One servant is hired merely to guard these cylinders and to keep them in proper order. As the servant is a Jew, he treats the holy rolls with great respect, and, unable to steal any of the gems, guards the cylinders jealously.

The synagogue ended our tour of inspection. We went back to the winter parlor and lounged on the divans, to recuperate from our exertion. When the nargilehs and mastic glasses were refilled, I asked Ismail how he passed his days, and if life ever grew monotonous in such surroundings.

"I usually rise at seven," he said; "I pray and read religious books for an hour. Then I breakfast, and, during the morning, I attend to whatever business I may have in the city. After that I sleep, read Rousseau, entertain or visit my friends, and pass the day as my fancy directs. Sometimes in the evening I receive; sometimes I go to the houses of others. We are not energetic here."

"You must be a very happy man," I said, as he finished.

I meant it. A quiet, sensuous life; nargilehs and mastic ad libitum, consumed among orange-blossoms, with the cool plash of the fountain always sounding; no hurrying, no business troubles, and plenty of sleep—all offer strong attractions to a traveler fresh from the land whose motto is "Man was made to hustle."

But the Jew thought otherwise. "Happy!" he exclaimed, with a portentous sigh. "Ah, monsieur, it is not at all as it seems."

Wanderer Found Through Prayer.

A gentleman from Philadelphia came into the Bowery Mission Converts' Prayer Meeting, last week, and said that a request for prayer had been sent in for a man who had been employed by a firm in Philadelphia, and who had been driven from the concern. The man had been found through the prayer sent into the mission and had now begun a Christian life. He is now on his way back to his home.

A Talking Machine for the family at so low a price that it is brought within the purchasing power of everybody, is one of the latest achievements of scientific invention.

Berliner Gram-o-phone

Talks distinctly, sings every song with expression, plays the piano, cornet, banjo, and in fact every musical instrument with precision and pleasing effect. The plate called "The Morning on the Farm" gives a perfect reproduction of the lowing cattle, crowing of the rooster, the call of the hawk, the neigh of the horses, the bleating of the sheep, and in fact every sound which is familiar to the farmyard. The records are endless, in variety, including nearly every song you are acquainted with.

Accompanying illustration (above) shows the machine operated with hearing tubes for two people. Tubes for two people go with each machine. Extra hearing tubes, so that any number of people may hear, are furnished at 75 cents extra for each person. Two records are included with every machine. Extra records 60 cents each, $6.00 per dozen.

ALL FOR $10.00. The Outfit includes Talking Machine, Style 7 1-2, provided with revolving table, covered with felt, fly-wheel so balanced as to turn evenly and arm which holds the sound-box with reproducing diaphragm, rubber tubes as described above. The Danube's Iron Gates.

An event of considerable commercial importance in Europe was the recent opening of the Lower Danube river to navigation. This places Austro-Hungary in direct communication with the outer world, and will much to attract attention to Hungary's surprise and resources. Within the last twenty-five years important works of improvement have been carried out by the Austrian and Hungarian governments on the Upper Danube and by an International Commission at its mouth. These works, however, still left untouched the chief impediment to navigation, namely, a series of reefs and rapids occurring at intervals, along a distance of over sixty-five miles between O-Moldava and Sibb. The most and most serious obstruction is that known as the "Iron Gates," which the accompanying photographs illustrate. When the river is high the other rapids can easily be passed, but here navigation is always met with difficulties. To overcome this a canal had to be made on the right Servian bank of the river. When the plans were laid a cross dam was built at the upper end of the canal, and the river being thus diverted, work was carried on in the dry bed. On the completion of the canal another dam was constructed above the cross dam, which was then removed, and the rocks beneath it levelled, after which the second dam was blown up and the waters of the Danube turned into the canal.

Navigation has hitherto been carried on in boats drawing at most six feet, but could only pass the rapids for part of the year, and for a period of four to six months trans-shipment was rendered necessary. The original estimate of 9,000,000 florins has already been largely exceeded, and it seems probable that the eventual cost will approach 20,000,000.

The opening of one of the chief natural arteries of international communication in commerce, uniting the East and West, attempted by the Romans 2,000 years ago, constitutes one of the most remarkable engineering feats of the present century, and furnishes yet another demonstration of "the empire of man over the universe."

Southwest Africa," in which he gives the following remarkable testimony to missionaries and the work they have accomplished: We quote from a translation in the Chronicle of the London Society: "What merchants, artisans, and men of science have done for the opening up and civilizing of this country, is as nothing in the balance compared with the positive results of missionary work. And this work means so much the more, because of self-regarding motives, such as always inspire the trader and the discoverer and are to be found even in the soldier, are usually altogether absent in the missionary. It must be an exalted impulse which leads the missionary to give up comfort, opportunities of advancement, honor, and fame, for the sake of realizing the idea of bringing humanity into the kingdom of God, into sonship to God, and to instill into the soul of a red or black man the mystery of the love of God. Self-interest is put aside and the missionary becomes a Nama or a Herero. He gives continually, not only from the inner treasure of his spiritual life and knowledge; in order to be able to do that, he must unweariedly play now the artisan, now the farmer, now the architect; he must always give presents, teaching, improvements, never take; he must not even expect that his self-sacrifice will be understood. And to do this for years, decades even, that truly requires more than human power; and the average mind of the European adventurer, hardened in self-valuation and self-seeking, cannot understand it. I used not to be able to understand it; you must have seen it to be able to understand."

BELGIUM'S DRINK MORTALITY.

A Belgian journal, which has been investigating the social drinking customs, declares that fully 25,000 Belgians die each year of the results of alcoholism. In Brussels, as has been statistically shown, more than 80 per cent. of all the deaths in the hospitals result from this cause.

Running the Gauntlet.

other's talk. She flung herself on her such in a passion of tears. The weeping lieved her, and when her father called er to join him in a stroll she had reined her equanimity.

On the way down to the beach Carrie ough the situation over and determined show both Milton and Nellie that she lly understood the position of affairs be- een them, and to treat both with the ldness which their supposed misconduct served.

The group sauntered slowly along the ach watching the merry bathers and the y throng on the sand, Mr. Walter and r. Price walked on discussing the pros- pects of their business arrangement, while rrie and Mr. Barclay followed, discuss- anything but business. The sea s getting rough, and looking around. Barclay said, "I think there is going e a storm." The bathers seemed to think too, for one after another they came out the water and went to their dressing- ms. A few of the more venturesome mained. Two of these, far out, and evi- ntly strong swimmers, attracted the at- tion of the strollers.

"Good swimmers, those," said Mr. Wal- s he and Mr. Price stood to look at m, and Carrie and Mr. Barclay came up. They'd need be," said a boatman who od near enough to hear the Deacon's ark. "If their strength gives out while e are over there, it will go hard with m. Those waves are pretty high."

Another man standing near was watch- them through a field-glass. "I shouldn't e to have much hanging to their lives," said, as he laid the glass down. "If I e that girl's father I'd lose no time in eding 'em a boat."

Some uneasy presentiment crossed Mr. e's mind. "May I look through your s?" he asked. The man passed it to a with a nod.

excitedly. "That must be Nellie. She hangs limp as if she had fainted. Where is the other? Oh! I see. He is climbing over the side. Now they are turning. It will be a stiff job coming back."

It was weary waiting for the boat to return. Some one ran to the cottage to tell Mrs. Seymour that her son was drowned and in a few moments she had joined the waiting group of watchers. At last the boat was within reach, and Nellie, pale as death and quite unconscious, was lifted out. She was wrapped in the blankets for which Mrs. Seymour had sent and was carried to the cottage, while two men helped Milton to walk there, as he was scarcely able to stand.

The widow had the girl placed in her own bed, and she and Carrie and the doctor, who had been summoned, worked over her, trying by artificial respiration to recall the life that seemed to have departed. They were beginning to despair, when Milton, who stood watching them in an agony of suspense, cried: "See! see! she is alive, her eyes are moving, her chest is heaving."

"Thank God, thank God," broke out from five hearts at once, the first to speak being Deacon Walter, who summoned Mr. Price.

At first the breathing was mechanical, but soon became more natural, and a little redness returned to the lips. The wounded finger bled freely, and it was evident that her left wrist was either dislocated or broken. While Carrie was bathing her forehead, the large eyes of Nellie opened, and recognizing Carrie, the sufferer whis- pered:

"Is—Milton—safe? Oh!—that—fearful—dream!"

After a pause, during which her breath- ing improved, and the pallor of her face was tinged with the color which indicated returning life, she again looked at Carrie, and said:

"Dear—Carrie.—will—you—ever—for- give—me?"

The sweet girl by her side pressed her warm lips to the pale cold cheek of her friend, and whispered: "Yes, everything," and with that, every particle of resentment left Carrie's heart. Much had she been forgiven, should she not forgive much?

All her intentions of being revenged up- on those whom she supposed had injured her, all her dislike, her jealousy, had pass- ed away with that kiss of love. She con- quered her natural feelings, in trying to follow in the footsteps of him who could pray even for his murderers.

Gospel Tea Service for Women.

The Gospel service and tea drinking in- augurated by Mrs. Bird several weeks ago for the girls of the Bowery, has held its second afternoon social, with an in- creased attendance and interest. A marked change was noticeable in the ap- pearance of the young girls from China- town, none of whom are over sixteen. Instead of soiled hands, faces, and un- kempt hair, they appeared quietly dressed and with a considerably freshened, "cleaned up" look that was encouraging to see. Several stood up for prayer be- fore the close of the meeting, and Mrs. Bird talked to them, earnestly and fer- vently, of the necessity of repentance and becoming good Christians now. Many interesting testimonies were given.

MEDICAL WISDOM.

The Dreaded Consumption Can Be Cured.

T. A. Slocum, M.C., the Great Chemist and Scientist, Offers to Send Free, to the Afflicted, Three Bottles of His Newly Discovered Remedies to Cure Con- sumption and All Lung Troubles.

Nothing could be fairer, more philanthropic or carry more joy in its wake than the offer of T. A. Slocum, M.C., of 183 Pearl street, New York City.

Confident that he has discovered an absolute cure for consumption and all pulmonary complaints, and to make its great merits known, he will send free, three bottles to any reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who is suffering from chest, bronchial, throat, and lung troubles or consumption.

Already this "new scientific course of medi- cine" has permanently cured thousands of ap- parently hopeless cases.

The doctor considers it a religious duty—a duty which he owes to humanity—to donate his infallible cure.

Offered freely, apart from its inherent strength, is enough to commend it, and more so is the perfect confidence of the great chem- ist making the proposition.

He has proved consumption to be a curable disease beyond any doubt.

There will be no mistake in sending—the mistake will be in overlooking the generous in- vitation. He has on file in his American and European laboratories testimonials of experi- ence from those cured, in all parts of the world.

Delays are dangerous. Address T. A. Slo- cum, M.C., 183 Pearl Street, New York, and when writing the Doctor, please give express and postoffice address, and mention reading this article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Cloud of Witnesses No. 2.

We expect you to believe these people. When the first "Cloud of Witnesses" was published, thousands upon thousands of replies demonstrated that sufferers from Asthma, Catarrh, Bronchitis and Colds were reasonable persons and open to conviction. Are you open to conviction? We know that Hyomei, the new and wonderful Australian "Dry-Air" treatment, comprised in relieves 99 out of every 100 people who try it, and cures 99 out of every 100 who use it conscientiously and according to directions. Here are the indorsements of living men and women whom you must believe. The letters on their face have the stamp of sincerity as well as gratitude.

Bronchitis.

New York, Aug. 26, 1896.

My Dear Sir: I am very loath as a minister to give an endorsement to a patented article, but I feel it but just to you to say that I have used your Hyomei for Bronchitis with perfect success. I had a chronic cold last winter which stubbornly resisted every remedy for seven weeks. Your Hyomei gave me relief in one day, and enabled me to fill all my subsequent lecture dates with satisfaction.

Clinton Forge, Va., May 14, 1896.

Dear Sir: The patient for whom I ordered Booth's Hyomei, Hyomei Inhaler, apparatus, was suffering from Purulent Bronchitis, expectorating large quantities of pusulent, offensive sputum, made a perfect recovery, and is now a healthy, robust young man.

Catarrh.

Newry, S. C., Aug. 12, 1896.

Dear Sir: I have used your Pocket Inhaler for Catarrh of the head and throat, and it has benefited me wonderfully. I think there is nothing that equals it. I believe it is all that you claim it to be. I can highly recommend it to any one suffering from any kind of Catarrh.

Asthma.

New Haven, Conn., May 1, 1896.

I have given Hyomei a thorough test during the past winter, consequently I have been able to go to bed and sleep without being disturbed by my old enemy, Asthma. Hyomei is now in every home in the land.

Catarrhal Deafness.

23 Marshall St.,

Hartford, Conn., May 1, 1896.

I am doing wonders in the way of relieving cases of Catarrhal Deafness with your Hyomei. I have also cured several cases of Catarrh of the throat, which their physicians failed to relieve. The Sealer of Weights and Measures had a sore throat most of the time, caused by chemicals which he used. I cured his throat and he has been the means of selling about 20 Outfits.

La Grippe.

The author of the $1,000 prize story "Titus" says:

I have used Booth's Hyomei Pocket Inhaler in my family and find it invaluable as a preventive of Grippe, to break up colds, etc. I have used it to alleviate the painful cough and soreness resulting from measles with perfect success.

Florence M. Kingsley.

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs which cause disease in the respiratory organs. The air, charged with Hyomei, is inhaled at the mouth, and, after premeating the minutest air-cells, is exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief. It is highly recommended by physicians, clergymen, public speakers, and thousands who have been helped and cured.

Pocket Inhaler Outfit, Complete by Mail, $1.00. To any part of the United States, for foreign countries, add $1.00 postage; outfit consists of p-cket inhaler, made of deodorized hard rubber, a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper, and full directions for using. If you are still skeptical, send your address; my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei cures. Are you open to conviction? Extra bottles of Hyomei inhalant by mail, or at druggists, 50 cents. Hyomei Balm, for all skin diseases, by mail, 25 cents. Your druggist has Hyomei or can get it for you if you insist. Don't accept a substitute.

next to his best attire—not the very st. for that has to be reserved for the ee—enter the church with stately step, his head, or at any rate shut his eyes prayer time, or close them enough to sleep, turn toward the pulpit with y dullness while the preacher speaks, a five-cent piece, or if the times be d, a one-cent piece, on the collection ter, kind of shoving it down under the er coin so that it might be, for all that usher knows, a $5 gold piece, and n, after the benediction, go quietly ne to the biggest repast of all the ck. That is all the majority of Chris- ns are doing for the rectification of this et, and they will do that until, at the e of life, the pastor opens a black k at the head of their casket and is, "Blessed are the dead who die in Lord: they rest from their labors and r works do follow them." The sense e ludicrous is so thoroughly developed e that when I hear these Scripture ds read at the obsequies of one of the ous do-nothings in the churches it is much for my gravity. "Their works follow them." What works? And in t direction do they follow them—up own? And do they follow on foot or e the wing? And how long will they ow before they catch up? More ap- priate funeral text for all such religious d-beats would be the words in Matthew t: "Our lamps are gone out." One ld think that such Christians would t at least under whose banner they enlisted. In one of the Napoleonic a woman, Jeannette by name, took position with the troops and shouldered oomstick. The colonel said, "Jean- e, why do you take such a useless on into the ranks?" "Well," she a "I can show at least which side I n." ow, the object of this sermon is to at least one-fourth of you to an ambi- for that which my text presents in g vocabulary, namely, a passion for n. To prove that it is possible to o much of that spirit, I bring the con- ction of 2,990 foreign missionaries. It ally estimated that there are at least 20 missionaries, I make a liberal al- nce, and admit there may be ten bad onaries out of the 3,000, but I do not ve there is one. All English and African merchants leave Bombay, Cal- u, Amoy, and Peking as soon as they e their fortunes. Why? Because no ean or American in his senses d stay in that climate after monetary nements have ceased. Now, the mis- ries there are put down on the barest essities, and most of them do not lay pme dollar in twenty years. Why, do they stay in those lands of in- vible heat, and cobras, and raging fevs, the thermometer sometimes play- ing 130 and 140 degrees of oppressiv- nes twelve thousand miles from home, euse of the unhealthy climate and the piling immoralities of those regions elled to send their children to Eng- lan, or Scotland, or America, probably e to see them again? O Blessed t! Can it be anything but a passion rous? It is easy to understand all t frequent depreciation of foreign mis- saries when you know that they are all pped to the opium traffic, and that in- omies with commerce; and then the onaries are moral, and that is an ge to many of the merchants—not all m, but many of them—who, absent o all home restraint, are so immoral eave can make only faint allusion to e onstrosity of their abominations. e would like to be at the gate of ean when those missionaries go in, to ee w they will have the pick of coronets, and thrones, and mansions on the best res of heaven. We who have had cas pulpits and loving congregations, enting heaven, will, in my opinion, have to ee our turn and wait for the Chris- narworkers who, amid physical suffer- ing and mental privation and environment of squalor, have done their work; and on the principle that in proportion as one has been self-sacrificing and suffering for Christ's sake on earth will be their celestial preferment.

Who is that young woman on the worst street in Washington, New York, or London, Bible in hand, and a little package in which are small vials of medicines, and another bundle in which are biscuits? How dare she risk herself among those "roughs," and where is she going? She is one of the queens of heaven, hunting up the sick and hungry, and before night she will have read Christ's "Let not your heart be troubled" in eight or ten places, and counted out from those vials the right number of drops to ease pain, and given food to a family that would otherwise have had nothing to eat to-day, and taken the measure of a dead child that she may prepare for it a shroud, her every act of kindness for the body accompanied with a benediction for the soul. You see nothing but the filthy street along which she walks and the rickety stairs up which she climbs, but she is accompanied by an unseen cohort of angels with drawn swords to defend her, and with garlands twisted for her victories, all up and down the tenement-house districts. I tell you there was not so much excitement when Anne Boleyn, on her way to her coronation, found the Thames stirred by fifty gilded barges, with brilliant flags, in which hung small bells, rung by each motion of the wind, noblemen standing in scarlet, and wharf spread with cloth of gold, and all the gateways surmounted by huzzahing admirers, and the streets hung with crimson velvet, and trumpets and cannons sounding the jubilee, and Anne, dressed in surcoat of silver tissue, and brow gleaming with a circlet of rubies, and amid fountains that poured Rhenish wine, passed on to Westminster Hall, and rode in on a caparisoned palfrey, its hoofs clattering the classic floor, and, dismounting, passed into Westminster Abbey, and between the choir and high altar, was crowned queen, amid organs and choirs chanting the Te Deums—I say, there was not much in all that glory which dazzles the eyes of history when it is compared with the heavenly reception which that ministering spirit of the back alley shall receive when she goes up to coronation. When she goes in, what welcome on the River of Life, its banks of pearl lined with splendors seraphic, and in temples of eternal worship, whose music is commanded by swing of archangelic sceptre, and before thrones where sit those who have reigned a thousand years, but have just begun their dominion. Poor Anne Boleyn, in two years after that pageant, lost life and throne by one stroke of headsman, but those who on earth have a divine passion for souls shall never lose their thrones. "They shall reign forever and ever."

But after all, the best way to cultivate that divine passion for souls is to work for their salvation. Under God save one, and you will want right away to save two. Save two, and you will want to save ten. Save ten, and you will want to save twenty. Save twenty, and you will want to save a hundred. Save a hundred, and you will want to save everybody. And what is the use of talking about it, when the place to begin is here, and the time is now? And while you pray I will in one minute tell all there is of it: Full pardon for the worst man on earth, if he will believe in Christ, whose blood can instantly wash away the foulest crimes. Full comfort for the most harrowing distress that ever crushed a human being. At your first moment of belief, a process by which the whole universe of God will turn clear around for your eternal advantage. For the mere asking, if the asking be in earnest, and you throw everything into that asking, complete solace and helpfulness for the few years of this life, and then a wide-open heaven, which you can reach in less time than it takes me to pronounce that imperial word, flashing with all the joy that an Infinite God knows how to bestow—Heaven!

In this world God never does his best. He can hang on the horizon grander mornings than have ever yet been kindled, and rainbow the sky with richer colors than have ever been arched, and attune the oceans to more majestic doxologies than have ever yet been attuned; but as near as I can tell, and I speak it reverently, heaven is the place where God has done his best. He can build no greater joys, lift no mightier splendors, roll no loftier anthems, march no more imposing processions, build no greater palaces, and spread out and interjoin and wave no more transporting magnificence. I think heaven is the best heaven God can construct, and it is all yours for the serious asking. How do you like the offer? Do you really think it is worth accepting? If so, pray for it. Get not up from that pew where you are sitting, nor move one inch from where you are standing, before you get a full title for it, written in the blood of the Son of God, who would have all men come to life present and life everlasting. If you have been in military life you know what soldiers call the "long roll." All the drums beat it because the enemy is approaching, and all the troops must immediately get into line. What scurrying around the camp and putting of the arms through the straps of the knapsack, and saying "Good-bye" to comrades you may never meet again! Some of you Germans or Frenchmen may have heard that long roll just before Sedan. Some of you Italians may have heard that long roll just before Bergamo. Some of you Northern and Southern men may have heard it just before the battle of the Wilderness. You know its stirring and solemn meaning; and so I sound the long roll to-day. I beat this old Gospel drum that has for centuries been calling thousands to take their places in line for this battle, on one side of which are all the forces beatific and on the other side all the force demoniac. Here the long roll-call: "Who is on the Lord's side?" "Quit yourselves like men." In solemn column march for God, and happiness, and heaven. So glad am I that I do not have to "wish myself accursed," and throw away my heaven that you may win your heaven, but that we may have a whole convention of heavens—heaven added to heaven, heaven built on heaven,—and while I dwell upon the theme I begin to experience in my own poor self that which I take to be something like a passion for souls. And now unto God the only wise, the only good, the only great, be glory forever! Amen!

ARCHBISHOP TEMPLE.

THE LATE ARCHBISHOP BENSON.

Two Great Churchmen.

The Old and the New "Primate of All England"—Archbishop Benson's Successor.

HERE is a very decided, though by no means a violent contrast between the newly appointed Primate of All England, Archbishop Temple, and his predecessor, the late Archbishop Benson. The latter was distinctively "High Church," while Archbishop Temple has a leaning toward "Broad Church" principles. Our readers will remember that, in the brief biographical sketch of Archbishop Benson, which appeared in these columns shortly after his death, it was stated that his profound scholarship, pleasing manners, oratorical gifts, and thorough orthodoxy early marked him for promotion in the Church of England. It is related that when Dr. Tait was Bishop of London, he wrote to Dean Stanley, asking him to assist him in finding a number of men from whom he might select his chaplains. Dean Stanley's letter in reply said: "By far the best Cambridge man of fit age and the like that occurs to me is Benson. Fellow of Trinity, now at Rugby. He has very pleasing manners, is a very good scholar and divine, preaches well, and is a thoroughly religious man. I think he might be worth inquiring after."

These same conservative qualities characterized his whole career. His Primacy meant hard work and for the first eight or ten years of his tenure of the Archbishopric he could deal with an almost unlimited amount of business without injury to his health. His day began at 6.30 a.m. From 9.30 till lunch he had to attend commissions or committees, or else prepare sermons or speeches, or deal with his vast correspondence. In the afternoon he would have to attend one or more public meetings, and give an address. Then came the House of Lords, and frequently a public function, at which another speech was demanded. Or else he would be presiding over the Session of Convocation, or discharging a heavy round of episcopal duties in the diocese, or examining and preparing his Ordination candidates. No one who has ever held the high office was more widely loved and respected.

His successor, Archbishop Temple, has already had a career full of surprises, the latest being his appointment as Primate. Rt. Rev. Dr. Frederick Temple, Bishop of London, Provincial Dean of Canterbury, and Dean of the Chapels Royal, is unquestionably one of the ablest men in the Church at the present day. He is considerably over seventy, and has already, in his long life, conquered many honors and distinctions in University, in Church, and in the field of literature. At one time he was master at Rugby, and afterward Bishop of Exeter. Some years ago he wrote a series of Essays and Reviews which stirred up a great controversy, their general tone being the reverse of conservative, but in his later life he has discarded liberal tendencies and adopted a more conservative attitude in all that relates to the affairs of religion, practical or theoretical. It is not expected that the new Primate will make any serious effort at innovation, and the prevailing impression is that, all things considered, his appointment was wise and deserved.

Dr. Temple has been and still is regarded as a broad-minded, thoughtful, scholarly man, more perhaps of philosopher than prelate, and with a striking disregard of consequences whenever his intellect and sympathy were enlisted in any worthy cause that might demand a bold course of action. Yet he is eminently practical and sound, and it is generally believed that he will follow, to a large degree, in the footsteps of the late venerated Archbishop Tait, whose admirable policy as Primate he seems to favor greatly. He is the son of an officer in the army, and was born in 1821. At Oxford he became a scholar of Balliol College, and took his degree of B. A. in 1842 as a double first class. He has held various important posts, educational and clerical. While one of the Queen's Chaplains, in 1868, Dr. Temple took an active part in support of Gladstone's measure for the disestablishment of the Irish Church. In April, 1883, he was elected Bampton lecturer at Oxford, and on the death of Dr. Jackson, in January, 1885, Dr. Temple was appointed Bishop of London.

THE FIVE POINTS MISSION

CHRISTIAN WORK

JUST which city in this land may now be the "wickedest" is a mooted question. Fifty years ago probably all would have was no spot where want and woe were more apparent. Every house was the resort of vicious persons of both sexes, and of every age and color: almost every store was a dram shop when the thieves and abandoned characters of the town whetted their depraved tastes and concocted future crimes and villainies.

As late as 1850 the Five Points was a spot where was concentrated more of crime, filth, and corruption than on any other this side the ocean. Its dark rooms and underground passages harbored thieves and murderers, and enabled them to defy arrest and conviction. Vice polluted the night and crime stalked unblushingly through the day. Children brought up in this school of iniquity were graduated accomplished burglars and criminals, so that for the welfare of a growing city like New York the population soon found it to their interests to give more attention to Five Points.

In the spring of 1844, a few determined and good Christian women banded together in the name of the Lord, and resolved that some concentrated and immediate effort should be energetically made to solve the overmastering problem of the relation of applied Christianity to this poor and neglected portion of the city of New York. After several attempts to reach the homes and help the children of the poverty and crime-smitten districts to which their labors had thus far been directed, they decided to devote their efforts to the Five Points. They secured the "Old Brewery" as their mission building, and here, under the act of incorporation passed

THE FIVE POINTS MISSION.

March 20, 1836, by the Legislature of New York, the New York Ladies' Home Missionary Society has carried on the Christian work for the past fifty years with these objects:

- First.—To employ one or more missionaries to labor among the poor of the city of New York, especially in the locality known as the Five Points.
- Second.—To provide food, clothing, and other necessities for such poor.
- Third.—To educate poor children, and provide for their comfort and welfare.
- Fourth.—To maintain a school at the Five Points, and to perform kindred acts of charity and benevolence.

The practical methods by which the threefold objects of this mission have been carried on may be briefly summarized as follows: A day school of eight departments, each under the care of a competent teacher, with Mrs. G. Van Aken as principal, has been maintained for many years. The Board of Education for the city of New York has supervision of this school, and all its pupils are obliged to pass examination at the same times as in the regular public schools. Nearly 40,000 children have sat at the desks and on the forms of this school since its history began, many of whom are now filling positions of honor, trust and responsibility in the professional, commercial, and mechanical circles of New York and other cities. Most of the children come from homes of extreme destitution and poverty, therefore it is necessary to supply them with food at noon each day, and on Saturday something is given them in their baskets to sustain them over to the following week. Their parents are unable to furnish them with suitable clothing to attend the regular public schools, consequently they are clothed and provided with hats and shoes from a general wardrobe, contributions to which are received from all over the country.

In addition to this a visitation is made to the homes of the children, and on advice and judgment of the lady Visitors, donations of bedding and other family supplies are made when it is necessary and the cases are worthy. The sick are supplied with medicine, the disheartened encouraged, the bereaved comforted, and the tempted ones are counseled and admonished. Precepts of honesty, cleanliness and sanitary instruction are kindly but pointedly given, and in consequence the Visitor of the Five Points Mission has come to be the personal friend and confidential adviser in hundreds, if not in thousands of homes.

There are at present eighteen different nationalities represented in the school, and while the teachers are giving the little ones their first and most permanent impressions of an English education, and also imparting the first principles of American institutions.

the Visitor carries into their homes the air, and inculcates the habits and methods of the true Christian home life.

In addition to the vast responsibility and care of the educational, charitable clothed and shod. The girls' entrance is on the left, and to the right the boys' entrance and door to the reading-room can be seen. Back of the reading-room and office on the first floor is a large, well-ventilated and light church room, with a seating capacity of 750. On the second-story front are two classrooms, with folding doors, thus making front galleries to the church when needed. On the third story front at the left are two rooms and a toilet for the teachers, where at noontime they can retire for a much-needed rest. Back of these is the large assembly room, and at the right of the teachers' rooms is the kindergarten. On the fourth-story front are two spacious classrooms, which, with the one in the rear and the kindergarten and infant classrooms, open into the large assembly room when necessary. On the fifth-story front is the day nursery and on the right of it a similar large, airy room is used as a classroom until the nursery overflows.

A few statistical facts regarding the work of the Five Points Mission, may be interesting. The Mission has furnished more than 5,000,000 meals, including the daily luncheon of the children. Twenty-five thousand dollars has been expended for food in time of great necessity. Two hundred and fifty thousand garments have been given to clothe the naked. More than 5,000 children and adults have been provided with places, some of them adopted into comfortable homes. Over 45,000 children have been taught in the school. Many children trained in the Mission school are now leading industrious lives, and are well known in business and social circles.

Rev. H. K. Sanford, D. D., is the Superintendent of the Mission. He entered the New York City Conference in 1852, and served for six years in important charges. In 1858 he was appointed to the Five Points Mission, and then served for three years. He was then appointed in succession to several of the leading charges until 1872. His heart and energies are thoroughly enlisted in the Five Points work and in the redemption of the children of the slums. The colored illustration on the first page of this issue is a truthful portrayal of one of the quarters from which the Five Points Mission children are drawn—a section of all that remains of the rapidly vanishing "Mulberry Bend."

ceeded that New York City with its Five Points, and Mulberry Bend stood pre-eminent in this hemisphere as the refuge of criminals and the nursery of crime. For many years one of the worst beds of vice and crime, the Five Points and the "Bend" were spoken of almost with bated breath, but through the years that have followed, changes have wrought that to-day have almost obliterated the old structures and improved the moral tone of both districts to a marked degree, while many of the old buildings have been replaced with modern structures of towering height and imposing appearance. Originally the Five Points section was a low swampy pond, which was gradually filled up, and as it became susceptible of occupation, low frame houses were built, that were the resorts of a poor and dissolute population, as has always exist in large cities. The locality by degrees became so notoriously disorderly that it was not considered safe for a respectable man to pass through it. There were underground cells and passages connecting blocks of houses on different streets, and the well-known names "Cow Bay" and "Murderer's Alley" were too sadly characteristic. It was a God-forsaken place, which where education nor religion was permitted to enter, and the respectable inhabitants of New York, though then living not far from the scene, were callous and indifferent to the fearful degradation that existed there. No spot of ground on this continent had the reputation of being a witness to more crime, and there

COSTUMES OF THE ORIENT.

An Interesting and Accurate Representation of the Attire of the People of Palestine at the Present Day.

DRESS or costume in the East is the badge or mark which infallibly indicates the social status of the wearer and the class to which he belongs. There are three different classes in Syria, with as many characteristic costumes, of which our photograph is a striking illustration. There are, first, the Bedouins, or city people, the Fellaheen, or country people, and the Bedouins, or sons of the desert.

To the right of the group in our illustration, stands a tall, swarthy son of the desert. The dress of a Bedouin is picturesque in the extreme. He wears a silk-striped robe, a cloth coat, and a kuaffiyah, or turban, from which falls a square of cloth or silk upon his shoulders. He also wears a large pair of red morocco boots. Into his belt is thrust a brace of pistols. Next to him sits a woman of Jerusalem, dressed in bridal ornaments and attire. She represents the wife of a rich young man, and her garments are fine and beautiful to behold. Over a dress or petticoat of pink silk she wears a fine cloth jacket, embroidered in gold thread, and a leathern girdle thickly massed with gold embroideries. Upon her head is worn a moon-tirc, consisting of a piece of silver, shaped as the moon, and placed over a turban from which hangs a long fringe of silken cord and golden threads, to which are attached numerous silver pieces, falling over her hand as seen in the picture.

The next figure is a lady of Bethlehem in festal costume. This dress is also rich and gorgeous, and consists of a jobe-hareer, or silken robe, heavily embroidered by hand down the front, sides, and sleeves. She also wears a tasseled girdle of fine striped silk, called mahzam. Over all this is worn a rich takverah, or jacket of red and brilliantly-colored silk. The Bethlehemite wears a saffah, or crown, composed of woolen cloth, gold pieces and blue beads. Over the festive saffah is thrown a ghattah, or veil, of different colors—sometimes white, and sometimes royal blue or purple. Attached to either ear and falling under her chin is a silver chain, having a large Turkish dollar as the centre-piece. The chain is thickly strewn with blue beads, supposed to defend her from the "Evil Eye," a superstition still current in the East. Standing beside the first Bedouins is a fellah, or countryman. He wears a leffay, or turban, of colors, a black cloth abba, or outer coat, and a Persian cashmere girdle, in which is carried an inkstand.

This division of our interesting picture brings us to the small table in the centre of the group. On the table stand a silver censer, a small clay lamp, or naughtleh, as it is called in the Arabic language, with its accompanying supporter, a silver censer. The dress of the priest is too elaborate and symbolic to attempt a description. The meanings, as their meanings, are very beautiful and suggestive. The square shield in the middle of which is a large cross, the shield is known as the shamshir, or sword, and is worn by the priest. He wears from his neck a cloth on which are woven six crosses.

This is called butrascheen, and indicates the priest's responsibility for the people's spiritual guidance and welfare. A girdle of white and silver cloth is worn to symbolize the love which "engirdles the people to his heart," and for whom he stands. The last, and finishing robe is the great ephod of violet velvet, gold, and silver threads, and rich embroideries.

To the left of the table sits a Bedouin woman. A distinctive feature of her costume is the burko, or covering for the eyes. From three to four hundred old coins fall from the burko around the woman's face. She wears a blue cotton robe, bracelets, and a silver chain. Next we see a young citizen of Jerusalem wearing his fez, or tarboosh, and full orange trousers, several yards wide, a girdle and embroidered jacket. Next to him sits a lady attired to receive visitors in her home. She wears a silken combaz, a pink silk satta, or over dress, with a linen girdle threaded with silver. A mandeal covers the hair, over which is thrown a tarha (veil or scarf) of thin silk gauze, ivory-white in color. The figure adjoining, is another city lady, in her outdoor dress, or izzar. The izzar is of chocolate and gold-colored silk, and is used to envelop the woman of Jerusalem as she walks abroad. She also wears the mandeal, as the eyes, face, and hands of a majority of the women of Palestine.

Standing behind the "city ladies," we see the race, or shepherd of the East, just as he might have appeared on the starry plains of Bethlehem when Christ lay cradled, a Divine Babe, in the manger and the stall. His farweh, or coat, is of sheepskin, and a leathern girdle encircles his waist. He carries a leathern bag for provisions, such as was worn in the time of John the Baptist, and a club, or naboot, for defense. He also carries a reed, or shepherd's staff, which likens him to the shepherd of David's Psalms, or to David himself, as he is to his flocks.

The two children are a brother and sister of the country people. The children represented here are garbed just as the little ones probably were when Jesus went up and down the country paths of Palestine. The coat worn by the boy represents the coat of arms of the house of David, as it is called in the Bible. The girl wears a garment of silk and linen, and a girdle similar to, but smaller than, the one worn by the woman. The triangle on the forehead of her headdress is a triangle from the shamshir, or sword, the shamshir of silver spoken of in the Bible.

The man in the center of the group, who is the converted native and preacher of Arimathea, who forms one of the most prominent figures in the Christian Church, is dressed in the robes of a priest. He wears from his neck a cloth on which are woven six crosses.

HERALD a faithful representation of the costumes worn in the Palestine of to-day. A biography of Mr. Tams, and an account of his successful work as evangelist and lecturer, here and abroad, appeared in the columns of this journal a few weeks ago. Mr. Tams is a native Syrian, of Crusader descent, and since his conversion, a number of years ago, has labored with great zeal for the spread of the Gospel in his native land. His visit in this country is in furtherance of that purpose.

"Come, Let Us Sing unto the Lord."

COME, let us sing unto the Lord, let us heartily rejoice in the God of our salvation": for of all the services of the heart and sanctuary, singing and making melody is the most heavenly, and the least selfish. It is the worship of angels. Before we have any mention of prayer, we know that the "sons of God" sang at the creation of the world. It was a familiar exercise to the early Jews; or Miriam would not have instantly celebrated the passage of the Red Sea, by that inspired hymn which still echoes in our sanctuaries. Singing also formed a large part of the Jewish ritual; and priests from either side of the great altar, answered one another in those noble antiphones, which are the jewels of our own Church.

When the fulness of time had come, the angels learned a new song, and introduced the dispensation.

in metre such exquisite lines as the following:

The Just One saw that iniquity increased upon earth;
And that sin had dominion over all men,
So he sent his messenger and removed
A multitude of fair little ones,
And called them to the pavilion of happiness.
Like lilies taken from the wilderness,
Children are planted in Paradise:
And like pearls in diadems,
Children are inserted in the kingdom.

or again—
Most sweet Jesus! long suffering Jesus!
Heal the wounds of my soul,
Jesus! and sweeten my heart.
I pray thee, most merciful Jesus, my Saviour,
That I, saved, may magnify Thee.

Their doxology also is very beautiful and worthy to be used by every child of God:

God is my hope,
Christ is my refuge,
The Holy Spirit is my vesture,
Holy Trinity, glory to Thee!

It was from the lips of Ambrose the great Te Deum burst in an ecstasy of adoration and the unearthly magnificence of Dies Irae, with its shuddering consciousness of needed mercy, and its intense exploration, represents the mediæval hymnologists:

Low I kneel with heart submission;
See like ashes my contrition;
Help me in my last condition.

Faint and weary, Thou hast sought me;
On the Cross of suffering bought me;
Shall such grace be vainly brought me?

The Great Reformation was accompanied by a remarkable revival of popular singing. When Luther began to preach all Germany began to sing. The same effect accompanied the apostolic labors of Whitefield and Wesley; and in our own day, the Gospel services of Moody and Sankey. For nothing is more certain than that any powerful religious feeling shows itself by singing; since in all collective spiritual singing there is a spirit of devotion that is infectious: the closest are touched by its heavenly fire and the most careless interest.

Yet this joyful act of public worship is now considered in many of our churches quite vulgar. We have paid quartettes, we are presumed to know a interpret our emotions,—if have any,—while we sit calmly and critically listening to the Will there be paid choirs, heaven, or will it be individual and congregational singing there?

There is a sin of omission regard to singing, which can be passed over—the almost universal neglect of it in family worship. In Scotland it is a never failing adjunct to household prayers; and Oh, how many tender home memories must be blended with those old Psalms and hymns sung round the family altar! "O God of Bethel by whose hand," "Rock of Ages

"Who are those arrayed in white
"There is a land of pure delight," etc., bring back to me some of the most touching heart memories. Those that sang the with me have passed into the skies, but their voices still linger in the noble world and echo in my heart. Do not parenthetically, by ignoring singing in household worship, neglect a very powerful means of influence:—a charming channel, through which they might speak to their sons and daughters when they are far away from earth, or have joined the Church triumphant in heaven?

One thing is certain, if we would sing in heaven we must sing on earth, for the song to be sung in heaven must be learned on earth. Prayer and preaching we shall leave behind us; they are the exercises of the Church militant; but many a good man and woman has gone singing over Jordan, and so carried the melodies of the Church militant into the glorious courts of the Celestial City.

The Storks of Strasburg.

Building in the Gabled Roofs and Chimneys—A Bird That Many Nations Reverence.

A NEST-BUILDER AT WORK.

SACRED and secular literature makes much of the stork, and the bird is regarded by many nations with reverence, superstition, and affection. In Western Europe, in Germany, Denmark, and Holland, the home of the stork, always identified with the dwellings of men. In Germany, and especially in the venerable city of Strasburg (where our photographs were taken), the white stork builds among the chimneys and gables of the houses, among the peaks and spires of the famous cathedral, and amongst the most branches of the poplar and oak. The nests shown are made by binding together with twigs, turf, earth, and covering the surface with moss, straw, and feathers. Stork instinct selects the loftiest spot to support his huge nest, and love for the proximity of man causing him to thus build among roofs, gables, and towers. The word "stork," as known to us, comes through the Icelandic, Danish, Swedish, German, Hungarian, and other West European languages, the strange bird being regarded with almost as much reverence and superstition in Western Europe as in the East. They are especially protected in Switzerland, Western Germany, and Holland, where they may be seen at Middleburg (Holland), walking with perfect composure even in a crowded vegetable market.

The stork is a migratory bird, and his wonderful flight through the air with his long neck and longer legs equally stretched is a curious spectacle. He is believed to fly, without alighting, from the lower line or vicinity of Strasburg, to Africa, and the Delta of the Nile. The migration takes place in October, the great birds coming in single or double columns, uniting in a point as they cleave the air. As less molested by man the nests are rebuilt and repaired for generations on the same site. They are attached to each other, and exhibit wonderful care and tenderness for their young and aged. They have two broods a year, and live to a very old age. Weaker birds remain and breed in the South.

The little maid (shown in the photograph) upon the quaint, carved bench, tying her silken flax, is a peasant girl of Strasburg, and, like many other Strasburg maids, has doubtless fed the storks many a time.

Because of its propensity for eating frogs, toads, newts, lizards, and other like creatures, the stork was placed in the list of unclean birds by the law of Moses. In many passages of Scripture, however, the singular bird is tenderly mentioned: As, "the stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed time." This allusion by the prophet Jeremiah is to the peculiar regularity of the bird's annual return at stated periods to its nest, and its long flight through the air, which never varies or falters until its destination is reached, north and south. The stork is a beautiful bird, being nearly four feet high, and one of the largest known to land. Its wings are jet black, its bill and long slender legs bright red, and its plumage snowy white. The presence of the white stork, or goshawk, extends over the whole of Europe except the British Isles, and over Northern Africa and Asia as far as Burmah. Both the black and the white stork are numerous in Palestine, but the black stork is found in the marshy places of forests, and never about the habitations of man.

The very word "stork" derived from the Hebrew means "kindness," and may have something to do with the paternal and filial attachment of which the bird seems to have been a type, not only among the Hebrews, but also the Greeks and Romans. The ancients recognized the stork's claim to protection and reverence, and it was held as sacred by the Egyptians. Pliny tells us that in Thessaly it was a capital crime to kill a stork, and it has the same honor in Egypt. A pretty story comes to us in this connection from Morocco, which says that there is a hospital at Fez endowed for the purpose of nursing sick cranes and storks, and burying them when dead. This would go to show the high honor and affection, sometimes of a superstitious nature, in which the bird is held by some nations.

The Turks in Syria say that the stork is a true follower of Islam, as he shows such partiality for the Turkish and Arab over Christian quarters. This is an actual fact, as the species is more abundant in Palestine and the East than elsewhere on the globe. But the quantity of offal found about Moslem dwellings may have something to do with the bird's preference. The Moroccans hold that storks are human beings in that form from distant lands. Everywhere in the East, their nests are found among towers and ruins. A pair of storks have possession of the only tall piece of ruin in the plain of Jericho. They are the only tenants of the tower of Richard Cœur de Lion at Lydda, and they gaze on the beautiful plain of Sharon from the lofty tower of Ramleh, while several are located on the top of isolated pillars at Persepolis, and nests are still found in the trees that grow by the Sea of Galilee. "As for the stork," says the Psalmist, "the fir trees are her house." (Ps. 104: 17.)

A Joyous Reunion.

"Some time ago," said Mr. Denholm, an evangelist, during a recent address, "there met in a foreign port five brothers, all captains of vessels who by a strange coincidence were anchored in the same harbor. There was great rejoicing on the part of the five brothers; such a thing had never happened before, and would be most unlikely to happen again. While they were congratulating each other, yet regretting that the sixth brother, also a sea-captain, was absent, there came word that his vessel had also been signalled, and was entering the port. So the whole six, after the lapse of many years, met again. When we get to heaven, will it not be something akin to that unexpected and joyous meeting? We shall come across our loved and dear ones, and who can express the joy it will be to us?"

Gospel Work at Cisamba.

Mrs. Currie Describes the Missionary Work, at Her Husband's Station in South Central Africa—A Hospital now Needed.

IN the course of a letter just received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Cisamba, where Dr. W. T. Currie is laboring for Christ under the auspices of the American Board, Mrs. Currie gives the following details of missionary life at that tropical station:

A couple of weeks ago we were nearly having a serious conflagration. The wind was high that day, and a fire—started some two or three miles back by a thoughtless woman—came on straight for the girls' houses with a roar and fury which threatened to sweep everything before it, buildings included. However, all the boys ran over, and were just in time to burn a good space behind the girls' compound when the main fire rushed up, and finding its way stopped, made a detour to the northwest, where the stream soon damped its ardor. The smoke was dense—we all had weeping eyes. The boys and girls fought bravely to keep down the fires they had started themselves so as to make a barrier—else the cure might have been as bad as the disease. In the midst of all the excitement some of the girls called out that the donkey who was tethered in the woods had been burnt. Dr. Currie sent some of the boys to see, and sure enough they found the poor thing badly burnt. It is getting better, however, but it will be a long time before it can be ridden again, thus causing a serious hindrance to visitation of those villages too far to reach on foot: that is, as far as the missionaries are concerned, for there are now four native evangelists who go out two and two, visiting two districts each week. Yesterday they attempted again to visit a village where preaching permission had been refused by the chief some time ago. The young men found that a new chief is now ruling, the old one being a wanderer, going from place to place seeking where he can live. He is a rum-drinking, quarrelsome man, and the natives are tired of him. The present chief and his sekulu (old man) received the evangelists very kindly, saying, "Why should we not listen to these words? they are good," and invited them to come again.

Three caravans are now on the road—bringing our longed-for loads from the coast. With each are two or more church members to look after the spiritual welfare of the carriers, most of whom being men from distant villages, cannot attend the services at the station. The mission boys will hold morning and evening worship at each camp, and surely God will bless the reading and expounding of his Word. The singing of hymns is always a great attraction, and most of the lads sing very sweetly. The journey occupies six or seven weeks. The heathen carriers must see from these living examples of God's power to save, that the Christian young men are none the worse for not drinking at the villages they happen to pass, or not plundering some hapless traveler for food or tobacco, etc. When they arrive at the coast, our boys always refuse the rum invariably offered at the trading houses, where they dispose of their rubber, etc. At first, the clerks used to say, "Where do you fellows come from, that you refuse rum?" Now, those who know, say, "It's no use offering those Cisamba boys drink." So they get bread or salt, sometime a knife, instead—a much more profitable present, as their fellow carriers soon perceive.

The medical work at the station is also prospering. Our latest Portuguese patient was well enough to go home yesterday—after a most serious illness—severe hæmaturic fever, contracted at the coast. Dr. Currie spent two or three nights watching him. Scarcely hoping he would rally. He was a very patient young fellow, the only son of a widowed mother. He came to Africa to earn money for her and his sisters. We were thankful to have a copy of John's Gospel in his own language to put into his hands, with some illustrated papers. Several times he would take up the Gospel and seemed to read it with great interest.

The study served as a hospital ward in his case, for every available house was occupied with patients; four were slaves, or overseers, of various traders, one was brought at night, quite delirious. The Chief Cituamanga was also here under treatment; he and his numerous followers occupied two good sized houses. We need a hospital very badly. Mr. Currie would be able to do more if he did not have to go from one house to another (by no means adjacent) several times a day. (He is doctor and nurse.) The medical work is frequently the stepping-stone to higher things. Many of our young people, and many adherents among the chiefs, headmen, and women at the villages, first came here as patients.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a very welcome visitor not only to us, but to our young people. In the evenings, after supper, many of them delight to look at the illustrations, and often ask very interesting questions concerning them, for they cannot read English. Very sincerely yours, AMY CURRIE.

A Policeman's Opinion.

In a recently published address, Dr. A. H. Quint tells an interesting incident of a policeman. The man was stationed at a crossing in Boylston street, Boston, Mass., and he had a busy time of it. The crossing is a narrow one, and the electric cars and other vehicles and the bicycles are apt to become congested at the busy spot. Dr. Quint often stopped on his way to his office to look at the policeman and admire his skill in disentangling obstructions. One day a boy with a big bundle of pasteboard boxes on his shoulder, tried to cross the street. A horse's nose touched the middle of the big pile, and they fell out of the string that held them together and were scattered about the pavement. The boy was almost crying when the policeman went to him. Dr. Quint heard him speak kindly to the lad. He said: "Pick up your boxes and hold them together, and I will tie them up for you." This was done. "Is it a part of your work to help boys with bundles?" Dr. Quint asked the man after he had done the kindly deed and seen the boy safely over. "Ah, sir," said he, "we are all here to help each other." The minister nodded assent and went his way thinking how much trouble and sorrow would be relieved, and how much happier life would be if every one had the same opinion as to what we are here for.

the birds usually start in the night, this remarkable flight is seldom witnessed. The only note emitted by the stork is a rattling, rattling sound of their long, red legs, and they arise in the air with clapping wings and great rapidity. The flight is southward, where they remain until the first of April, when a leisurely return is made to the North. They return year after year to the same nest, and un-

Unchristian Critics.

WE often sit with amazement and hear people tear to pieces reputations that have been a quarter of a century forming. Men, and women, too, seize with avidity evil reports, and like maggots run in and out the carcasses of fallen character. Society becomes a great cesspool in which honorable names are strangled and butchered. When a man begins to totter a little in his integrity or Christian principle, instead of gathering around to steady him, and keep him from complete prostration, we come out from our homes and our associations to put him flat down. Tale-bearers almost always deal in superlatives. If a man shows a little impatience, they say he was livid with rage. If he was seen taking a glass, they call him a besotted inebriate. They put the blowpipe of their exaggeration into the slightest inconsistency, and blow till the cheeks are distended, and the bubble swells, and the story is rounded into a great orb in which swim all the rainbows of conceit, and you can see almost anything you want to see. They are hounds, good for nothing but a chase. When you hear evil of anyone, suspend judgment. Do not decide till you have heard the man's defense. Be lenient with the fallen. You see a brother fall and say, "I never could have done that!" Perhaps you could not, because your temptation does not happen to be in that direction; but you have done things in the course of your life that these fallen men would never have done, because their temptation was not in that direction. Perhaps the devil that inhabits you is avarice, a more respectable vice. You grind the faces of the poor. You have an infernal clutch for the throat of the unfortunate. There is no more mercy in your heart than there is grace in a lion's paw or a rattlesnake's tooth; and though your heart is not as bad as theirs, and you are not as wicked as they, you are still a part of the social opprobrium as the conduct of the more or less criminal. You will know that your heart is as bad as theirs, and you are still a part of the social opprobrium as the conduct of the more or less criminal. You will know that your heart is as bad as theirs, and you are still a part of the social opprobrium as the conduct of the more or less criminal.

friends have to excuse. How much would be left of us if all those who see inconsistencies in us should clip away from our character and reputation? It is an invariable rule that those who make the roughest work with the names of others are those who have themselves the most imperfections. The larger the beam in your own eye, the more anxious are you about the mote in somebody else's eye. Instead of going about town slashing this man's bad temper and the other man's falsity, and this woman's hypocrisy and that one's indiscretion, go home with the Ten Commandments as a monitor, and make out a list of your own derelictions.

Our mode of deciding upon others will be the mode which others will employ in deciding upon us. A harsh man, with cast-iron criticisms, will some day meet cast-iron. You flay others, and others will flay you. Let one of these merciless critics of character, overcome by temptation, some day step a little out of the right path, and he will find himself in hailstorms of denunciation. You have not the entire monopoly of spikes and goads, and pinners. "With what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again." More than all, we ought to be induced away from all harshness by the fact that we ourselves are to be brought into high tribunal at the last, and that he shall have judgment without mercy that has shown no mercy. You who are accustomed with rough grip violently to shake men for their misdeeds, waiting for no palliations and listening to no appeals, what will become of you, when, at last, with all your imperfections, you appear at the bar of your Maker?

Another Chance.

I AM in the burnished Judgment Hall of the Last Day. A great white throne is lifted, but the Judge has not yet taken it. While we are waiting for his arrival I hear immortal spirits in conversation. "What are you waiting here for?" says a soul that went up from Madagascar to a soul that ascended from America. The latter says: "I came from America, where forty years I heard the Gospel preached and the Bible read, and from the prayer learned in infancy at my mother's knee until my last hour I had Gospel advantage, but for some reason I did not make the Christian choice, and I am here waiting for the Judge to give me a new trial and another chance."

"Strange," says the other, "I had but one Gospel call in Madagascar, and I accepted it, and I do not need another chance."

"Why are you here?" says one who on earth had feeblest intellect, to one who had great brain, and silvery tongue, and marvelous influence. The latter responds:

"Oh, I knew more than my fellows. I mastered libraries, and had learned titles from colleges, and my name was a synonym for eloquence and power. And yet I neglected my soul and I am here waiting for a new trial."

"Strange," says the one of the feeble earthly capacity: "I knew but little of worldly knowledge, but I knew Christ, and made him my partner, and I have no need of another chance."

Heavenly Messages.

EVERY Christian carries a dispatch from God to the world. Let him ride swiftly to deliver it. The army is to advance and the enemy is coming. Go out and fulfil your mission. You may have a letter committed to your care, and after some days you find it in your pockets; you forgot to deliver it. Great was your chagrin when you found that it pertained to some sickness or trouble. God gives every man a letter of warning to carry, and what will be your chagrin in the judgment to find that you have forgotten it?

A week-night meeting widens the pulpit till all the people can stand on it. Such a service tests one's piety. No credit for going to church on Sabbath. Places of amusement are all closed, and there is no money to be made. But week-nights every kind of temptation and opportunity spreads before a man, and if he goes to the praying circle he must give up these things. The man who goes to the weekly service regularly through moonlight and pitch darkness, through good walking and slush ankle deep, will in the book of judgment find it set down to his credit. He will have a better seat in heaven than the man who went only when the walking was good and the weather comfortable, and the services attractive, which and his health perfect. That service costs nothing God accounts as nothing.

If you are on a railroad train, and stop at the depot, and a boy comes in with a telegram, all the passengers lean forward and wonder if it is for them. It may be news from home. It must be urgent or it would not be brought there. Now if while we are rushing on in the whirl of every-day excitement, a message of God meets us, it must be an urgent and important message. If God speaks to us in a meeting mid-week, it is because there is something that needs to be said before next Sunday.

Last Wills.

HOW common, and yet how beautiful it is to see so many legacies left for humane and Christian institutions! But there have been last wills and testaments where bequests have been made to charities, as if to atone for the unscrupulous manner in which the estate has been gathered, the legacy left seemingly with the idea of compromising with the Lord, as much as to say: "Accept this bequest as an atonement for the wrong way in which I got my money and let me into heaven." It was that principle which moved a man who had never given a farthing in all his life to call in a minister and say to him: "I am going to die, and do you think if I give $10,000 to an orphan asylum it will take me into the next world in safety?" And the minister replied: "I cannot warrant that it will do so, but I think it is an experiment worth trying."

Happy Exit.

WHAT a rough time most of our public men seem to have! I told the late Martin Farquhar Tupper, the last time he was in this country, and disposed to complain of some things said and written in regard to him: "Why, we in America never think much of a man until we have rubbed him down with a crash towel." But Christian men do their work and go. This world is no place for a man to stay in when his work is done, and no one but the Lord knows when a man's earthly mission is fulfilled. Some get through their life's work at 10 or 11 o'clock at night, some at 6 o'clock, some at three and some at noon. Blessed are they who have done their work and have done it well, and are early dismissed into everlasting festivities.

Epidemic of Crime.

WHAT is the matter all over the country now? Some ascribe it to electric currents and some think the world's last day is approaching. My theory is that all this time Satan is on a special rampage and the powers of darkness are making a special assault. Assured as Apollyon is that his reign must end and the whole earth be brought under Christly sway, he wants to do all the damage he can before the dawn of that morning when there shall be nothing to hurt or destroy in all the earth. By prayer, or increased fidelity in all we are called to do, let us hasten the time when kindness and righteousness shall dominate and the earth become an echo of heaven.

BRIEF NOTES.

The fiftieth anniversary of the installation of Dr. R. S. Storrs as pastor of the Church of Pilgrims, Brooklyn, is to be celebrated by appropriate services. The first meetings will be Thursday, November 19, at 3:30 and 7:30 P.M., when Dr. Storrs will hold a reception in the Church.

The Missionary Review says that in years the Christians in the Northwest Province India have increased from 13,000 to 22,000, and Bengal from 112,000 to 189,000. Sir Charles Elphinstone, Governor of Bengal, says: "The missionaries filling up what is deficient in the efforts of government."

During the past year the islanders of Kus Micronesia, have built three new churches of native coral rock to take the place of those destroyed by a hurricane five years ago. It required the labor of all the natives on the island for several weeks, and at the dedication service the people tended in a body.

A prominent Dutch gentleman, who travels for years in the Dutch East Indies, speaks thus of his approach to the village bordering on Lake, where the missionaries had established churches: "To be welcomed in the land of cannibals by children singing hymns, this, indeed, shows regenerating power of the Gospel."

A missionary writes that, as in Tibet, the social order is somewhat reversed in Laos. The man leaves his home and family at marriage to go to his wife's, giving up all his property. The wife holds the home and lands in her own name. The husband cannot lend an att (a Siamese word one cent) without the wife's sanction.

The Czar of Russia has presented a bell to the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Chatellerault, France, a town noted for its fan rifle factory. A Russian order for half a million rifles was recently executed there. The Czar's is in recognition of the service thus rendered to the army. The bell bears the satirical inscription: "Ring in peace and fraternity among the nations."

The Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church reports the receipts for month of September as $276,909, an advance about $4,500 on those for the corresponding month of last year. The total receipts for the six months were $1,039,802 against $957,579 for corresponding period of the preceding year, includes both domestic and foreign missions.

Evangelist Clement Palser, of London, arrived in New York on an evangelistic tour, is strongly recommended by some of the eminent clergymen and laymen in England. He speaks in the highest terms of the benevolent churches have derived from his Bible readings, preaching services. Letters addressed to him in this office will be forwarded.

Recent statistics as to the public libraries of the United States show that Massachusetts ranks first with 212 free public libraries with a total of 2,700,000 volumes, or 1,233 volumes to every of the State's population. New Hampshire comes next with 42 libraries and 175,000 books, or 404 volumes to every 1,000 of population. Illinois is third, having 42 libraries, or 130 volumes to 1,000 of population.

A Convention of the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip will be held in the first formed Church, Seventh Ave. and Carroll, Brooklyn, N. Y., of which Rev. J. M. Farr, pastor. A large number of clergymen will attend from this and other States. The convention will be held on November 18 and 19, at 2 and 8 P.M. The organization is now in operation in sixteen evangelical denominations.

In addition to the meetings being held at Cooper Union, New York, this month, Mr. M. will preach every Sunday afternoon at Carnegie Music Hall, in West Fifty-seventh St., at 10 o'clock. Tickets entitling the holder to reserve seats may be obtained at the rooms of the American Tract Society, 110 East Twenty-third St., or writing Mr. W. E. Lougee, 40 East Twenty-third St., and enclosing a stamped envelope.

The Evangelical Alliance of the United States has issued a call for the observance of Quiet Day, by the ministers of the various churches of the United States as a means of preparation for the campaign of the coming winter. It suggests that a day of conference and prayer, spent together by all the ministers in each community, and that that day be November 17, that in the evening of the same day all the officers of all churches be invited to be present.

A college village has been established at Anne, Ill., where students who are skilled in work are supporting themselves and gaining a education. The students rise at four o'clock, after breakfast and chapel, work on the land. This is dinner hour, and after that the study in classes until half-past five. Then sports and recreation and private study until nine o'clock which is bed-time. The proceeds of the farm, long to the college, and are devoted to the benefit and education of the students.

Dr. F. E. Clark, President of the Christian Endeavor Society, writes: "I am in Belfast, great metropolis of Northern Ireland, where the Christian Endeavor convention that Ireland has ever known, and one of the best I ever attended anywhere, is in progress. In London we attended a succession of great Christian Endeavor meetings which you can imagine, but which I find it hard to describe. The welcome meeting in the Tabernacle (Spurgeon's) filled that magnificent auditorium to the topmost gallery; yet there had been no advertising and not a line of notice in the papers. Mr. Meyer presided, and spoke most stirring words for Christian Endeavor as a spiritual force."

Recent letters from Mayesville, S. C., report that the Trustees and Teachers of the Industrial Institute are greatly encouraged by the tribulations of the readers of this journal. They do not think they have determined that the building shall be free of debt, its erection would have been commenced this Fall. About eight hundred dollars are now needed to make the building thoroughly adapted to its purpose. The work is ready done by these noble, self-sacrificing teachers, to give their poor brothers and sisters education is beyond praise. The value of the work and the need of the building are abundantly proved. Dr. Asa Blackburn, pastor of the Church of the Strangers in New York, and Bishop Rick, of the A. M. E. Church, who know the district well, commend the Institute in the strongest terms. Dr. Louis Klopsch, proprietor of this journal, is a member of the committee in charge of the fund.

THE BIBLE

AND THE NEWSPAPER

At Napoleon's Tomb.

DURING the recent visit of the Emperor and Empress of Russia to Paris, there was one episode of historic significance. The young potentate and his suite went to the crypt in the Invalides, where the body of the first Napoleon rests in its magnificent sarcophagus. This is one of the most interesting sights in Paris, and Czar would not be likely to miss it. When, in 1840, England gave up to France the corpse of the great Emperor, the French people reared for it one of the most magnificent mausoleums in the world. Among the buildings known as Hotel Invalides, which were erected to shelter the aged and invalid soldiers of France, the stately edifice rears its head. It is a square structure, surmounted by a tower of twelve windows, over which is a dome ornamented with beautiful reliefs and resplendent with gilding. Above the dome is a lantern, and over this a delicate spire and a cross. Within are chapels adorned with statues, frescoes, and paintings. In the centre, under the dome, the body of the dreaded warrior lies in its stone coffin. This is a single block of granite, brought from Finland at a cost of twenty-eight thousand dollars. It is sixteen feet long, over six feet wide and thirteen and a half high, and weighs thirty-seven tons. The pavement on which it rests is a symbolical mosaic. In a circle around the sarcophagus is a band bearing the names of Napoleon's victories, and the Czar would notice Moscow among them. Outside this band is a wreath of laurels surrounded with rays. From the top of the dome, from which the ordinary soldier looks down on the sarcophagus, the Emperor is indescribably solemn and suggestive. At the entrance are caskets containing the remains of two of Napoleon's most distinguished and faithful generals, and in niches around the crypt are flags and trophies won in Napoleon's battles. Among these scenes the young Emperor of Russia was taken to look on the coffin of the enemy of his nation. It would be hard if every monarch in the world went to see, if he would learn from the spectacle the lessons it teaches. Napoleon with all his genius and his mighty power, having made his name a terror in the world, was crushed miserably in prison, and of all the requests he won, his country retains scarcely anything. His career is an object lesson to every monarch who is tempted by ambition to disregard the warning of the Bible:

For that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity: he that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword. (Rev. 13: 10.)

Furniture Destroyed by Ants.

The Washington Government has suffered a trivial loss in a foreign land for which it can get no compensation. Our consul at Amoy, China, being directed to make an inventory of the furniture in the consulate was obliged to admit that it was practically worthless. The only article, however, that he can report as being in an undamaged condition is the iron safe. Every wooden article is the prey of white ants. This pest, he says, is no larger than a needle when it enters the wood, but it lives and grows until it becomes five times as large as the garden ant. By that time it has eaten its way deep into the article of furniture it has attacked and it begins to eat its way outward. When it emerges it makes a hole a quarter of an inch in diameter. It leaves the wood as a honeycomb. Millions of the creatures are in the consulate. Chairs, tables, bookcases, racks, doors, windows, and the flooring have been eaten away and have crumbled without warning and have had to be replaced. The consul says he knows that the ants are busy inside a dozen articles of furniture in the house which show no signs of the coming collapse, but he can do nothing to prevent their ravages and must patiently wait the end of them.

Happily we have no such pest in this country, but we have many examples of similar ravages in moral character. Many a man, whose character, like the furniture in the consulate, has seemed to be solid and substantial, has by its sudden collapse showed that it must have long been a hollow mockery, undermined by secret sin. Ye are like unto whitened sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness. (Matt. 23: 27.)

A Marriage in a Hospital.

The spectacles in a hospital-ward are not all associated with pain and suffering and death. An official in a hospital at by a wife's attentions. It was a charming explanation, and one which shows that the bridegroom is entitled to congratulation. We can but wish that people who have promised to give themselves to Christ were always like-minded, and did not permit unforeseen circumstances to prevent the fulfilment of their promise, and especially that they recognized an opportunity for service as a reason for making the surrender. Too often the conduct of the guests in our Lord's parable is the rule. And they all with one consent began to make excuse. (Luke 14: 18.)

Testing Moral Strength.

A saloon keeper at Tampa, Ga., was behind his bar one day when a miserable looking man entered, and telling a deplorable story of want and suffering, begged for relief. The saloon keeper was no stranger to the signs on the man's face, and he perceived that his real trouble was protracted dissipation. "If I give you money," he said, "you would go and get drunk with it." The man protested vehemently. "Well," said the saloon keeper,

THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA AT THE TOMB OF NAPOLEON I.

Elizabeth N. J., describes a marriage ceremony which took place in the accident ward of that institution. One of the city pastors visited the ward by request, and was conducted to the bedside of a patient who had broken his leg. Two ladies were there, and the pastor had been sent for to marry the patient to one of them. The other acted as bridesmaid, and the house-surgeon performed the duties of best man. The patients in the other beds raised themselves to look at the interesting scene. The simple service was soon performed, and the usual congratulations being tendered, the group separated, the newly made wife alone remaining to minister to her injured husband. On being asked for an explanation of the ceremony taking place there, the bride said that she and the patient had been engaged for some time and had fixed on that day for the ceremony. The fact of the bridegroom having met with a misfortune did not appear to them a sufficient reason for delaying the ceremony. Indeed, it was an additional reason for celebrating the marriage, as the man would be benefited

"I will try you. I will lock you in that room with a glass of whiskey and a five-dollar bill. If, at the end of an hour, you have not drunk the whiskey you shall have the money." The tramp's eyes glistened at the sight of the bill, and he readily agreed. Ten minutes after he had entered the room he clamored to be released. He had drunk the whiskey. Although he could have gained five dollars by one hour's abstinence, he was unable to resist his craving. So, men will commit sin, though they are assured on the highest authority that through indulgence they will lose their souls.

I tell you before, as I have told you in times past, that they who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God. (Gal. 5: 21.)

How Electricity is Measured.

The mystery about the system by which the electric light companies learn how much electricity is used by their customers, was explained, in the course of a trial in a Brooklyn court, soon after the meters were introduced. The company had charged the customer a larger sum than he considered he ought to pay, and they sued him for the amount. The manager of the company said that it was impossible there could be any mistake to the disadvantage of the customer, as the meter could not register more than was used. The instrument consisted of two discs of metal suspended in a jar of acid. They are connected with wires in such a way that when the current passes through them, one piece is decomposed, and the other gains the particles of metal detached from its companion. The electricity supplied to the customer must pass through the jar, and the process of disintegration and accumulation goes on only during the time that the electric current is turned on. At certain intervals the two pieces of metal are taken out and weighed, and the difference in the weight of each indicates how long they have been subjected to the action of the electricity, and consequently how long the lights in the house have been kept burning. The same result might be reached from the weight of either piece of metal, but is made absolutely certain when both are weighed. An analogous principle applied to the two natures that every man possesses, would reveal the extent to which the Christian's light had been kept burning. While it shines, his higher nature gains in strength and purity, while his lower nature loses its power.

If ye live after the flesh ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body ye shall live. (Rom. 8: 13.)

To Generate Its Own Light.

A novel invention for lighting railroad cars has been submitted to a number of railroad magnates. A car which was fitted up with incandescent electric lamps was attached to a train. At the rear of the car was a closet in which an electric generator was placed, connected with the axles of the car as to obtain an armature speed of twelve hundred revolutions a minute. The generator was in connection with secondary batteries under the car, which fed the twenty incandescent lamps. The experiment was a complete success. It needs now only the perfection of the storage arrangements, which will keep the lamps alight in the interval between the stopping and the starting of the car. So long as the car is running, the same power that gives it motion gives it light. The economy of the device will probably soon bring it into general use. It has long been known that an analogous principle operated in the spiritual world. Those of God's children who were most active in his service have always been those who have enjoyed the most spiritual light; and both light and power have come from the same divine source. Christ's promise always holds good:

He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life. (John 8: 22.)

An Aristocratic Foundling.

The sergeant in charge of Police Headquarters in New York, some time ago, was astonished to see a policeman bring in a handsomely dressed babe. He reported that a man had stumbled over it in a hallway an hour or two earlier in the evening and handed it to him, as he did not know to whom it belonged. The child was a boy, apparently two or three weeks old. He was exquisitely dressed in the finest linen and wore a robe liberally adorned with flounces and lace. The person who had left him in the hallway had taken care to wrap him up warmly in flannels and place him where he would surely be seen. He was taken to the matron's room, after the record of his being found had been entered in the sergeant's book. As there was no clue to his name, he was recorded simply as No. 62, he being the sixty-second child who has been found in the year under similar circumstances. No. 61, also a boy, had been found the previous night, and was still in the matron's care. He was insufficiently clad when found, and what clothing he had on him was of the commonest quality. He was evidently the child of poor parents, while the newcomer must have belonged to persons of means. Both were sent together to the Island to become wards of the city, and both will receive the same treatment. The little aristocrat will have no advantage from his having worn expensive clothes in his infancy. The wealthy and aristocratic sometimes forget that as the city treated the two children, so all men are treated when they stand before God:

Of a truth, I perceive that God is no respecter of persons. (Acts 10: 34.)

SILHOUETTES FROM LIFE

WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

The Gilfeathers.

It is never pleasant to visit the Gilfeathers," said my cousin Louise, pinning on her veil with a sigh. She was going to make church calls and the Gilfeathers were on her list.

"They have a pretty house and well-behaved children," she added, "but Mrs. Gilfeather is so afraid that you will bring in a speck of dust, or displace an article of furniture that she makes you extremely uncomfortable, and as for living at the Gilfeathers', it is enough to wear me out. Robert is my cousin, and I know what I am talking about. Well, dear, if you are ready, come along."

Louise Rodney is my cousin, and Bob Gilfeather is her's, but the Gilfeathers are no kin to me. When we entered the beautifully appointed drawing room that day, so spotlessly and aggressively clean, so shining with good order and neatness, I thought anybody might be happy there. But the lady of the house entered with a frown upon her brow, and several times during our conversation she interrupted the talk in the middle of a sentence to raise or lower a blind, to brush an invisible bit of fluff from the back of a chair, or to wipe a spot from a mirror. Louise displayed a book on the table from its precise angle, and Mrs. Gilfeather nervously arose and readjusted it. By-and-by her husband came home and welcomed us with cordial geniality, but he had scarcely taken his seat before his wife exclaimed:

"Robert, dear, where have you been with those boots? They are covered with mud, and you are tracking it in on the carpet. Pray excuse yourself and go and change them."

Mr. Gilfeather rose ruefully.

"I guess I'll say good afternoon," he blurted out. "When I was at home with the folks, Louise, my mother and sisters thought me a pretty neat sort of a fellow, but Mary is completely worn out with me."

"Now," remarked Mrs. Gilfeather, "Bob's gone off hurt, and he'll have nothing to say for the rest of the day, yet it was a very reasonable request I made of him. I try and try to keep the house decently, but I have a fight over it, and sometimes I am ready to give it up and sink into the dirt. Why, I never enjoy one moment. At family worship I am possessed to discover something wrong, and if I do, I hear nothing more, but am just in a flurry till Robert gets to Amen. And in church I see cobwebs above me and lint below—but then, I'm not responsible for the church housekeeping, and I'm thankful for it."

We came away.

Louise said, sadly:

"Mary Gilfeather reminds me of the woman who in the Philistia Progress, I'm sorry for her. I'm sorry for all the Christians who are in their family peace on the reefs of fiendish order and system. There are order and system, but the results are almost diabolical."

"I have often seen the poor wretches huddled together in groups around trunks and trees, trying to shelter themselves from the pelting rain of a tropical storm. Many who go ashore in the evening to come aboard again in the morning, numbed with cold and chattering with fever, too ill to crawl on board, they are left to die there in the forest."

reaction. And you heard what Mr. Gilfeather said."

"I heard what his poor wife said," I answered. "That her idol of domestic nicety should come between herself and the Lord, in the very hour of prayer, is a most pitiful thing. But, Louise, do we not all, more or less, allow our earthly pursuits and ambitions to come between us and heaven. Who are we that we should cast a stone at our sister? If we were more careful about the toilette of the soul, if we kept ever in mind that here we have no continuing city, how much more beautiful and tranquil would our lives be. No, dear, I will not too harshly censure poor Mrs. Gilfeather."

Days passed by. I was not surprised one sultry summer afternoon to hear that my friend Mrs. Gilfeather was very ill, and a trained nurse installed.

"What is the matter?" I asked, anxiously.

"A low fever, brought on by too much housework, and too much worry over trifles," Louise Rodney answered. "She has been, on the edge of nervous prostration for some weeks, and now Robert says that when his wife is better, he fears that they may have to break up their home, send the children to boarding school, and go to a hotel themselves."

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

An Enemy Changed.

As is well known, nearly every outbreak of persecution of the missionaries in China is preceded by the appearance of scurrilous posters on the walls. Dr. Griffith John, of Hankow, the famous missionary, who has been seeking the origin of these posters, and has traced them to a man named Chou Han, now publishes an interesting statement in regard to this man. He was proved by Dr. John to be the author of many of the most violent and obscene attacks on foreigners and on the Christian religion, which incited the mob to outrages on Europeans. The foreign Ministers in Peking demanded his arrest and trial, and after a long interval the Chinese authorities reported that he was insane, and he was accordingly released. Dr. John now reports that two native Christians, who went into Hunan preaching and selling books, entered Changsha, and there got into communication with Teng, who was one of the chief printers and publishers of Chou Han's writings. Teng stated to his visitors that Chou Han had greatly changed of late, that he was now studying Christian books, and had renounced Spiritualism and his former anti-foreign associates. He would like to visit Hankow, and there inquire of the missionaries concerning Christianity, but was afraid that he would be seized for his past misdeeds. Dr. John has written, inviting both Chou Han and Teng to visit Hankow and study Christianity for themselves.

There is greater significance in this news than would be recognized by people not familiar with Chinese customs. There is no one the missionaries have so much reason to dread as the men who produce and circulate the posters. The massacres which have horrified the world, like that at Kucheng last year, are generally the result of these posters. They are prepared with the design of inflaming popular passion against the missionaries. Usually they play upon Chinese fears and that the medicine foreigners dispense is poison, and that Chinese parents must take care of their children, otherwise the foreigner will steal them to replenish his stock of drugs. These ghastly falsehoods find ready credence among the lower classes of Chinamen. That men thus deliberately exciting passions that may be murderous should be inquiring about Christianity is indeed a triumph of grace.

King Leopold will Investigate.

The Slave Horrors and Barbarities of Congo State Officials to be Fully Looked Into—Cruelty that Almost Surpasses Belief.

LEOPOLD, King of the Belgians, has been aroused to the necessity of investigating the startling charges made against the Congo State officials, who are accused of cruelties in connection with the slave trade of the Upper Congo. Few stories of slavery are more appalling than that given below, which is taken from the official report of Mr. Alfred Parmenter on the slave traffic of the Upper Congo. Grave charges of cruelty had already been made against certain officers of the Belgian government, and concerning these Mr. Parmenter says: "I am sorry to say that notwithstanding denials from State officials on the spot from Brussels, they are, as a whole, only ordered to go next day to capture the chief. In some cases this kind of thing goes in the presence of the State officers; very often they are not on the scene; they have gone off to lunch, or are on the steamers dining, while the soldiers plunder, ravage, or murder to their heart's content. My agent (a Belgian) at our station of Iringi, told me that during the operations in that village, the officer in command (Lieutenant De Keyser) was actually lurking at an adjacent Dutch factory while troops were raiding right and left. At this raid the old chief came to my agent and showed him the mutilated body of his daughter, whose feet had actually been hacked off so that the soldiers might retain the heavy brass anklets she wore, which were worth a few pence. On return the girl's grave was opened, and I saw for myself what had taken place."

"On voyage once, in July, 1895, from Equator Station to Bangala, I met a captain in charge of a native sergeant of the public, returning to Coquilhatville. I encamped for the night close to us. The sergeant told me that the natives of the age on the opposite bank to where we were then encamped had not furnished their per tribute of rubber, but that he had made up for it. He then showed me a gruesome little native cloth bag filled with some half-dozen hands of negroes. Whenever these native soldiers make war on a village they scarcely by any chance able-bodied men—almost always old men, women, and children; very frequently white officer, who, as I have said, more often than not keeps judiciously in the background, comes up after the fight, utters not a word of reprimand to his men when he sees the hacked bodies of women and children lying about the raided age."

"One of the most horrible instances of cruelty that ever came to my knowledge occurred in the district of Quellie. A Belgian officer, a lieutenant, had been dispatched with a force of men to a village to capture the chief, who had been guilty of some fault against the government. The force arrived in the village, but found it apparently deserted; in rummaging in the huts for plunder, however, they came upon two women, mother and daughter, who had not had time to get away owing to the mother being ill; they were brought up before the officer in command who demanded of them where their chief was in hiding. The women either did not know or would not tell. The officer could only get the same answer from them after repeated inquiries, and finally his temper. He ordered them to be cured, and laid out on the ground, where they were held down by eight of the strongest men, and a stalwart officer proceeded to administer fifty strokes of 'chickotte' to each. The 'chickotte' is a strip of dried hippopotamus hide, about five feet long, and an inch wide at the end, tapering down to a thin, cruel lash. After fifty lashes had been administered the lieutenant again asked them for information as to the whereabouts of the chief, only to receive the same answer. The flogging continued until each had received two hundred lashes. Finally, this Belgian officer ordered his men to cut off the breasts of the women, and then left them to die where they lay."

"These are instances of the kind of warfare that is waged against the Congo people, and is at the bottom of the settled condition of the State. High State officials can scarcely be blamed; they what they can to improve matters, but it is impossible to deal with this sort of thing from Boma. What control is possibly be had on the actions of the strong young officers several weeks journey distant? Belgian officials receive so much per head for slaves whom they send down to the different training camps. I have often seen the slave steamer coming down the river packed with slaves—State men call them libres—sitting on deck in rows, with a spare inch to move in, and at night when the steamer stops, chased ashore to the bush to find shelter as they may. I have often seen the poor wretches huddled together in groups around trunks and trees, trying to shelter themselves from the pelting rain of a tropical storm. Many who go ashore in the evening to come aboard again in the morning, numbed with cold and chattering with fever, too ill to crawl on board, they are left to die there in the forest."

A NATIVE PATH IN A CONGO FOREST.

too true. Since 1884 the condition of the natives has gone from bad to worse, and the reasons are not far to seek. They are: (1), the absolute inexperience of most of the officers; (2), the impossibility of checking their actions from headquarters. For the most part officers arrive straight from Belgian towns. They have probably never been outside their own country before; and on being suddenly thrust with almost unlimited power among conditions that are strange, dangerous, unhealthy and depressing, it is no wonder that they lose their heads and adopt their own means of obtaining rapid promotion and wealth, in order the sooner to return to Europe. Hence the endless cases of brutality that occur. These are denied officially, but I will mention one or two cases which came under my immediate notice. Take, for instance, the much-dreaded stories of cutting off hands and ears. On one occasion at Bopoto, having dined with Lieutenant Blochteur, whose steamer was moored with mine alongside the quay, I was smoking with him on the bank; it was late in the evening, when suddenly a force of native troops returned from an expedition on which he had sent them in the morning. The sergeant held up triumphantly a number of ears fastened together on a string, and brought with him some half a dozen native prisoners. No white officer had been with these soldiers, and they were praised for their success, and Roumania's Peasant People.

A Picturesque Country with Many Old-time Customs—Homes of the Roumanians.

For the many picturesque countries of Europe, there are few more interesting or romantic than the comparatively new kingdom of Roumania, which lies between the Carpathian Mountains in Southeast Europe, the Black Sea, and the beautiful blue Danube. The accompanying illustration pictures two Roumanian peasant girls resting by the country roadside after a day in the fields. Their faces are animated, and they appear in the national dress of the peasant which, like the type of people it represents, is a composite of several characteristics of the Latin, Slavonic and Romani races, from which the Roumanian has sprung, and by which he is surrounded to-day. The "Vlachs" or Roumanians have a strong belief in their Roman origin and ancestry, but while there seems to be no absolute ground for the belief, their features do bear traces of Roman characteristics, especially those who live in the Carpathian valleys. They are often short and dark in appearance, and some show features more sharply cut than others. Taken as a whole the Roumanian peasantry are a picturesque people in manner, dress, and language. They are so good-humored, frugal, cleanly, and sober, despite their wretched homes and dwellings, made of thatched roofs, covered with grass, and insufficiently constructed. Disorder and larceny among the Roumanian peasantry are things unknown. They excel as builders and artisans, and show natural capacity for trade and manufacture. They also make good soldiers, and each Roumanian from 26 to 46 years of age is compelled to serve his time in some branch of the army.

As in manner, appearance, and dress, so in the Romance language and literature, there are evidences of Latin and Slavonic influence. All the old traditions assert themselves in the customs, folk-lore, and language of the Roumanian. Although the actual vocabulary of the Romance language is only about one-fifth Latin, yet words in common use are all from the Latin. Such words as those connected with the home, heart, and affection, however—as mother, love, etc.—are of Slavonic origin. The black soil of Russia, which entrenches upon the fair plain of Roumania, and the proximity of her cold, bitter winds, which annually sweep through the country, have their effect and influence upon the customs, times, and even dress of the Roumanians. The strongest influence brought to bear upon them, in fact, is that of the Russian and Slav peoples by whom they are surrounded.

Some idea of the religious status and belief of the Roumanians may be formed from the fact that out of the five million people living in the two principalities of the kingdom, Moldavia and Wallachia, three million belong to the Roumanian branch of the Orthodox Greek Church. There are only 13,800 Protestants in all Roumania. Against 18,452 priests, monks, and nuns, however, there are 684,168 agriculturalists and 83,061 artisans and laborers. The educational status is also fairly good. Charest and Jassey, the two largest cities, and capitals, showing two universities. There is also a woman's college, named Asyle Helene after the founder, Princess Helena Cuza, which accommodates 230 girls, many of whom are orphans. The Academy at Bucharest has a national library of over 30,000 volumes, and a fine ethnological museum.

Of the estimated population of 5,376,000, 400,000 are Jews, and 200,000 Gypsies. Roumanians seldom eat meat except on fast days, their favorite food being a kind of maize meal and salt. Vegetables, fruit, and fruits are produced on the foothills of the Carpathians, and plums are cultivated to a large extent. The rearing of domestic animals is also one of the chief industries, sheep and cattle raising being extensively carried on. Buffaloes and oxen take the place of horses in the fields.

While the people of the dreary lowlands are subjected to marsh fever, those who live on high ground are prosperous and comparatively free from disease and discomforts. Roumania is thickly covered with forests, and the higher elevations, rising to a height of 6,000 or 8,000 feet, are crowned by pines, firs, larches, and beeches. Even the plains are more than one thousand feet above sea level. Ground improves farther inland, and there are sections where vines, plums, peaches, helpful and healthful companionship. One of earth's most pitiable sights is a woman child alone in a great city that has no time to think of her, no glance to give her, no ear to lend to her sob. It becomes the old, old story too soon, of love, trust, desertion, and then—why then, the mad delirium of a suicide's death. This is not romance, dear reader—would that it were. In our cities such stories are as common, and too often as little noticed as the dust we tread underneath our feet. Death comes and brushes such dust away, but it gathers again on the morrow.

The Beggar's Knock.

Beggars have a characteristic knock. This man with a printed certificate that he was blown up with Vesuvius, and drowned in the Mississippi, and afterward killed on the railroad, and considerably injured in other respects, comes against your basement door with an emphasis indescribable. He feels that you have what belongs to him. His knuckles are hard by much practice. When he strikes your door, it means, "Stand and deliver!" but some night, about ten o'clock, you

IN HIM WE LIVE.

O MASTER, let me walk with thee
In lowly paths of service free;
Tell me thy secret, help me bear
The strain of toil, the fret of care;
Help me the slow of heart to move
By some clear winning word of love;
Teach me the wayward foot to stay,
And guide them in the homeward way.

O Master, let me walk with thee
Before the taunting Pharisee;
Help me to bear the sting of spite,
The hate of men who hide thy light,
The sore distrust of souls since
Who cannot read thy judgments clear,
The dulness of the multitude
Who dimly guess that thou art good.

Teach me thy patience; still with thee
In closer, dearer company,
In work that keeps faith sweet and strong,
In trust that triumphs over wrong,
In hope that sends a shining ray
Far down the future's broadening way,
In peace that only thou canst give,
With thee, O Master, let me live!

Children's Songs.

IN all homes, whether the children attend a kindergarten or not (writes Miss Katherine Beebe, a famous kindergarten), the beautiful song books of these latter days should be in use. Mother and children should sing together, the children should be taught to sing for others, and where it is possible, the song-story should be acted out in a play spirit. These song books furnish music for almost every occasion in childhood, and songs learned by the children can be used in a way that will make life happier for all who hear them. No kindergarten needs to say that she disapproves unqualifiedly of showing children off. Mothers still do this to their own and the children's undoing, and the songs and plays of the kindergarten seem to furnish added temptation to these fond and foolish parents to go on with the process of brushing off the bloom of childish unconsciousness. But children can sing for others without being shown off. Christmas, Thanksgiving, and Easter songs can be sung on the occasions for father. Groups of neighborhood children can give little serenades and concerts to friends and neighbors judicious enough to listen respectfully and comment sensibly. What invalid or convalescent would not rejoice to hear songs sung by happy children's voices? What family festival would not be sweeter for the childish songs which voice the soul of the occasion? There are homes where the mother or father, or both, can and will take the time to sing with the children, to teach them the beautiful songs which are so many that the teacher can only use a fraction of them, to learn the songs which they sing in school or kindergarten, and so to have in their home music for the children as well as for themselves.

With any or all of these books many a happy evening hour can be passed and many a profitable Sunday afternoon, for the devotional songs in these collections are good music, which is more than can be said of most Sunday School melodies.

Impromptu Housekeeping.

In a letter from Marseilles, Miss Frances E. Willard thus describes her housekeeping experience in caring for the Armenian refugees: "The chief of the police gave Lady Henry and myself leave to go backwards and forwards and even to set up a kitchen. Then came six hours of feverish activity. The Armenians were delighted to have something to do. They cleaned uninhabited rooms on the ground floor that were filled for twenty years with plaster and other rubbish. A large room was called the refectory and another the kitchen. Lady Henry hired for forty francs for a month a stove, cauldrons, etc. I bought five dozen mugs, as many plates, and badly needed miscellaneous articles. The whole cost thirty-one francs. In the evening, to the delight of all, the stove was in working order, and one hundred and fifty Armenians each received a pound of bread, an onion, a capsicum, salt and a few olives. A responsible manager was appointed out of the number, and a cook. Lady Henry bought herself all the provisions and did her marketing. She spared herself no trouble. The food she gave seemed a miracle, and if it had come down straight from heaven could not have given rise to more religious thankfulness."

PEASANT VILLAGE GIRLS OF ROUMANIA.

and Southern fruits grow in profusion. The plain to the left of the Danube is, however, dreary and unproductive, subject to inundations, and with large areas covered by coarse grass alone.

The climate of Roumania is very trying. Spring exists only in name, and the terrible icy Russian wind, or crivets, blows 155 days in the year. Another wind from the south, scorching in its heat, torments the people 126 days of the year. Snow is nearly always present in winter, and autumn, the longest period, is the only enjoyable season, usually lasting to the end of November.

Canada's Motherless Girls.

In our Canadian cities and towns, says a writer in the Toronto Sunday School Era, there are many girls who are practically motherless, and homeless save for the four walls of their boarding room. There is a tremendous responsibility resting upon the teachers of such girls—a responsibility that reaches beyond the Sunday afternoon class, and involves the opening up to them of Christian homes where they shall find loving counsel and hear something at the basement. It is a cold night, and you think it is only the wind rattling the shutters; but after a while you hear it again—a faint tap, as though it were not made with the knuckle, but the nail of the little finger. You open the door, and before a word is returned, you read in her face: "No fire! No bread for the children? No coverlets to keep them warm! No hope!" She had been at a dozen doors before, but had knocked so softly there was no response. She did not dare to touch the bell lest it might with garrulous tongue tell all her woe.

Is any one watching that woman in the thin shawl? Did any ear listen to the crunch of that woman's foot in the crisp snow? When she struck the nail of her little finger against the cold basement door, was the stroke drowned by the night wind? No! It sounded farther than the heavy bang of the sturdy beggar—louder than the clang of forge, or pounding of gauntleted fist of warrior at castle gate. Against the very door of heaven it struck, and sounded through the long, deep corridors of Infinite pity. "Rip—rap! Rip—rap! Rip—rap!"

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

A Reader of this journal in New York City, who does not give his name, sends us a clipping from some unidentified publication, which inquires about the disposition of the $50,000 raised by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers for Armenian relief purposes. It is evident that the writer of the paragraph in question is not familiar with our relief work. Of the money raised, $15,000 was cabled to Van, where Dr. Kimball and her associates, American Board Missionaries, used it to the best advantage. $1,000 to Rev. Dr. Cochrane, American Missionary at Urumiah, Persia, for aiding refugees. $30,000 cabled through the A. B. C. F. M. in New York, to these sixteen relief stations in Armenia: Erzeroom, Erzingan, Harpoot, Diarbekir, Mardin, Gemarek, Aintab, Sivas, Abrakbir, Oorfa, Malatia, Palu, Marash, Gurun, Hodjin, Cesarea. $1,000 per week is now being forwarded from the Fund to the neediest points in Armenia, through the A. B. C. F. M. Besides the above, $1,000 was sent to Miss Frances E. Willard for work among the refugees at Mar-seilles, making a total outlay of $40,000 up to date, and extending over a period of nearly ten months. The balance of $6,000 is now being remitted at the rate of $1,000 per week to the neediest places as above stated, and before the end of the year the Armenian Relief Fund will have been fully expended.

Ralph M., Plainfield, N. J. Is it possible to harmonize the two genealogies of Christ given respectively by Many efforts have been made to do so and several hypotheses have been suggested which are reasonable. The one that commends itself to the largest number of scholars is that of the able scholar, Dr. Barrett, who contends that Matthew gives the genealogy of Joseph and Luke that of Mary. The husband and wife belonging to the same tribe would naturally have in their genealogical lines some ancestors common to both. After a great deal of research, he discovered that the Jews had a habit in tracing the female line, of speaking of a woman's husband, as the son of her father, when really he was the son-in-law. Thus Luke speaks of Heli as the father of Joseph, when he was Mary's father and Joseph's father-in-law. If that theory is correct, Jesus could trace his genealogy through Mary to David and Abraham. That there was no flaw in it we may be sure, otherwise the Jews would surely have pointed it out when his Messiahship was claimed. It is matter of history that this question was never raised during his life or for a hundred years after his death.

The Christian, above all others, has a right to make politics what it ought to be, viz., the privilege to have a voice in the selection of our rulers and to be able to place in positions of trust and influence men of Christian character. America would act as a unit on all questions that affect public morality and public welfare, and for the elimination of every vicious element from public affairs, politics would soon be purified. Such a reform would be a step

M. E., Everett, Va. I am trying to bring my little children up to love the Lord, reverence the Bible and be dutiful in saying their prayers. I tell them what I think their little minds can comprehend. I haven't tried to frighten them into obedience, by telling of the punishment of hell. I want them to serve the Lord through love. Am I right? The oldest is nine years old. Is she old enough to become convicted of sin and seek forgiveness of the Lord? Should I teach her this?

The earlier a child is made to understand the simple and beautiful story of Christ's incarnation and sacrifice for a sinful world, the better. Children readily grasp all the essentials of the Gospel story. Love will draw them; it is not necessary to frighten them into the kingdom. A child of nine is not too young to learn to love Christ, and to accept him as her Redeemer.

Samuel S., Dayton, O. Do you think it is right for a Christian to make a practice of spending the Sabbath at home reading sermons instead of going to church?

A true Christian will not neglect the appointed ordinances of religion, and if church be available, he will go there to worship, no matter how simple the service. For a healthy man or woman, professing Christianity, to remain at home Sundays instead of going to church to publicly join with others in divine worship, is seemingly without excuse. Sermon-reading is a poor substitute for the audible Word, and may be a mere pretext for indulging laziness.

Many volumes have been written on the subject without any sure result being reached. The opinion generally accepted now is that it consisted in attributing to Satanic influence the works and wonders worked by Jesus through the power of the Holy Spirit. Whether it may be committed in these times is doubtful. The nearest approach to it is perhaps in stating at conversion, and in saying that the converted person is under the influence of Satan.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic
for the Week Beginning November 15.
Psalm 104:1-35.

RECENT discoveries, like the discoveries of past centuries, have all tended to prove the universality of natural law. In the child age of the world, devout men felt the nearness of God in every phenomenon. The thunder was God's voice; the volcano was the place where his finger touched the world; the sun was created to give light to the world by day, and the moon to give it light by night; the clouds were God's chariot; the mountain torrents were the waters flying at God's rebuke. Men no longer think so of God. The earth is not so important a part of the universe as these ideas implied. Men seeking for God have found a law. They thought that God was behind that law, but seeking him there, they found another law, and so God has seemed to recede farther from us as we learn more of the world, and the universe of which it is a part. There is longer rest, realizing these facts, we come to put God out of our thoughts altogether. There is a possibility of our being satisfied with the reign of law, and assuming that at the remote point in the series, where our knowledge ceases, there are still other laws yet to be discovered, which account for the origin of all material things. It should never be forgotten, that back of all the phenomena we are studying, God lives and reigns. These wonderful processes, which amaze us by their adaptation, are only God's mode of working, and we ought to feel a greater reverence for him, as we find that instead of scrutable and capricious interference with the material universe, he proceeds in an orderly and regular manner.

He is but a very superficial student of science who can hold to the theory of a self-existent, self-originating universe. The Psalmist's call to men to bless the Lord, who is very great and is "clothed with honor and majesty," evokes a hearty response from the Christian scientist. The more he discovers of God's ways, the more exalted does his wisdom become manifest. The world with its teeming life, and its stores of coal and minerals, and its mighty forces of electricity and other agencies, which we are just learning to harness as our servants, is no less the product of his wisdom than it seemed to be to the Psalmist, who imagined it to be the centre of the universe, and called into existence at a word. It is still true that "all things were made by him and without him was not anything made at was made." The theologians are alarmed at the bold theories of science, but their arm is no new sensation.

They tried to silence Galileo because his theories apparently contradicted the Bible. The Copernican system was denounced as heistic, but both have been accepted, and religion has lost none of its influence over the human mind. The newer discoveries will ultimately be accepted, too. Men will see in them new reasons for bringing the wisdom and love of the Supreme Origin of all things. The Captain of the vast machine that now carries a fleet of ships to sea, and navigates the waves of defiance of winds, is no less the Captain of his ship, when his orders are telegraphed to his subordinates in the hold, than was the captain who shouted his orders through a speaking trumpet. So the Psalmist's declaration is still true: The glory of the Lord shall endure forever.

Turkey in Prophecy.

The Great Assassin Bringing the Long Career of Turkish Crime to the Culmination When Judgment will be Executed.

URKEY'S cup of iniquity has been filling for centuries. It has seemed as we have read of the outrages in Armenia as if God did not take any notice, but all history teaches that no nation can give herself to cruelty and vice and immorality as Turkey has done without incurring the punishment God metes out to offenders against his laws. In a recent article in the Prophetic News,* Dr. J. Martin gives reasons for believing that the time is near at hand when this monstrous anomaly of Mohammedan rule in Europe will be brought to an end. He says:

Does it appear to any that the righteous Governor of the universe will allow the crimes of a nation to go unpunished? Look at three instances in Holy Writ of vengeance on a nation of wrongdoers, falling at last with appalling force after the long suffering patience which God exercises toward sinners is exhausted.

1. The Destruction of the Antediluvians. God bore with them patiently for a long period, but at last he used the elements of nature for their annihilation. It is written, "Behold I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth to destroy all flesh" (Gen. 6:17). No doubt there were many "physicians" who framed prescriptions for the cure of "the world that then was," but the Lord took hold of the case and after he had provided for the safety of the few faithful ones, swift destruction fell on all the rest.

2. The Destruction of Sodom and the Cities of the Plain. These were destroyed by fire from heaven, notwithstanding the prayers and labors of Abraham and Lot.

3. The Destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. The end of the Jewish nation was brought about by the Roman army, who were instruments in the hands of God to perform his will. That the destruction of Jerusalem and the scattering of the nation was no mere accident but was the punishment of God for their sins is evident from the way Christ spoke of it before it occurred. He evidently saw that it was coming. "They shall fall by the edge of the sword," "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh."

These three historical illustrations will help the reader to perceive how God carries out his purposes with regard to the human family, and how he deals with kings and nations who persistently defy him.

It is not necessary that God should bring a flood upon Turkey, as he did on the Antediluvians; nor that he should rain fire upon it, as he did on the Cities of the Plain; there is an instrument at hand in Russian greed, that he can use as effectively for the destruction of Turkey as he used the Romans for the destruction of Jerusalem. Hitherto England, France, and Austria for their own reasons have held back Russia's hand. In 1856 and in 1878 Turkey was protected from the Russian bear. But now France has become the friend and ally of Russia. England has grown ashamed of her Turkish protégée and will not raise a finger to help him, and Austria's consent to Russian aggrandizement can be purchased by a share of the spoils. That is the present situation.

THE SHIELD OF A CHRISTIAN MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

By W. E. S. BAKER.

CHAPTER XV.

WHEN Nellie recovered her senses sufficiently to realize the extent of the peril from which Seymour's heroism had delivered her, with the help of Mr. Barclay, she desired to see both the young men that she might thank them. Her father brought them to her and added his own grateful words to hers.

"Milton," she said, "I grieve to tell you something that I fear will cause you annoyance. I have lost your ring. I had it on my finger when that dreadful wave came, but now it is gone." She extended her white hand as she spoke.

Milton was really vexed, though he would not show it in that hour when there should be no feeling in any heart in that party but devout thankfulness for the great deliverance from death. It was the ring that Blake had handed to him, and he was not sure whether Blake had given it to him, or whether he had merely put it into his hands for safe keeping. He was therefore sorry to hear of its being missing. His mother was able at once to relieve his anxiety.

"No, dear Nellie," she said; "the ring is safe. I took it off your finger when we were rubbing your hands. Here it is."

She placed it in Nellie's hand, but the girl did not restore it to its place. Calling Carrie to her side she put it on her finger saying: "It ought to have been there from the first."

Carrie did not affect to misunderstand her, but permitted her to put the ring on her finger, and she held out her hand admiringly as the glittering stone sparkled in the light.

"Why, Carrie, dear," said Mrs. Seymour, who was looking on, "where did you get that other ring from? Did Milton give it to you?" She had taken Carrie's hand in her own and was looking at a crown-diamond ring that the girl was wearing.

"Oh, no," said Carrie, "papa gave me that. It was mamma's, a present from her father on her marriage. Papa saved it for me, and he gave it me only yesterday, when we were coming here."

Among Mrs. Seymour's most cherished relics of her early life, was a duplicate of that ring, which her father had given her. She was now assured that Carrie must be the daughter of her dead sister, whose unkindness had been one of her bitterest troubles. She gave no explanation then, however, as the investigations then in progress would have to be more fully explained than was possible at this stage of affairs. Even then a letter was partially written to the English lawyers, clearing up certain points over which they were puzzled, and Mrs. Seymour went to her room to finish it. Mr. Price, too, went to resume his talk with Deacon Walter, leaving the four young people together.

The Deacon and Mr. Price was by this time perfected, and they were arranging various schemes for developing the trade, in which Mr. Barclay usually assisted. His presence and he was summoned from the more congenial company in Nellie's room.

"Well," said Mr. Walter, "everything is arranged satisfactorily. If you and Mr. Barclay have nothing more to suggest, consign the first lot of goods in September."

"Everything seems straight," Walter, replied Mr. Price, and Mr. Barclay also nodded affirmatively, as Mr. Price continued: "The goods are the best in the market, and we will do our utmost to sell them. But why not stay here a few days longer, Walter, and enjoy the sea air?"

"No, I am restless until I can get back," said the Deacon. "I shall be away before you are around in the morning. Good-bye, take care of yourself, also of that lovely daughter of yours, and keep her out of the ocean, and away from Seymour. There is something wrong about him, and I cannot endure the fellow."

"But his heroism saved my child's life," said Mr. Price, with emphasis.

"Not a bit of it, sir," said Deacon Walter. "It was he who led her into danger. Mr. Barclay saved both their lives. Now, sir, Seymour's foolhardy conduct calls, in my opinion, for blame. He could not have done less than he did for your daughter's rescue, having been the cause of her peril. Beware of him; and be kind enough, also, to keep an eye upon my daughter Carrie."

"Good-bye to you," said Mr. Barclay, rising, "but Mr. Walter, you do great injustice to a worthy young man, and you will live to think better of him. I know him well, and am satisfied that a fellow with his principles will make his mark in the world."

Saying which the friends separated, Mr. Walter returning home early in the morning.

On the afternoon of Deacon Walter's departure, Milton wandered down to the beach in a depressed state of mind. He felt half afraid to see Nellie, and ashamed to meet Carrie, and conscience, that ever present monitor, admonished him that something was wrong in his own heart, and until it was righted, he would have no peace.

While seated on the ribs of an old wreck (which was half buried in the sand), his cheek resting on his hand, looking forlorn and forsaken, and staring vacantly at the ocean, he observed Carrie and Mr. Barclay approach. She had taken his arm, and they were chatting in a friendly manner. Milton could not hear a word that was said, nor did he attempt or desire to do so, but he saw them writing on the wet sand with their fingers.

After they had passed on, from curiosity he went to the spot, and read in Carrie's hand: "Milton Se—," the rising water having washed away part of the name. He also saw underneath, "Carrie W—," while Mr. Barclay had formed in the sand, one of those modern absurdities called a "monogram," in handsome old English capitals, wherein the initials of the draughtsman's name and those of Carrie were entwined together.

Later in the day Milton again sought the comparative solitude of the water's edge, and again examined the letters and characters written in the sand. The water had obliterated Carrie's name and his own entirely; but the monogram remained beyond the reach of the tide. The young man seemed to read his fate in the shifting sand and rising tide. Not only did he feel jealous of Mr. Barclay, but suspected that Deacon Walter had taken some measures, probably in concert with Mr. Price, to prevent intercourse between Carrie and himself. He could not blame Carrie, but wondered whether Carrie still thought well of him; whether Nellie was beyond recovery. He had a loving, soft heart, whose tendrils would necessarily twine around somebody, and he was without the moral strength which gives constancy to the character—for such a heart to be without an object of affection was like a man who had suddenly lost his sense of sight or hearing. He was wretchedly unhappy, and could not tell his troubles to his mother, as his own misconduct had been its cause. While thus ruminating, doubtful as to what he should do, and almost wishing himself dead, he heard the sound of horses behind him, and turning, he saw Carrie and Mr. Barclay approaching on horseback, riding the identical pair of black trotters which Nellie and Milton had ridden so recently. They gaily cantered by, without noticing Milton. At a little distance they stopped, and Mr. Barclay seemed to be pointing out to Carrie a steamship setting out to Europe.

MEDICAL WISDOM

The Dreaded Consumption Can Be Cured.

T. A. Slocum, M.C., the Great Chemist & Scientist, Offers to Send Free, to the Afflicted, Three Bottles of His Newly Discovered Remedies to Cure Consumption and All Lung Troubles.

Nothing could be fairer, more philanthropic or carry more joy in its wake than the offer of T. A. Slocum, M.C., of 183 Pearl Street, New York City.

Confident that he has discovered an all-lute cure for consumption and all pulmonary complaints, and to make its great merit known, he will send free, three bottles to reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who is suffering from chest, bronchial, throat, lung troubles or consumption.

Already this "new scientific course of medicine" has permanently cured thousands of parently hopeless cases.

The doctor considers it a religious duty which he owes to humanity to do his infallible cure.

Offered freely, apart from its inherent strength, is enough to commend it, and make so is the perfect confidence of the great chemist making the proposition.

He has proved consumption to be a curable disease beyond any doubt.

There will be no mistake in sending—mistake will be in overlooking the generous invitation. He has on file in his American-European laboratories testimonials of experience from those cured, in all parts of the world.

Delays are dangerous. Address T. A. Slocum, M.C., 183 Pearl Street, New York, when writing the Doctor, please give exact and postoffice address, and mention reading this article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

No, Mr. Barclay, I never could cross the ocean again," said Carrie. "My experience has been an unhappy one."

But wrecks are very unusual now on these big ocean steamers. There would be a thousand chances to one that you would find there safely in nine days from the port," replied Mr. Barclay, and then they proceeded up the beach.

Milton wondered what all this meant: why Mr. Barclay should talk of taking Carrie to Europe? Was it a wedding? Were they engaged? Had Carrie soon forgotten him, and without letting him know? The young man sighed, and was heavy of heart.

Meanwhile Carrie and her escort were slowly going homeward. Their horses were dropped to a walk, and the two riders and the journey so pleasant that they did not quicken the pace of their steeds. "Miss Carrie," Mr. Barclay was saying, "you know that I may possibly sail for Europe next week?"

So soon as that?" asked Carrie, surprised.

Yes," he replied, trying to elicit her sympathy, or at least to extract some sign of regard, "and I may never return, having but few ties in this country."

But will you still be connected with Price's and papa's business?"

Probably," answered the young man. Then pray do not forget your old friends at Brookdale. For one, I will be happy to hear from you whenever convenient. In these days of degeneracy, cannot afford to lose a friend."

Mr. Barclay was elated by this kindly response, and turning his eyes full upon her, with all the tenderness of love, all the pathos and fervor of a true lover, he said: "Miss Carrie, can I never hope to have a deeper feeling friendship from you?"

She was so entirely unexpected to her she could not immediately reply, although knowing exactly what duty prompted her to say. Her silence misled Barclay, who proceeded, getting more and more loving in tone and manner: "Are you free, my dear friend, to devote the love of a sincere and devoted friend?"

"Oh! Mr. Barclay, spare me," said Carrie, putting her hand before her face, trembling violently.

Barclay was deeply moved by her action, but was resolved to know what she might cherish. "Dear Miss Carrie," he said, "pardon me and be patient with me. Forgive me if I have oversteered. If you must refuse me pray to know if your refusal is owing to objections to me personally, or love for another? Is not Milton engaged to Nellie?"

His diversion somewhat reassured her, who replied: "He is not engaged to anybody; but I thought you knew of our childish promise to each other."

There was another crisis, a time to try what foundation their respective characters were built. Carrie admired Barclay more than any other man she had met. Her girlish affection for Milton faded, but he had shown that he could not transfer his regard to another. For some time had the close, friendly, affectionate intimacy, which began in girlhood and had fully developed at nineteen; but for Barclay she entertained a real attachment with great respect, and some little of which she was not too ignorant to perceive that he was deeply interested in her. What were these young people, or any two in similar circumstances, to do? The young woman of nineteen would sacrifice the love of a gentleman of twenty-five who was of excellent reputation, established in business, of good education and dress, because of a romantic promise given her by one who was still young, comparatively poor, without business, and unable to be able to marry for years to come. What man, after living to that point, finding then for the first time a girl who seemed to possess every requisite of an ideal desire in a wife, would quietly retire from the contest, especially when he knew his advantages over his rival, and his supposed weakness of the other sex?

To the honor of manhood, and of true womanhood, be it said that, unlike so many of her sisters, Carrie Walter was true to her implied promise to Milton Seymour; and Mr. Barclay gracefully yielded to circumstances, being unwilling to disparage Milton, or to attempt to displace him in Carrie's affections.

The conversation soon arrived at a point where she could not explain herself understandingly, without telling him the whole story of the childish agreement, under the beech tree, and of its subsequent renewals, especially the promise to "let" the other know if either met another whom they liked better. He affected to be amused at the agreement, although really Mr. Barclay carried a heavy heart on that occasion. Carrie was relieved from all embarrassment, however, by his kindness, and his very natural mistake respecting Milton's behavior to Nellie Price. She was also touched by the sincerity with which he pleaded to be forgiven for any annoyance he might have given her, and hoped that their friendship, at least, should continue as heretofore.

"Miss Carrie," said Mr. Barclay, "that is a splendid arrangement between Seymour and yourself. Ha! ha! to 'let' one another know! If all lovers would do that what torrents of bitter tears would be saved in this wicked world. But why cannot I be a party to that covenant, and so form what the statesmen call a triumvirate? Do you think Milton, and my dear friend Miss Carrie, would be willing to admit me into the compact?"

"I do not understand you, Mr. Barclay."

"Why, my dear friend, I mean just this. Seymour has promised to 'let' you know, if he ever falls in love with a lady; eh?" said Mr. Barclay, giving her one of his most searching looks.

"Yes."

"And Miss Carrie has promised to 'let' him know if she ever has reason to change her mind. Is that right?"

"Yes, that is what I have been telling you."

"Well, then, all I ask is for Miss Carrie to promise me, that if Seymour should 'let' her know, at any time in the coming ten years, that she will 'let' me know the fact soon after!"

"It may not be quite conventional, Mr. Barclay," said Carrie, with some hesitation, and after a long silence; "but I do not pretend to misunderstand your meaning; so I promise."

"Thank you, my dear friend," said Mr. Barclay, guiding his horse to her side, and reverently raising her hand to his lips, "the compact is sealed."

She is Earnest

That bright, practical writer, Fanny Field, is in earnest when she says, "I know several women who not only support themselves and families from the profits of poultry raising, but are putting by money for 'the rainy day' that may come in the future. What these women have done others may do, provided they go to work rightly and stick to it." She then adds further, "when their chickens and eggs are raised they will bring just as much in the market as though a man raised them."

Poultry and egg raising is a light, pleasant occupation for which women are specially adapted. All any woman needs to know of the poultry business may be learned from

To Lift Up Erring Girls.

What the Social and Gospel Tea Services at the Bowery Mission are Accomplishing—Bringing in the Wanderers.

THE recently inaugurated afternoon "Social and Gospel Services" at the Bowery Mission for women and girls, have already been a means of blessing to all concerned. The movement originated with Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, the "Mother of the Bowery Mission," whose Christian labors for many years among the waifs and strays of the Bowery are already widely known. The "Social and Gospel Services" are held regularly on Saturday afternoon, and are largely attended by a class who stand sorely in need of the ministrations of such consecrated ladies as Mrs. Bird has gathered around her in this work.

"If you saw the women of the Bowery as I see them," said Mrs. Bird to the writer, "drunken, reckless, and leading sinful lives, you would understand the great need of making an effort to reach out a helping hand to draw in and save these poor creatures whose principal home, night and day, is the streets of that bad thoroughfare. We must save the Bowery girls; and by the grace of God, we will save them."

Our illustration on this page is photographed from the second gathering of the Saturday Afternoon Social and Gospel Service at the Mission, 105 Bowery. The room is large and well lighted, and the numbers present are an encouraging sign and inspiration to Mrs. Bird and her assistants at the beginning of this new work for women. Sad and touching incidents arise at each meeting: each woman's testimony giving evidence of a life either misspent or wronged by the bold and selfish crimes of others, the shadow of whose evil deeds must ever envelope as a pall, the heart and memory of the victim, and the unfortunate one.

The sins of heredity are sometimes manifested in a startling way, through the heart and life stories of many of these women, who, when they feel that they are surrounded by true, sympathetic friends, do not hesitate to avow their hatred of the life they have been leading.

One of the most remarkable incidents was developed recently in the story of a woman who opened her heart in unsobered tears to the writer, a former teacher, and came of a respectable name and family. Domestic trouble, in which a dearly-loved brother had married and cast her off, had led her to a life of dissipation and ruin. Having had a thought and desire was drink "to drown her troubles," as men are fond of saying. As her trials grew, so did her habit. She first became reckless, and the inevitable consequences, loss of her position, followed.

Beyond her grief and humiliation at being rendered homeless by her brother, she was now added to the terrible habit was the fact that her father had been in like manner, cursed before her. The woman in question is quiet, intelligent, and thirty, and her story was told without a tear, a quiver of the lip, or any sign whatever of active grief or of emotion.

The Mission of Wealth.

In a recent article, John P. Newman, D.D., Bishop of the M. E. Church, gives this eloquent and suggestive outline of the duties and opportunities of wealth:

"Wealth has the noblest of missions. It is not given to hoard, nor to gratify, nor for the show of pomp and power.

The rich are the almoners of the Almighty. They are his disbursing agents. They are the guardians of the poor. They are to inaugurate those great enterprises which will bring thrift to the masses—not the largest dividends, but the largest prosperity. Capital makes it possible for the laborer to enjoy a happiness that waits upon honest industry. It is for the rich to improve the homes of the poor; but many a rich man's stable is a palace compared to the abode of the honest and intelligent mechanic. When the wealthy are the patrons of those social reforms that elevate society, then they will receive the benedictions of the poor throughout our land."

A Pastor Who Sowed Nickels.

HOME missionary relates a very interesting and instructive story showing how one little mission church in New England helped the cause by a decidedly novel method. One Sunday in May the pastor brought out some nickels and offered one to every man, woman, and child who would use one apiece as capital invest in some profitable way for missionary work. The returns were to be made at the Thanksgiving season, and each person was to report how his nickel was used and say to what missionary organization he wanted his money to go. A few days thirty-two "talents" had been given out. Along with this plan were put six dollars which had just been received from the sale of potatoes raised a year before on "the missionary lot." At the various gatherings, or "bees," for the cultivation of this land had aroused considerable missionary interest. These methods did not seem to be sufficient. Several times during the summer and fall public inquiry was made as to the fate of the nickels, and the Sunday School superintendent hinted that they would have to settle if they got ahead of him when the day of reckoning came. Finally the day of reckoning did come, and the Thanksgiving week prayer meeting was given up to hear the reports upon the "talents." The pastor had bought material and made cat-corn and sold it; another, picture frames; another, candy; another, cookies; and so on. Two little boys had bought corn, popped it, and sold it at fivefold increase. One had worked all summer, while others had barely escaped bringing their nickel back in a napkin. The pastor confessed to one failure on melons, but saved himself by buying an egg with the rest of a nickel and raising a lusty chicken. The girl—who does not find it easy to take part in prayer meeting, but knows how to work, and once flew out of the house like a wind and stopped a pair of horses which were running away and dragging her father along the ground—said that she had made her money on raising beans. We learned that she had found a piece of ground near the house, which her father had plowed, and captured it easily. Some were not natural traders earned money and handed it in along with their nickels, and a few gifts were made by others. At length the superintendent was convinced that "the day of reckoning had come" for him. He had bought some corn with his money and had planted and cared for it. The largest single return up to this point had been a dollar and five cents. Gravely rising, the superintendent said: "I knew thee that thou art a hard man, reaping where thou hast sown, and gathering where thou hast strewed; and I was afraid, and went to hide thy talent in the earth: lo, there thou hast that is thine: three dollars and fifty cents." A round sum was raised.

Have You Asthma or Hay-Fever?
Medical science at last reports a positive cure for Asthma and Hay-fever in the wonderful Kola Plant, a new botanical discovery found on the Congo River, West Africa. Its cures are really marvelous. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., writes about cured him of Asthma of fifty years' standing. Hon. L. G. Clute, of Greeley, Iowa, testifies that three years he had to sleep propped up in a chair in Hay-fever season, being unable to lie down at night or day. The Kola Plant cured him at once. To the matter sure, these and hundreds of others are sworn to before a notary public. So great is our faith in its wonderful curative powers, the K. Importing Co., of 1164 Broadway, New York, make it known, is sending out large cases of the K. compound free to all readers of CHRISTIAN HERALD who are sufferers from Asthma and Hay-fever. All they ask in return is that when cured you will tell your neighbors about it. Send your name and address on a postal card, and they will send you a large case by mail free. It costs you nothing, and you should surely try it.

The Fruit Dish and Spoons received us. We are more than pleased. It may interest you to know that Mrs. Brown who secured the order is 82 years old. MRS. E. W. BROWN, Dunmore, Pa.

You have certainly read the description of our Famous World's Fair Souvenir Full-size Teaspoons, advertised so extensively since the Fair closed, but unless you have SEEN THE SPOONS—unless you have handled them and personally examined their Matchless Elegance and rich, rare, artistic beauty, you positively cannot half realize what a wonderful, Superb Bargain we are now offering. They have sold enormously. The delight and surprise occasioned upon their receipt has been testified to by Thousands upon Thousands of the Best People Everywhere—people who are leaders in Taste, Thought, and Refinement.

Every visitor to the Fair knows that the price of these spoons on the Fair grounds was $1.50 apiece, or $9.00 for a set of six, or $18.00 for the entire collection of twelve different spoons, and here we will sell you a set of six for only 99 cents.

JUST THINK OF IT! The spoons are divided into two different sets, as follows: SET No. 4 comprises these six buildings—Manufacturers, Horticultural, Woman's, Fisheries, Machinery Hall, Transportation. SET No. 5 comprises these six—Administration, Art, Agriculture, Electrical, Mining, Government. You can have either set you like, but under no circumstances will less than a set of six be sold, nor will they be divided in any other manner than above. Bear in mind that these are not cheap, washed-over spoons, but genuine triple-plate silver on white metal, stamped, LEONARD MFG. CO., A1—a guarantee of reliability. They are FULL SIZE for table use, and the entire bowl outside and inside is gold-plated, and shows a beautifully engraved and embossed building of the Fair. The set of six is put up in a handsomely-lined box and is sent by mail PREPAID on receipt of 99 cents. Remember, WE WILL REFUND YOUR MONEY if this wonderful bargain does not come up to your expectations, or if you believe they have been misrepresented in any manner, we will refund your money on demand.

THESE ARE THE ORIGINAL WORLDS FAIR SOUVENIR TEASPOONS.

(The prices of 1893, and the fact that a syndicate of private dealers, were unable to dispose of the immense stock of the spoons, threw them back on our hands, and slowly but surely, we have awakened the public to the fact that for artistic merit, matchless elegance, and serviceable durability, a set of six of these handsome and famous World's Fair Souvenir Teaspoons, at 99 cents for six is the greatest bargain in the times.)

Send 99 cents to-day for a set of six of these genuine World's Fair Souvenir Teaspoons, full size, put up in a handsomely-lined box and sent PREPAID by Mail. Never before has a house of A1 standing, doing a straight-forward business and giving exactly what they advertise, ever been able to offer such a solid, substantial bargain. You will pay $1.50 for six ordinary plain, plated spoons—here you get a beautiful pattern, with gold-plated bowls, at only 99 cents for six. A hundred dollars invested in something else for a birthday, wedding, or Christmas gift wouldn't give half the genuine delight and satisfaction.

Wrestling With the Supernatural.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Gen. 32: 25, 26:

“And when he saw that he prevailed not against him, he threw out his thigh, and the hollow of Jacob’s thigh was out of joint as he wrestled with him. And he said,
I will not let thee go except thou bless me.”

 HERE is a cloud of dust from a traveling herd of cattle, and sheep, and goats, and camels. They are the present that Jacob sends to gain the goodwill of his offended brother. That night Jacob halts by the brook Jabbok. But there is no rest for the weary man. No shining ladder to let the angels down into his dream; but a severe struggle, that lasts until morning, with an unknown visitor. They each try to throw the other. The unknown visitor, to reveal his superior power, by a touch wrenches Jacob's thigh-bone from its socket, perhaps maiming him for life. As on the morning sky the clusters of purple cloud begin to ripen, Jacob sees it is an Angel with whom he has been contending, and not one of his brother's coadjutors. "Let me go," cries the Angel, lifting himself up into increasing light, "the day breaketh."

You see, in the first place, that God allows good people sometimes to get into a terrible struggle. Jacob was a good man; but here he is left alone in the midnight to wrestle with a tremendous influence by the brook Jabbok. For Joseph, a pit; for Daniel, a wild beast den; for David, dethronement and exile; for John the Baptist, a wilderness diet and the executioner's axe; for Peter, a prison; for Paul, shipwreck; for John, desolate Patmos; for Christ, the cross. For whom the racks, the gibbets, the prisons, the thumbscrews? For the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. Some one said to a Christian reformer, "The world is against you." "Then," he replied, "I am against the world."

I will go further, and say that every Christian has his struggle. With financial misfortune some of you have had the midnight wrestle. Red-hot disasters have dropped into your store from loft to cellar. What you bought you could not sell. Whom you trusted, fled. The help you expected would not come. Some giant panic, with long arms, and grip like death, took hold of you in an awful wrestle, from which you have not yet escaped, and it is uncertain whether it will throw you, or you will throw it. Here is another soul, in struggle with some bad appetite. He knew not how stealthily it was growing upon him. One hour he woke up. He said, "For the sake of my soul, of my family, of my children, and of my God, I must stop this!" And behold, he found himself alone, by the brook of Jabbok; and it was midnight. That evil appetite a time it seemed as if they were getting the upper hand of their habit; but that habit rallied again its infernal power, and lifted the soul from its standing, and with a force borrowed from the pit, hurled it into outer darkness.

But, thank God, I have often seen a better termination than this. I have seen men prepare themselves for such a wrestling. They laid hold of God's help as they went into combat. The giant habit, reigned by the cup of many dissipations, came out strong and defiant. They clenched. There were the writhings and distortions of a fearful struggle. But the old giant began to waver; and at last, in the midnight, alone, with none but God to witness, by the brook Jabbok, the giant fell; and the triumphant wrestler broke the darkness with the cry, "Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

There is a widow's heart, that first was desolated by bereavement, and since, by the anxieties and trials that came in the support of a family. It is a sad thing to see a man contending for a livelihood under disadvantages; but to see a delicate woman, with helpless little ones at her back, fighting the giants of poverty and sorrow, is more affecting. It was a humble home; and passers-by knew not that within those four walls were displays of courage more admirable than that of Hannibal crossing the Alps, or in the Pass of Thermopylae, or at Balaklava, where "into the jaws of death rode the six hundred." These heroes had the whole world to cheer them on; but there were none to applaud the struggle in that humble home. She fought for bread, for clothing, for fire, for shelter, with aching head, and weak side, and exhausted strength, through the long night by the brook Jabbok. Could it be that none would give her help? Had God forgotten to be gracious? No! contending soul. The midnight air is full of wings, coming to the rescue. She hears it now, in the sigh of the night wind, in the ripple of the brook Jabbok, the promise made so long ago, ringing down the sky: "Thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive: and let thy widows trust in me!" Some one said to a very poor woman, "How is it that in such distress you keep cheerful?" She said, "I do it by what I call cross-prayers. When I had my rent to pay, and nothing to pay it with, and bread to buy and nothing to buy it with, I used to sit down and cry. But now, I do not get discouraged. If I go along the street, when I come to a corner of the street, I say, 'The Lord help me!' I then go on until I come to another crossing of the street, and again I say, 'The Lord help me!' And so I utter a prayer at every crossing; and since I have got into the habit of saying these 'cross-prayers,' I have been able to keep up my courage."

Learn again from this subject, that people sometimes are surprised to find out that what they have been struggling with in the darkness is really an "angel of blessing." Jacob found in the morning that this strange personage was not an enemy, but a friend. He was sent to bless, to use prosperity for him and for his children. And so, many a man, at the close of his trial, has found out that he has been trying to throw down his own blessing. I you are a Christian man, I will go back in your history and find that the grandest things that have ever happened to you have been your trials. Nothing short of scourging, imprisonment, and shipwreck, could have made Paul what he was. When David was fleeing through the wilderness, pursued by his own son, he was being prepared to become the sweet singer of Israel. The pit and the dungeon were the best schools at which Joseph ever graduated. The hurricane that upset the tent, and killed Job's children, prepared the man of Uz to be the subject of the magnificent poem that has astounded the ages. There is no way to get the wheat out of the straw but to thresh it. There is no way to purify the gold but to burn it. Look at the people who have always had it their own way. They are proud, discontented, useless, and unhappy. If you want to find cheerful folks, go among those who have been purified by the fire. After Rossini had rendered "William Tell" the five hundredth time, a company of musicians came under his window in Paris and serenaded him. They put upon his brow a golden crown of laurel leaves! But, amid all the applause and enthusiasm Rossini turned to a friend and said, "I would give all this brilliant scene for a few days of youth and love." Contrast the melancholy feeling of Rossini, who had everything that this world could give him, with the joyful experience of Isaac Watts, whose sorrows were great, when he says:

The Hill of Zion yields

A thousand sacred sweets,
Before we reach the heavenly fields
Or walk the golden streets.

Then let our songs abound.

And every tear be dry:
We're marching through Immanuel's ground
To fairer worlds on high.

It is prosperity that kills, and trouble that saves. While the Israelites were on the march, amid great privations and hardships, they behaved well. After awhile they prayed for meat; and the sky darkened with a great flock of quails; and these quails fell in great multitudes, all about them, and the Israelites ate and ate, and stuffed themselves until they died. Oh, my friends, it is not hardship, or trial, or starvation that injures the soul, but abundant supply. It is not the culture of trouble that eats up the Christian's life: it is the quails! it is the quails! You will yet find out that your midnight wrestle by the brook Jabbok is with an angel of God, come down to bless and to save.

Learn again that, while our wrestling with trouble might be triumphant, we must expect that it will leave its mark upon us. Jacob prevailed, but the angel touched him and his thigh-bone sprang from its socket, and the good man went limping on his way. We must carry through this world the mark of the combat. What ploughed these premature wrinkles in your face? What whitened your hair before it was time for frost? What silenced forever so much of the hilarity of your household? Ah! it is because the angel of trouble hath touched you that you go limping on your way. You need not be surprised that those who have passed through the fire do not feel as gay as once they did. Do not be out of patience with those who come not out of their despondency. They may triumph over their loss, and yet their gait shall tell you that they have been trouble-touched. Are we Stoics, that we can unmoved, see our cradle rifled of the bright eyes and the sweet lips? Can we stand unmoved and see our gardens of earthly delight uprooted? Will Jesus, who wept himself, be angry with us if we pour our tears into the graves that open to swallow down what we loved best? Was Lazarus more dear to him than our beloved dead to us? No. We have a right to weep. Our tears must come. You shall not drive them back to scald the heart. They fall into God's bottle. Afflicted ones have died because they could not weep.

Thank God for the sweet, the mysterious relief that comes to us in tears! Under this gentle rain the flowers of hope put forth their bloom. God pity that dry, withered, parched, all-consuming grief that wrings its hands, and grinds its teeth, and bites its nails into the quick, but cannot weep! We may have found the comfort of the Cross, and yet ever after show that in the dark night, and by the brook Jab-bok, we were trouble touched.

Again: we may take the idea of the text, and announce the approach of the day-dawn. No one was ever more glad to see the morning than was Jacob after that night of struggle. It is appropriate for philanthropists and Christians to cry out with this angel of the text, "The day breaketh." The world's prospects are brightening. Superstition has had its strongest props knocked out. The tyrants of earth are falling flat in the dust. The Church of Christ is rising up in its strength to go forth, "fair as the morn, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners." Clap your hands, all ye people, "the day breaketh."

As I look around about me, I see many who have passed through waves of trouble that came up higher than their girdle. In God's name I proclaim cessation of hostilities. You shall not always go saddened and heart-broken. God will lift your burden. God will bring your dead to life. God will stanch the heart's bleeding. I know he will. Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pities you. The pains of earth will end. The tomb will burst. The dead will rise. The morning star trembles on a brightening sky. The gates of the east begin to swing open. "The day breaketh."

Luther and Melancthon were talking together gloomily about the prospects of the Church. They could see no hope of deliverance. After awhile, Luther got up and said to Melancthon, "Come, Philip, let us sing the forty-sixth psalm; 'God is our refuge and strength in every time of trouble.'"

Death to many, nay, to all, is a struggle and a wrestle. We have many friends whom it would be hard to leave, I care not how bright our future hope is. It is a bitter thing to look upon this fair world and know that we shall never again see its blossoming spring; its autumnal fruits, its sparkling streams, and to say farewell to those with whom we played in childhood or counselled in manhood. In that night like Jacob, we may have to wrestle, but God will not leave us unblest. It shall not be told in heaven that a dying soul cried unto God for help, but was not delivered. The lattice may be turned to keep out the sun, or a book set to dim the light of the midnight taper; or the room may be filled with the cries of orphanage or widowhood; or the Church of Christ may mourn over our going; but, if Jesus calls, all is well. The strong wrestling by the brook will cease; the hours of death's night will pass along: one o'clock in the morning; two o'clock in the morning; four o'clock in the morning; five o'clock in the morning; "the day breaketh."

So I would have it when I die. I am in no haste to be gone. I would like to stand here twenty years and preach this Gospel. I have no grudge against this world. The only fault I have to find with this world is that it treats me too well. But when the time comes to go, I trust to be ready, my worldly affairs all settled. If I have wronged others, I want, then, to be sure of their forgiveness. In that last wrestling, my arm enfeebled with sickness, and my head faint, I want Jesus beside me. If there be hands on this side of the floor stretched out to hold me back, I want the heavenly hands stretched out to draw me forward. Then, O Jesus, help me on, and help me up. Unfearing, undoubting, may I step right out into the light, and be able to look back to my kindred and friends, who would detain me here, exclaiming, Let me go—let me go! The day breaketh.

Beautiful Middle Age.

EVERY season of life has its charm, and the loveliness of a noble middle age, is well worth our examination. The grace and beauty of youth have gone, and the thoughtful, pious woman may well sit down, and muse upon her quickly coming grey hairs. For in them she sees the first touch of a chill hand, that shall finally prevail; they are manifest decay; and no worthy human being can see them, without a solemn thought.

The ideal woman of middle age grows old beautifully; she has a happy face and loving heart, and unites in some subtle way the hopefulness of youth, and the mellow light of experience. Her hair may show silver threads, her figure may have lost its grace, her face its fresh color—but far more has been gained than lost. On her calm brow the dove visibly broods; her loving, thoughtful eyes are full of soul; her mouth has become sensitive and expressive, and her fine tact and sense have taught her not to make an anachronism of herself in dress. Her clothing is grave and rich, in tone with her motherhood and age; and she is lovely, because she is in harmony with all her surroundings, for harmony is the key-stone of beauty.

The material beauty of sixteen has been idealized into something fairer than mere form and color. In the first place, she is essentially a mother. She can forget herself; she can give, without thought of repayment; she can live for others; she is the "happiness maker" of her household; and she does all this, because it is her joy to do it; because it is the outcome of that grand, maternal instinct, which must find expression in some line of unselfishness. And to live thus is to live beautifully; and to become beautiful. All who know the ideal woman of middle age love and trust her. She understands young people; for she has been close to her own children, in all their doubts, hopes, griefs, and perplexities; and her unselfish life has also kept her young. Her face may be full of sympathetic expressions; but it has not become wrinkled and puckered with the lines of fretful discontent. Men of her own age respect and admire her; and young men come to her with their trials, and first-love anxieties; to everyone she is the sweet idealization of those two sweet words—womanliness and motherhood.

She is certainly "wearing away," but it is in the service of a loving life, which always spiritualizes decay. Heart and flesh may faint and fail; but her better part is growing daily, in all those graces which make her a little lower than the angels. And the conviction that she is growing better, as she grows older, strips age of that sense of "falling off" which is the bitterest thing about it. She has also gained, through years and experience, a clearer insight into God's ways with her. He is more and better to her now than ever he was in youth. She knows now in whom she has believed. The young say she is "going down hill." She knows she is going upward and onward. For she has come to understand that Truth and Soberness—how fittingly they are joined—are noble things; and Life has taught her what St. Paul means when he says, "Experience maketh hope."

I have been led to these reflections by my dahlias, which in these exquisite, fading days of autumn, seem in some subtle and fitting manner to be the very flower of middle age; just as daisies are the flower of childhood, and roses the flower of youth and love.

Come then, and give us dahlias with both arms,

E'en till the topmost touch our throat and lips

Bright golden dahlias, holding sunset's charms,
And red ones, crimson to their red leaves' tips;

Upon their white and pink and purple page,
We'll write the story of our Middle Age.

Yes, in the autumn of our Middle Age,
We hail thee, dahlias, as our fittest sign!
Thy stately splendor at this later stage
Befits us more than rose or trailing vine.
So strong and straight! so staid in all thy ways!
Meeting the sun and wind with steadfast gaze.

Our childish hands have held the daisy stars,
And on our breasts love's roses oft have lain;
But orange flowers and honeysuckle bars,
For whitening heads, will never bloom again—

So, in the prime and harvest of our year,
We choose the dahlia's circle, bright and clear.

The Home of the Bible.

BY MARION HARLAND.

IN producing this incomparable Book, Marion Harland has made the whole Christian world her Debtor. No such living and breathing Panorama of Modern Life in Palestine, has ever been unrolled before the eyes of delighted readers, who will peruse its fascinating pages and admire its wealth of Photographic Illustration. Traveling through Syria and the Holy Land, alternately by Horse, Camel, Palankeen, and Afoot, this gifted American woman was welcomed alike in the palatial homes of Jerusalem, Cairo, Nablous, and Damascus, and beneath the humble peasant roof-trees of Bethlehem, Nazareth, and half a hundred other villages of Gospel story. The outcome of her journeyings is this precious volume—a book to be read and re-read with ever-increasing pleasure, and to be treasured by our children's children afterward.

Marion Harland is Chaperone, Cicerone, and Dragoman in one, and to read her wonderful narrative in "The Home of the Bible," is to derive all the enjoyment of a Personally-conducted Tour in Palestine, without incurring any of the Discomforts incident to actual travel. We seem to see the sacred places, and to breathe the delicate odor of the incense; we walk and converse with the Venerable Rabbis of Jerusalem and the learned men of all the Oriental religions; we camp with our guide on the margin of the Jordan, by Galilee and the Dead Sea; we cull bouquets of wild-flowers on the fields of Boaz, and roses on Sharon's Plain; and we courageously became the guest of the Bedouins of the Plains and the dark-eyed, warlike Druses of Carmel and Lebanon.

No other writer has Lifted the Veil from the inner life of Palestine as Marion Harland has done in this Splendid Volume of 446 Pages, with its multitude of exquisite Photographic Illustrations, taken expressly for this work. Apart, however, from its inestimable

"Little Moses."

A Parisian Waif, Saved from the Seine, where his Mother Perished, becomes a Devoted Christian.

A MOST interesting work among children is now going on in Paris. It was commenced in 1875 by Miss Lydia Hocart, daughter of Pastor Hocart of the French Wesleyan Church, Lausanne, Switzerland. Miss Hocart was engaged to be married to a young man who was studying for the ministry. He was taken very ill just before the date set for their marriage, and he never recovered. Miss Hocart shortly afterward went to London and entered a Christian Home, and there learned how to care for and instruct little friendless children. Returning to Paris, she opened a home for little unfortunate and friendless children, purchasing a house and lot outside the walls of Paris.

In a recent letter, Miss Hocart thus describes her work: "We have now two families, one for boys, the other for girls, numbering in all fifty children. Several of the older ones give us great satisfaction. I will just mention one case: The story of this dear boy is one of the most tragical we have met with. His father committed suicide when he was an infant, and shortly afterward the mother threw herself into the Seine with her child in her arms. She was drowned and the little fellow, only fourteen months old, was rescued and brought to us. On account of the wonderful way in which his life was preserved, he was known under the surname of 'Little Moses.' He was a very clever boy, and as he grew up he sometimes caused us some anxiety; but quite recently (he is now seventeen), he writes to tell us of his conversion. He says he has decided to give his life to the service of the Heavenly Father, who has so mercifully watched over him ever since his birth. He has asked to become a member of the church he attends, and, quite spontaneously, out of his first earnings, he has sent us a subscription for our Home as a token of gratitude.

"A friend who has visited him recently tells us how exemplary his conduct is, and his employers testify that they have never had in their service such a steady, trustworthy lad. They hope he will not leave them till he settled on his own account.

"Among our newcomers we have a large proportion of children left alone in the world through the suicide of one of their parents. Unfortunately, the crime seems to become more and more general in France. Is it not needful that the young generation should be early taught how happy and useful the humblest life may be when consecrated, in all earnestness, to the service of our Lord and Master Jesus Christ?"

"LYDIA HOCART."

Light from the Monuments.

Writing on the question of the date and facts of the Book of Daniel, Rev. John Urquhart refers to the charge made by sceptics that no such schools existed as that in which Daniel and his companions are represented as being brought up. He replies: The monuments have supplied an answer in the face of which it becomes impossible to maintain the charge. We now know that the greatest attention was paid to the education of the young nobility who were destined to hold high offices in the state.

The tablets which have now thrown such light upon the ancient language of Accad, and which have furnished us with copies of the ancient classics of Babylonia, are part of the library of one of those very palace schools. But the Book of Daniel does more than imply the existence of such a custom. It goes further, and intimates that the benefits of the palace school were extended to foreigners and even to captives. Was this so? The reply here again is "Yes." In an inscription of Sennacherib's we read: "Belibni, son of a learned man of the race of Babylon, who as a young child had been educated in my palace, I have established upon the throne of Sumir and of Accad." This case is an exact parallel. Sennacherib selects those whom he intends for high functions from the conquered land of Babylon, just as Nebuchadnezzar, the great king, selects Daniel and his companions from the conquered land of Judea.

There was no more spirit in her. The Queen was completely subdued by the wonders she had witnessed. A different kind of surrender, but one still more remarkable, is the subject of a story told by Rev. Mark Guy Pearce. A man named Anthony had been converted, and his wife was very bitter about it. To use the man's own words: "When I found the Saviour, she said to herself, 'I will see how much that man can bear,' and when I saw what she was about, I said 'Lord help me to show her how much that grace can do.' She went on, bit by bit, till she became what you might call aggravating. She did everything she could think of to vex me. I would light the fire and fill the kettle, and shine her shoes; and the more she did to rile me, the more I did to please her. One night, when I came home from prayer meeting, the door was shut and barred, and my wife had gone to bed and would not let me in. I was snowing, and the old feeling came over me for a moment, I looked around for a hammer or something to beat the door in. But I remembered, and I went away, and found a sheltered place where I could sit under a hedge till morning. I seemed to me as if the Lord was pleased and stood by me, and I asked him to forgive my wife because she did not know any better. I had been like her once and hated religious folks, and I could make excuse for her. I was talking to him just as it he was there when I saw the house door open and my wife came out and looked around. She soon saw me, and she came over and said: 'Anthony, can you forgive me? I am ashamed of myself. I kissed her, and we went into the house and knelt down and prayed together. She was cured.'

EVANGELISM BY RAIL.

The Remarkable Gospel Work Effected by Four Chapel Cars in the Churchless Towns and Villages of the West and Northwest—Thousands Turn to Christ.

WITHIN recent years many new lines of Gospel work have been developed, and there are now very few sections of the United States where the message of salvation is not heard. One of the most unique developments is the Gospel car. Several leading Protestant denominations have placed in the field vehicles capable of being transported by rail and on which religious services can be held at the most out-of-the-way places to which the railroads run.

There are few more interesting narratives of Gospel effort than that of Mr. Boston W. Smith, the manager of the Baptist chapel car work. During the summer of 1890 he received a note from Rev. Wayne Hoyt, of the First Baptist Church of Minneapolis, Minn., which led to a meeting at which the need of missionary work in the West was discussed. Pastor Hoyt had recently traveled by rail a considerable distance through a section almost totally destitute of religious privileges. Indeed, it did not seem that the railroads were doing anything for that particular section of the country, as far as building up a moral community was concerned. It had occurred to Dr. Hoyt that something might be done towards giving the Gospel to the towns and villages through which he had been riding, and where there seemed to be a superabundance of saloons. Like an inspiration came the thought, "Why not build a missionary car?" This idea he communicated to his brother, who was a representative of the railroad interests in the Northwest, and the latter promised that he would inquire about it. Some time afterward, Dr. Hoyt announced that the building of a missionary railroad car had been definitely decided upon, and that a Chapel Car Syndicate had been organized in New York, for the purpose of constructing a car which would be suitable for holding services. An Ohio builder undertook the work, and in due time the first chapel car, "Evangel," was finished, and the dream of the workers began to be realized. It was dedicated on May 23, 1891, and was immediately afterward put in active commission in the Northwest, first having been furnished comfortably by the ladies of the Baptist churches of Minneapolis and St. Paul. Permission was given by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to attach the car to any train and to sidetrack it whenever its manager desired, and then, as Mr. Smith enthusiastically declared, he felt as though he "owned the whole railroad system."

The first trip extended one thousand miles west of Minneapolis, stopping from one to three days in a place. The car being attached to the rear of westbound passenger trains, an excellent opportunity was afforded for the distribution of circulars and Gospel tracts. As they tarried for orders, each person at the station was handed a small package containing one of the circulars, inside of which was placed a bit of Christian literature. In this way the Gospel was carried into thousands of homes along the line of the Northern Pacific, through Minnesota, North Dakota, and Montana. It was soon very apparent that the chapel car would be a most efficient means of distributing the word of God and religious literature in needy and destitute neighborhoods. Within the first month enough invitations for the car had been received, to keep it in constant service for at least two years, with two meetings every day in the week and from five to seven services on Sunday. Early in the winter of 1891, the car was taken to the North Pacific Coast for six months. It was placed in charge of Mr. and Mrs. E. G. Wheeler. Churches and Sunday Schools were constant results of these devoted workers with the "Evangel." In May, 1892, Mr. and Mrs. Wheeler accompanied the car to the anniversaries held that year in Philadelphia.

An urgent request was received from the Pacific Coast for a chapel car to continue the work inaugurated by the winter visit of the "Evangel." An evening session of the anniversary meeting was devoted to chapel car work. So wonderful was the story of God's blessing upon the work of the first year, that at the close of the addresses it was proposed that an offering be made toward the building of "Chapel Car Number Two." In a short time $4,500 in cash and pledges were received from churches, Sunday Schools, and individuals in all parts of the land. Within a few months sufficient means was provided to pay for the construction of a larger car than the "Evangel," and the

to build "Chapel Car Number Four" was subscribed. Mrs. Hills christened the third car "Glad Tidings," and the fourth was named "Good Will." Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Rust, graduates of the Gordon Training School of Boston, were appointed missionaries in charge of "Glad Tidings," with the Northwest as their field of labor. Mr. and Mrs. E. S. Stucker at once took charge of the "Good Will," and it was most thoroughly furnished by the Baptist ladies of Dayton, O. Was at once taken to the Southwest, and God has greatly blessed its work in the needy field of Texas.

While the car "Glad Tidings" was being dedicated, a lady residing in Brooklyn came with friends to look over it. She said: "If you are sure you will get sufficient money with which to build 'Chapel Car Number Four,' I would like to give the first one hundred dollars toward 'Chapel Car Number Five.'" A lady who accompanied her said: "And may I have the second one hundred dollars in 'Number Five?'" A few hours after, other ladies came, and when they learned what the others had done, several subscribed one hundred dollars each. In a little while the tenth lady gave her name for one hundred dollars, and suggested that "Number Five" be built entirely by Baptist ladies and known as "The Ladies' Chapel Car." The names of twenty-eight ladies were soon given, pledging one hundred dollars each, and before the close of 1896 "Number Five" will be an assured fact. Voluntary contributions have also been received for a "Young Men's Chapel Car" to be built on the same model as the others.

In many parts of the South, West, and Northwest, blessed results have followed the chapel car services. Scores of railroad towns and villages where there is neither preacher nor chapel, have had the Gospel preached with earnestness and power and many souls have been won to the Saviour. An idea of the work may be gathered from the following extract from the report of one car's work in Arkansas alone:

THE CHAPEL CAR "EMMANUEL" ON THE ROAD.

new car, named "Emmanuel," was soon completed and was dedicated at Denver in 1893. It seemed more evident than ever that God's hand was in the chapel car movement for all the railroads over which the two cars were to be carried granted transportation for the missionaries and the cars. At Denver, Mr. and Mrs. Wheeler were given full charge of the "Emmanuel," and the Pacific Coast was assigned as their field of operations. It was remarkable to see the cheerful and ready response to the story of God's blessing upon the chapel car work. There had been no urging or soliciting of funds, but a simple relation of the way in which God's blessing came. Following the dedication service a letter was read from Mr. William Hills, of New York, to the American Baptist Publication Society, in which Mr. Hills offered to bear the entire cost of "Chapel Car Number Three," upon condition, that the Society secure from the Baptist denomination funds to construct and put in operation Chapel Car Number Four" by the close of 1894, and that the third car be used in work in certain States. The offer was accepted, and in a few months the amount necessary

The car has visited twenty-five points and remained for four days to three weeks in each place. There have been one hundred and thirty-one professions. Eight churches organized, viz.: Bradford, Sherill, Keo, Clarendon, Vincent, Marvel (reorganized), Garner (reorganized), Earle. Eight church houses have been built and are now being constructed as a direct result of the work, viz.: Garner, Gordon, Sherill, Keo, Clarendon, Vincent, Cotton Plant, Tupelo. The car has organized twenty-four Sunday Schools, and distributed twenty-seven thousand pages of tracts. We have given away three hundred New Testaments and one hundred Bibles. Many other points have been visited by the car in passing, and one or two services held.

At Bradford, Ark., where the first church was organized, a lot of rude fellows became very troublesome. They were made special object of earnest prayer, admonished, then reprimanded, and the annoyance ceased and the leader of the gang was converted; and when the car left the place, he seemed loth to leave it. Many similar instances might be recorded. One infidel came into the car to "do up the preachers." Ten days later a church was organized and he was elected clerk. Sixty days later they had a new church home.

In one meeting a woman who joined the church pulled the wedding ring from her finger with which to purchase a family Bible, so that her child might not be able to remember the time when there was no family Bible in the house.

Occasionally all the cars had rough experiences, and this was specially the case in the new and untried fields of the Northwest. Cold weather and storms were encountered and hardships often assailed the occupants of the little chapels on wheels; but they were brave and never flinched, and their well-built cars kept out the zero blasts. One of the missionaries writes: "Strangers have very vague ideas of the towns and cities which dot these vast plains of the Northwest. A community of some two or three hundred people in North Dakota and Minnesota forms quite a town, and one from a thousand to ten thousand is a city. In most of these little towns an immense amount of business is done, as the merchants have to supply the country for miles around. As a rule we seldom visit a town which has more than five hundred people in it, and in a great many instances only thirty, forty, seventy-five, and one hundred. In these smaller places there are no churches nor Sunday Schools as a rule. In the larger towns there are churches, but with hardly an exception they are weak and struggling. We do not limit the work to towns where there are only Baptist churches; on the contrary many towns and churches of other denominations can testify to the fact that God has used our car as a means of great blessing to them."

All classes of people were met in these lonely districts: infidels, atheists, backsliders, and the great mass of godless and reckless, who were living absolutely without religion. Even among the worst, converts were made and many came out boldly for Christ. Here is a graphic picture of a "churchless town" which was visited by one of the chapel cars:

"'Glad Tidings' fits into the needs of these little villages on the North Dakota prairies and in the Minnesota woods. Here are small companies of people, with few or no religious privileges. They do have opportunities once in a while to hear the Gospel, as some itinerating preacher happens around. I remember sending my circulars to one of these towns. It was on the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad. I addressed them to the station agent, but when we arrived, lo and behold, there was no station and no agent, the place not being large enough to warrant the railroad company's placing an agent there. However, the post-mistress had been kind enough to open the package of circulars. As we were being sidetracked, we looked over the town and saw perhaps a dozen occupied dwellings. Only about forty people in the place, but we had seventy-five out many a time. They came for miles around. Only stayed four days, but during that short time the Lord did much. A goodly number of the older boys and girls came out for Jesus. The Lord enabled us to get the scattered Sunday School interest together in prayerful consecration. In a town like this, when a number turn to the Lord, the question arises, What do you do with and for them? It does not seem advisable to think of organizing a little church. So we get them together for prayer and consecration before we leave; suggest a cottage meeting every week after we are gone. They accept the suggestion and meet every week, and thus continue in the way of the Lord. These are lonely places to live in, and the event of the chapel car is appreciated. It is not forgotten, we know, as we hear from the towns visited."

Many benefits, social as well as spiritual, have resulted from the Chapel Car work. Old feuds have been settled and family quarrels healed; many marriages have been celebrated and baptism administered, where before, such ceremonies were practically unthought of; dead or dying churches were revived and encouraged. A single year shows the following record of work done by the Chapel Cars:

Miles traveled.....	65,000
Number of meetings held....	4,500
Sermons and addresses.....	5,800
Families visited.....	2,700

CHAMPIONS OF THE HOME.

The National Women's Christian Temperance Union Holds Its Twenty-Third Annual Convention at St. Louis, Mo.

THE familiar initials W. C. T. U. have been very much in evidence in St. Louis, Mo., for some days past. The leaders in the great war, which woman is waging against the curse that blights the home, have traveled from every State and Territory in the country to that city, to report the progress of the crusade and to encourage each other to new efforts.

These annual conventions, of which this is the twenty-third, are times of celebration and renewed consecration, the stimulus of which is felt to the remotest corner of our land. The women who attend them go back to their homes strengthened and nerved to take up again the battle against the gigantic and ruthless enemy which is robbing thousands of family circles of their choicest ornaments and breaking the hearts of millions of mothers and daughters. It is no wonder that woman, who has suffered so much from its cruel outrages, should take a hand in the campaign against it. She has done noble service in the cause and the enthusiasm displayed at this Convention shows that her valor and her implacable hostility have not abated. From November 13 to 18 the leaders in this great conflict held their council of war and listened to inspiring words from the veterans who have led the hosts in many a hard-fought field. This convention, like its predecessors shows that the struggle will still go on in its old-time spirit and that there will be no truce in the war.

The sessions of the convention were held in the music hall of the building erected in 1884 for the St. Louis Exposition. It is a spacious auditorium, seating in the main hall 4,000 people, with a stage capacity of 1,500. There is in addition, a small adjoining hall which seats 1,500 more, with numerous smaller rooms for committees and other purposes of business. Besides the seats reserved for delegates, two thousand seats were at the disposal of visitors at the regular sessions of the Convention. About five hundred regularly appointed delegates attended the business meetings, the representation being one delegate to every five hundred members of the Union.

The programme of the Convention covered a wide field. Beside the regular business which deals with many branches of the Union scattered through every State and Territory of the country with sister societies in Canada and European countries, there were to be public meetings dealing not only with Temperance but with other topics in which the members of the great organization feel a womanly sympathy. Prominent among the latter was the suffering in Armenia which stirred the indignation of the President, Miss Frances E. Willard, during her recent European trip and enlisted her active co-operation with other agencies in assisting refugees to escape from Turkish oppression and settle in this land of freedom. The Armenian Mass Meeting partook of the nature of a religious service, and the platform was crowded with Armenian refugees and martyrs who have been slaughtered by the Turk.

Work, and one entire evening was devoted to the department of the young people are enrolled.

Among the speakers were Mrs. Helen G. Rice and Mrs. Mary H. Hall.

Night," which showed the extent and objects and work of the Union in an effective way. Each State delegation had been drilled to marching order, and moved on the platform under its State banner, the band playing, meanwhile, appropriate music. The delegations having taken their seats at the rear of the stage, with the beautiful silk banners for a background, the spectacle changed to a representation of departments of work, which were artistically symbolized in the costumes of the representatives. A lady whose costume was decorated with grapes and wheat-heads entered, representing the sanitary and economic cooking department. A lady in a red semi-military costume, wearing a crown and a profusion of medals, represented the W. C. T. U. medal contests. A third lady, attired in Indian dress, and bearing the Indian banner, made of embroidered skins by the Indian W. C. T. U. of Deer Lodge, Oregon, represented the work among the Indians. So, through all the departments of W. C. T. U. work, an appropriately costumed lady gave effective representation of the operations of the Union, and there was a march by all in procession in intricate figures over the stage. This was one of the prettiest and most suggestive scenes of the Convention, and did credit to the artistic skill of the ladies who organized it.

The entertainment of the delegates at St.

Louis was something of a departure from the usual methods adopted on such occasions. The churches undertook the entertainment of the representatives according to states. The Union Methodist Episcopal Church took Ohio, and there the Convention sermon was preached. Nearly all the churches gave their buildings for use of the delegates and their meetings.

Portraits appear on this page of some of the officers of the Convention. Miss Frances E. Willard, President of the National W. C. T. U., presided ex-officio; Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, vice-President at large; Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman, Recording Secretary; Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, Corresponding Secretary; and Mrs. Helen M. Barker, Treasurer, all of whom are enthusiastic workers and eloquent speakers. Besides these the Convention had the pleasure of listening to Miss Agnes E. Slack, the brilliant young English girl who has been appointed Secretary of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union. Miss Slack comes of a family long celebrated in England for its activity in religious and temperance work, and for its devotion to public philanthropy. She has done valuable service in Great Britain and Ireland to the Temperance cause, and the Convention gave her a most hearty and cordial welcome.

Miss Elizabeth W. Greenwood, whose portrait is one of our group, was the preacher of the Convention sermon. Her home is in Brooklyn, N. Y., where her name is a household word. The daughter of a Unitarian minister, she consecrated herself to God's work when only fourteen years of age. She entered the Women's Temperance Crusade at its beginning, and her work has now extended beyond her native State to the nation. In addition to her duties as pastor and preacher, Miss Greenwood has been for eighteen years President of the W. C. T. U. "On the Hill" in Brooklyn, as well as being constantly engaged as lecturer and evangelist. She preaches to a large, intelligent congregation each Sabbath day during the warm months, at her summer home among the Berkshire hills of Massachusetts. This is the work she loves most. Miss Greenwood is also superintendent of the evangelistic department of the World's W. C. T. U., and national superintendent of evangelistic work. She has also done valuable service at the Mayflower Mission, which the late Rev. Henry Ward Beecher organized in connection with Plymouth Church.

Of the world-wide fame of Miss Frances E. Willard as a temperance crusader the whole nation knows. Miss Willard's work began as early as 1874, as champion of the Woman's Temperance crusade in Ohio and other States. She has been an indefatigable worker, often traveling fifteen thousand to twenty thousand miles a year, averaging one meeting a day. In one year she visited every State and Territory in the Union, and part of Canada. Miss Willard has a facile pen, and her books, pamphlets, tracts, and articles, bearing more or less on the temperance question, have been widely published and read. Miss Willard is a New England woman, of rare intelligence and ability, and is now fifty-six years of age. She has been successively teacher, public speaker, college president, temperance crusader

A Gifted Soul-Winner.

Evangelist Palser's Work for Christ in England and Canada.

AS briefly announced in our news columns last week, the Christian workers of

MR. CLEMENT PALSER.

States are to have the assistance of an Evangelist, who both in England and Canada has been signally used of God in many years past in the conversion of sinners. Mr. Clement Palser, who has just landed in New York, is cordially commended to the Christian public of the United States by ministers whose opinion always commands respect here. Dr. George F. Johnson, who has had a wide experience in Evangelistic work, bespeaks for Mr. Palser a cordial welcome, and writes the strongest terms of his usefulness to the English churches. From still another London pastor, Rev. George Huckley, comes the testimony of many years acquaintance that God has put his seal of approval on Mr. Palser's work, both in the salvation of souls and in the building up of the Lord's people. Mr. Palser is cordially endorsed by some of the prominent pastors in Canada and United States in whose churches he has preached and by Drs. McArthur, Judson and Emerson of this city to whom he is well known by reputation.

Mr. Palser is a native of the busy city of Birmingham, England. He was converted when a lad of sixteen, and almost immediately began active service in Christ's cause. The neighborhood around his home furnished abundant opportunities for aggressive Gospel effort, and these he used with all the energy of a young and enthusiastic Christian. Some very remarkable conversions took place under the lad's preaching, and in one meeting held in a farm-house before he was eighteen years of age, was the beginning of a movement which issued in the organization of a church and the erection of a substantial church-building.

After some time he removed to the city of Bristol, where the young man continued his Gospel work. His Gospel service held in the churches of that busy port were greatly blessed in the conversion of souls. There could be but one occupation for a young man whose service was thus early proved. Mr. Palser's call to preach the Gospel was unmistakable, and he dare not refuse, even had he wished. As a matter of fact, however, service was a delight to him, compounded with which any business or social successes would have seemed mean and sordid. Mr. Palser, by the advice of his friends, took the preliminary steps to a theological training which would fit him for the regular ministry. He was about to enter Mr. Spurgeon's college, when he was led to reconsider his decision, and finally decided that he would abandon the idea of becoming a pastor and continue to devote his talents and means to the special evangelistic work which he has ever been so deeply interested in. Since that time Mr. Palser has labored most successfully in all parts of Great Britain. Last year he spent a blessed season in Canada, preaching in Toronto and other large cities. He found time to make a brief visit to Chicago, where one of his sermons at the Pacific Garden Mission led to the conversion of a man who had resolved on suicide that night. Mr. Palser may be addressed 31 East 22d Street, New York

LEADERS OF THE W. C. T. U.

1. MISS FRANCES E. WILLARD.
2. MRS. L. M. N. STEVENS.
3. MISS ELIZABETH W. GREENWOOD.
4. MRS. CLARA C. HOFFMAN.

and editor. Miss Willard is an eloquent and pleasing speaker and successful organizer.

Mrs. L. M. Stevens, Vice-President N. W. C. T. U., is a woman of great force and all-round personality. She was the President of the Maine Union and founder of the Industrial Home for Women in that State. She was appointed one of the Woman's Commission for the Columbian Exposition, and is possessed of excellent practical and executive ability.

The Recording Secretary, Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman, is a woman of striking personality. She has great platform ability, and her strong voice, forceful ideas, and spontaneous humor at once win the hearts of her hearers. She is fearless in her promulgation of truth, and was for years the President of the W. C. T. U. in Missouri.

The Convention proves, if proof had been needed, how thoroughly in earnest these ladies are in the gigantic work they have undertaken and how loyally they are supported by their sisters in the towns and cities of all our States. The work that is being done by the W. C. T. U., is distinctly on Christian lines, and from all the speeches and reports it was evident that with this organization, at any rate, religion and temperance are marching hand in hand. The Union is pledged to prohibition, but until that end is secured it is working earnestly and energetically to promote individual reformation, and to win to the cause of total abstinence Christians who are concerned for the moral well-being of their fellows. It is gratifying to notice the success that has attended the work among children. This is a very hopeful feature. If the children can be trained to total abstinence the prospects of a better future are bright, and this work can be done best by the W. C. T. U.

SILHOUETTES FROM LIFE

WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Mrs. McIverton's Teas.

I CAN'T help it, I do feel hurt and a little lonesome, and left out in the cold since I came to live in Barker-ville. You see, at home I knew plenty of people, and everyone knew me, and there was always something going on, but here, though it's enough going on, I am on the outside. I like my work well enough, and the board with is very kind and motherly. I'm a girl, and I would like to be wanted in, more than I am.

The speaker was a slender, dark-eyed, very graceful young woman, not much over twenty. She had gained a business education which included book-keeping, writing, and stenography, in some towns, which were located in one of the old-fashioned, exclusive and conservative towns, which are still to be found on the shores of Peconic Bay. Several times a day she traversed the elm-shadowed street of the village, going to and fro, between the objective of her office and her boarding-house. Her slim, erect figure, poise of the head, carriage, and singularly free and harmonious motion in walking, made people look at her as she passed. But rarely, except her employers and the friends with whom she lived, noticed her the least, although the minister's wife was kindly to her when she came to church, to which she brought a letter from one she had joined in her childhood, her Sunday School teacher, a gray-haired and dignified deacon, always inquired perfunctorily about her health.

Louise Reimer felt not a little embarrassed in the situation, and expressed herself to an older woman, also employed at the same place.

When the Summer people were here there was so much going on, I did not get any attention. Then I had my vacation, and went home, which made a long week. But now, with winter set down on us, I cannot stand it. I have to give up my place, and try my chances at whatever I can find at my home.

"What did you expect, Louise?" said her friend, quietly. "Surely you never thought these aristocratic families, who are so to their own set strictly, would take notice of you?"

"I don't know just what I expect. There is society here, companies and teas, and I go some times, though, and we are not so different."

Just as these words were spoken, Mrs. McIverton chanced to pass, leading her son Walter by the hand. Walter was two years old, and couldn't step along rapidly, so that his mother had time to glance at the young women whom she and to give them a very cordial bow. Louise did not hear a syllable of their low conversation, but a subtle wave of sphere enfolded her with them, and Walter had been laid in his crib for a nap, she began to plan and fancy and thought on some scheme which would include the two young ladies, and similarly situated in the place, in a few of the agreeable diversions and amusements of the season.

"Tell you what, Edward," she said to her husband, "life must be fearfully dull with Mrs. Reimer and Miss St. Clare, just readmill round. Miss Reimer, too, is young, I must somehow bring them into my circle of friends."

"There are difficulties, Amy," answered Mrs. McIverton. "Those girls are engaged nearly all day; just at present they are off early, say at four, but when business is brisker they'll stay till five. A people in this town require certificates of birth and breeding before they accept others as guests and com-

"said Amy, firmly, "I am your wife, and Judge Hillyard's daughter. I believe I can set the fashion if I choose."

A day or two after this, Louise Reimer, sitting by the western window of her room, saw Mrs. McIverton's carriage, with the team of glossy bays, stop at her door. The lady alighted and swept under the shadow of the veranda roof. She was beautifully gowned, and Louise fancied the rustle of her soft silks, the lustre of her rich furs. A moment, and her card was brought to Miss Reimer by the little red-cheeked maiden of the house, her hostess's one daughter.

"I have seen you passing, and I ventured to call," said the lady. "And as we can chat as well out of doors as in won't you slip on your jacket and hat and take a drive with me?"

How long Louise remembered that spin over the hills in the late autumnal afternoon, when though there was blue sky overhead, and the wild ducks in long wedges were following their leader to the South, and here and there the grass was yet emerald green, and in sheltered slopes a few asters lingered. They talked, freely and confidentially, the girl and her new friend, and out of that talk grew Mrs. McIverton's teas.

These teas left nobody out. That was the first thing. Mrs. McIverton asked her own friends and they came. Then she widened the group and invited those who had fewer friends than herself, especially strangers in the village, weary housewives, burdened young matrons with their children clinging about them, and glad now and then of a brief little outing, and young women like Louise. At the teas, these grew acquainted and others liking them, asked them to whatever was on foot in the village. The tea itself was simple, a cup of coffee, chocolate or tea, thin wafer biscuits, delicate sandwiches, tiny cakes, and perhaps a silver dish of bon-bons or salted almonds. There were flowers and palms, and a lovely, sparkling open fire, and above all there was a Christian woman's cordial welcome. Louise Reimer is happier now. And as for Mrs. McIverton, a new joy beards her cup, for she has learned what sweetness is at the heart of every unselfish effort for others, the blessedness that is given to all who bear one another's burdens, and to fulfil the law of Christ.

A NEW CONTINENT.

At the Recent Meeting of the International Congress the Norwegian explorer, Borchgrevink, expressed the conviction that there is a great continent in the South Polar circle eight million square miles in area, or twice the size of Europe.

Carolina Mountaineers.

Missionary Work Among a Simple People of Whom Little is Known by the Busy World Beyond Their Native Hills.

IN the mountain districts of North and South Carolina, there are many white people and a sprinkling of colored, living far from towns or villages, and having few Gospel privileges. The missionaries of the American Sunday School Union are doing a good work among them. Mr. E. P. Bancroft, Missionary Secretary of the Union, has lately made a tour through these sections, and we are indebted to his kindness for two photographs which appear on this page, and which were taken with his own camera. They are typical pictures. One represents a pair of horsemen, "mountain whites," on the way to market. There are few roads in those altitudes and the mountain trails are hardly suited to wagons so traveling has to be done on horseback. The men who go to market in this way are sometimes weighed on either side by quite heavy loads of goods for sale, eggs and even live chickens being carried in this fashion. They are generally fine horsemen and sit their animals like centaurs. The other photograph shows what is probably the most unique Sunday School in the land—a mountain school for negroes. The building is little better than a huge packing-box but it serves the purpose admirably.

A missionary of the A. S. S. U., in North Carolina sends this experience:

"One afternoon, early in June, a lively-looking lad, who lives in a log cabin not far from Fanning's Ford, came down to the creek with hook and line, just as I was about to venture into waters whose depth my buggy wheels had not previously measured. 'I'll show you the shallowest place to cross,' said the boy, who seemed to know all about the by-ways. Presently the right place was reached, and a safe crossing put us both on the other bank near a foot-log and a fish-hole towards which the lad was making his way. A restful, shady spot was easily found, and while the boy sat on a log, baiting, waiting, and watching his cork float, my own part of the pastime consisted in fighting flies and looking at lizards. Two trout and a catfish being caught, the youth agreed to wind up his line and go with me to a few cottage homes among the foot-hills, where we could try our luck with books instead of hooks, in catching a long string of children for a new school the coming Sunday. Mr. Young, who lives in the first house on that side of the creek, stopped his mule and plow long enough to say there had not been a school in his part of the district since he was a boy, and it was quite likely a dozen families or more could be found willing to come together in a Union Sunday School. We next saw some boys playing by the roadside, gave them some cards and picture papers, and they all agreed to spread the notice of our first meeting. An empty shed on Mr. Young's premises was the appointed place. And the well-attended primary meeting Saturday afternoon showed how successfully our cards had been scattered. Six new schools were opened, and four others aided this month, and there is good prospect in another creek settlement.

"Our schools are now favored with soul-stirring Gospel meetings, and there is such a season of revival interest as is rarely experienced in this mountain region. Our Union services are largely attended. Long-standing disagreements among some neighbors have been settled up on the Bible plan of 'making friends.' One man whose bitterness of heart had been sweetened by the spirit of reconciliation gave his hand to the neighbor whom he formerly hated, saying, 'Henry, I never thought I could do this, sir, but I am now fully convinced that heartfelt religion has made me willing to confess my faults.' An old dance-house manager said to me, 'I have been a pensioner of the government ever since the Mexican war, but I now realize for the first time that I have been fed all these years by the hand of God, through the United States Treasury.'"

"A little girl from one of the country schools, happy in the love of Jesus, came to see me a few days ago, bringing a bunch of flowers, saying, 'O I feel just like these flowers look. I want to put some in the school-house next Sunday, right close to the Bible, on the table.' When the school was opened the following Sunday, little Julia's brother came in with a basket of flowers, and brought word that his sister could not be there. 'She's too sick to come, sir,' said he, 'but when I left home she was in her bed, singing and looking at the pictures in that Sunday School paper you gave her.' God bless that little girl. She has already led seven other children into her Sunday School, which was organized last Spring by your missionary."

Woman's Lot in India,

A VIVID portrayal of the condition of women in India has been given by Rev. J. G. Hawker, of Belgium, who has labored many years in India. It is an object-lesson which should be studied by Americans who listen with delight to the glowing descriptions of Hindooism as they are given by Brahmin lecturers.

Mr. Hawker said that the women of India formed a most important part of the population. They were in a very degraded social position, having been kept in gross ignorance for many generations. This ignorance was not the result of accident, for the most dire penalties had been pronounced against those who had attempted to do anything so unfeminine as to read or write. Seventy-six years ago there were no girls' schools in India. There were now about three-quarters of a million of women and girls who had learnt to read, but these only amounted to about one in 200, and many of them had only the most elementary education. It was taught in India that the very sex of a woman was imparted as a punishment for some sin in a former state of existence. The women of India were kept in an irksome and unhealthy seclusion, and they were debarred from the acquaintance of enlightened persons. He had heard men say that they had never spoken to their wives, and that their verbal communications with them were made through their mothers. It was no wonder that the women sought amusement of the most questionable kind. The women of India were ruined by the marriage customs. Among the Brahmins girls were married before they were ten. In the census of 1891, no fewer than 258,000 girls of under five years of age were returned as married, and there were only 11,939 left unmarried at the age of 15. The consent of the girl was not necessary for her own marriage, and many of the children scarcely knew the significance of the ceremony; and yet, though the girls were not parties to the wedding, they were obliged to go to live with their husbands when the demand was made. As to widows, their age and number were simply scandalous. According to the 1891 census there were 14,000 widows under 5 years of age, and about 700,000 under fifteen. If real progress in religious and social matters was to be made in India, missionary work must be done among the women.

A Suggestive Letter.

ANONYMOUS letters are seldom worthy of consideration. They are almost always cowardly and despicable. They have in them thrusts at character which the author or authoress dares not openly make. They who write such anonymous letters are assassins. Before one posts such a communication he had better weigh the consequences to himself, for, though the authorship may never be discovered, the consciousness of having committed such a meanness will be a shriveling up of the moral nature, from which there is no recovery. But there are circumstances when an anonymous letter is justifiable, and it relieves the feelings of the person who writes and is mightily suggestive to the one to whom it is directed. Belonging to this latter kind is the anonymous letter before me, and which partly reads as follows:

I do not believe it. I go to hear you preach because you preach the Bible as I was taught it in my youth by a father, who, like yourself, believed what, in the capacity of a preacher, he proclaimed. I have been for thirty-five years anxious to walk in the path my old mother trod, confident in her simple faith. I have lived to see my children's children, and the distance that lies between me and my real estate in the graveyard cannot be very great. At my age it would be worse than folly to argue simply to confound, or dispute merely for the love of wrangling. I feel my breath growing shorter, my steps more tottering, and I am lost in the wilderness. (After stating many difficulties in the ninth chapter of Romans, he says): I pray, morning, noon, and night, because I am afraid not that I may see clearly.

This letter excites all my sympathies, for I have myself been in that quagmire, get into a morbid state of mind and may be said to be in a quagmire. A student of Dr. Witherspoon, at Princeton, came to him and said: "I am imaginary and you are imaginary, and I am imaginary and you are imaginary." Dr. Witherspoon said: "Go down and hit your head against the college door, and if you track you may find it next minute upside down or in splinters. I notice there are no slurs at religion in this letter—the first letter of the kind I ever saw. The first

But this letter is respectful and reverent. I congratulate the author of it on the fact that he has a pious parentage.

our mother's apron strings to save us, it is a grand thing to have had a good father and mother. A profligate broke forth weeping and said: "Oh, that tear of my mother that fell on my hand one night when I lay in the trundle bed." A man never gets over having been prayed for. He is apt to come around right after a while. The author of my letter says he is the son of a minister. It is a wrongful impression that minister's children turn out worse than others. The medical scientist, Dr. Hall, in his Journal of Health says that in the biography of 100 clergymen he finds they had 110 sons who were clergymen, and you know that to be a clergyman means at least to be piously inclined. The man of this letter must have his mind full of sacred reminiscences. The pictures on the wall of his father's parsonage were of "Christ's Last Supper," "Rebekah at the Well," the Egyptians making a terrible failure of crossing the Red sea. There was hardly a figure of the carpet or a board in the floor that had not been consecrated by the knee of prayer. The people who used to come and stay in that house were mostly Christians. The talk was full of good things, and cheerful good things, for there are no men in the world more fond of fun than ministers, nor any house that rings with more sportfulness than theirs. Get a half dozen ministers together if you want lively times. Religion in the parsonage where this man was brought up was a happy religion. Some day all those conversations and prayers and preachings and blessed memories will charge upon his soul, and capture it in five minutes for Christ. That old Christian father gone into glory will yet greet this unbelieving son. In this letter you ask me for counsel, and I give it. My prescription for the trouble of this man and all the thousands like him is: "Quit for awhile the study of the ninth chapter of Romans, and for six months read Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. Begin your reading and close your reading with prayer. When God put the book of Romans so far on toward the close of the Bible he indicated that we should read that book toward the last."

Our Coming Home.

WE so often change residence in this world, it is delightful to know that we are after awhile to have a permanent residence, and here is a picture of the house we are to live in. The picture is drawn by a master hand: "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." How much rent will you have to give for it? We are going to own it. How much must we pay for it, how much cash down and how much left on mortgage? Our Father is going to make it a free gift. Not all of it? Yes, all of it. When are we going to move into it? We are moving now. Heads of families are apt to stay in the old house until they have seen everything off. They send ahead the children and they send ahead the treasures and the valuables. Then after a while they will come themselves. I remember very well in the country that in boyhood moving was a jubilation. On almost the first load the children were sent on ahead to the new house, and we arrived with shout and laughter, and in an hour we had ranged through every room, the barn and the granary. Toward night, and perhaps in the last wagon, father and mother would come, looking very tired, and we would come down to the foot of the lane to meet them and tell them of all the wonders we discovered in the new place. As the candles lighted, our neighbors who had helped each other, sat down with us at a table on which there was every luxury they could think of. Well, my dear Lord knows that some of us have been moving a good while. We have sent our children ahead. We have sent many of our valuables ahead. We have sent many of our treasures ahead. We cannot go yet. There is work for us to do. But after a while, it will be toward night and we will be very tired, and then we will start for our new home; and those who have gone ahead of us will see our approach and they will come down the lane to meet us, and they will have much to tell us of what they discovered in "the house of many mansions," and of how large the rooms are, and how bright the furniture and the fountains. And then, the last load unloaded, the table will be spread and our celestial neighbors will come in, and the chalices will be full, not with the wine that sweats in the vat of earthly intoxication, but with the new wine of the kingdom. And there for the first time we will realize what fools we were on earth when we feared to die, since death has turned out only to be the moving from a smaller house into a larger, and the exchange of a pauper's hut for a prince's castle, and the going upstairs from a miserable kitchen to a glorious parlor!

Good Humor.

GOOD humor will sell the most goods, plead the best argument, effect the best cure, preach the best sermon, build the best wall, weave the best carpet. The poorest business firm in town is Growl, Spitfire & Brothers. They blow up their clerks, they insult their customers, they quarrel with the drayman, they kick the beggars. The children shy off as they pass the street, and the dogs, with wild yelp, clear the path as they come. Acrid, waspish, fretful, explosive, cranky—suddenly the money market will be astounded with the defalcation of Growl, Spitfire & Brothers. Merryman and Warmgrasp were poor boys when they came from the country. They brought all their possessions in a little pack. Each of them had two pairs of socks, two collars, one jackknife, a paper of pins, and a hunk of gingerbread which the mother gave them when she kissed them good-by and told them to be good boys and mind the boss. They smiled, and laughed, and bowed, and worked themselves up higher and higher in the estimation of their employers. They soon had a store of their own. Not by force of capital, but by having money drawer and counters and shelves all full of good temper, they rose in society until to-day they have one of the largest stores and most elegant show windows, and the finest carriages, and the prettiest wives in all the town.

Our Cities.

AFTER the death of Alexander the Great, among his tablets was found a plan for building cities in Asia and filling them with Europeans, and cities in Europe and filling them with Asiatics, so that by intermarriage all the known earth might be brought into affinity and kindness. So in all our cities may there be demonstrated this truth, that God had made of one blood all nations, and that they may be brought into a harmonious brotherhood by the power of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the dominant spirit of which is peace and good will to men. May these cities which have protected us in such pleasant homes be under perpetual blessing. As the cities go, the country goes. From these great active centres of power may there descend upon all the land the most Christian influences. What we have received of advantage from those who went before let us transfer to those who come after. Lord God of our fathers, make us worthy of our noble ancestry. Lord God of our children, bring forth from the cradles of the rising generation a race to do better than we when our hand and voice are still. Then let all the rivers of this land flowing into the Atlantic or Pacific sea be rivers of salvation and all the mountains Olivets of truth and Pisgahs of prospect, and the mist rising from the lakes will be the incense of holy praise, and it will be evident to all the earth that this is the nation whose God is the Lord.

BRIEF NOTES.

We regret to learn that some people in Southern States have been victimized by persons pretending to be agents for this journal. It should be distinctly understood that we have no agents. We receive subscriptions from any one who will send them, whether they be those of other people, but we would caution friends against entrusting their subscription to persons who are strangers to them.

Bishop Blyth, of Jerusalem, says that in 1841 there were only 8,000 Jews in Palestine. In 1883, they numbered 23,000; now they number 70,000, nearly double the number that returned from the Babylonian captivity.

The Government statistics of New Wales show that for some years past, there has been a diminution in the drink bill of the colony, with a corresponding increase in savings-bank deposits, while the convictions for drunkenness decreased fifty-nine per cent.

As an Evidence of Temperance Progress in England, it is stated that the Duke of Westminster, who had on his estates a few years ago forty saloons, has closed thirty-seven of them, and rented them to persons who will carry on kinds of business in them.

The problem of the suffrage is being solved in Belgium in a novel way. Every man over twenty-five, if he is not a pauper, has one vote. He is over thirty-five, married, a widower, father, and pays the yearly house tax, he has two votes. A university degree gives him a third vote.

The circulation of the Bible in Egypt has increased rapidly. The statistic of the American Bible Society in the thirty years from 1865 to 1900, that during the first ten years of the period the numbers of Bibles sent to Egypt was 6,630; in the second ten, 45,846; and during the last ten, 116,474.

Rev. Alberto J. Diaz, M.D., the Cuban evangelist, who was imprisoned by Gen. Yriarte, has entered the service of the Baptist Publication Society, and is just starting on a tour in the American "Good Tidings" through Texas and Mexico. His labors will be chiefly among Spanish-speaking people.

In a letter to the author of a book dealing with the relations between science and religion, thanking him for a copy of his work, Mr. Glaser expresses gratitude to science for all it has done in doing, but says that Christianity does not reject it, and is as able now as it ever was to hold its ground.

Evangelist Arthur Crane has just closed a very successful series of meetings at Norfolk. The meetings were held in the Freeman Church, of which Dr. M. B. Wharton is pastor. The church was crowded during his stay, and there were many remarkable conversions. Mr. Crane now conducting services at Freehold, N. J.

A Recent Scientific Traveler in Palestine publishes as the result of his observations, that the Sea of Galilee which is 800 feet below the level of the Mediterranean, is fast becoming like the Dead Sea, with dense water and salt formations on its shores. The traveler believes that the bottom of the sea is sinking and that greater changes in it are impending.

A Significant Opposition to the Movement for extending the suffrage to women has arisen in England. It is led by the Wine and Spirit Review, a journal devoted to the interests of liquor dealers. It frankly states that its reason for opposing female suffrage is that nine women out of ten are opposed to the saloon. The struggle between women from the polls thus becomes on the one hand the liquor dealers a war of self preservation.

Of the 11,021,530 square miles that comprises England now holds 2,194,880, according to the latest figures compiled by Mr. Ravenscroft, the Geographical Society. France has 55,000 square miles, including Algeria, Tunis, and part of the Sahara; Germany 884,870, the part acquired since 1884; Portugal, which for a long time had almost a monopoly of Africa, now only 826,730 square miles.

The young people's department of the Woman's National Indian Association is preparing to continue its custom of sending Christmas gifts to the Indian children. Last year over 500 such gifts were sent out, with the best results. The department, through its Secretary, Miss Mary E. Ives, 105 box 105, New Haven, Conn., urgently asks that all who have influence with the young people will interest themselves in this enterprise.

The votes of the Fall Conference of the question of admitting women to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, 1907, so favorable to the proposal as those of last year. The recent vote shows 3,955 for and 1,587 against the proposition. The affirmative vote last year being three-fourths, compared with the affirmative vote of last year there has been an increase of 1 in the affirmative and of 573 in the negative.

Charles S. Studd, a well-known missionary who has labored during the past ten years in India, is now making a tour of American colleges to recruit for the foreign mission field. Mr. Studd is a graduate of Cambridge University, England, and a leader in Christian work among the colleges. He is a guest of the International Christian Union, a famous athlete at college, and his equally famous in the missionary work in China.

Recently tabulated religious statistics show that of the population of the U.S. 62,622,259, 17,000,000 are communicants of churches and 2,616,826. The proportion of communicants to population is larger in the cities than in the country districts. The average in the cities is to every 1,000. In the country it is 328 in the 1,000. Philadelphia has the largest number of communicants, 1,000,000. Brooklyn has the largest proportion of communicants to population.

The American Bible Society makes a large appeal for funds. Owing to the falling receipts, and especially of legacies, it has been compelled to refuse urgent requests for aid from several Foreign Mission Societies. As an unsectarian society, it depends for support on churches of all denominations, but of 1,000 churches have been occupied with the needs of their own Mission Boards, and the income of the American Bible Society has suffered. This Society is doing a noble work, that the disclosure of its need will be sufficient to bring a prompt response.

Armenian Rejoicings at Fresno.

NE of the most interesting celebrations of this quadrennial year of pageants was the festival, a photograph of which appears on this page.

At Fresno, California, refugees from Armenia, have been settling in small numbers for sixteen years past, until now there are over two hundred in that neighborhood. Assisted in the first instance by the munificence of an Armenian gentleman in this country, the early settlers sent for their relatives and friends as they were able to raise the means of transportation. They have uniformly prospered, the majority of them on farms, where they labor with their own hands, and contrive to make a profit even in the worst years when their neighbors who depend on hired labor, have lost money. Some of them have devoted themselves to trade and have built up successful businesses. One is a physician, another an artist, another a clergyman; all are doing well and there is not one who has become a public burden. They are popular, too. The American citizens admire the promptitude with which the Armenian arrival takes out his first papers and becomes a citizen as soon as the law allows. He learns the language with surprising rapidity and adjusts himself easily to his new surroundings. He does not seclude himself among his countrymen as the English, German and Swedish settlers are apt to do; but likes to associate with native Americans and takes an intelligent interest in American affairs. He takes a pride in his new nationality, and his love for the flag which symbolizes his freedom is intense. Perhaps it is not possible for us, accustomed all our lives to liberty, to realize the feelings of a man who never knows from one day to another when he may be imprisoned or killed, and his wife and children torn from his side—when such a man, standing on American ground, under the Stars and Stripes, breathes freely, knowing that the fiendish tyrant at Constantinople can molest him no more, he has good reason for a passionate love for the country which has sheltered him and protects him. He feels for his adopted country the reverent affection the Poles, Hungarians and Huguenots who found a refuge in England felt as they bared their heads and blessed "the white chalk line of sea-washed cliffs" where no despot's emissaries could follow them. We cannot wonder, therefore, that Armenian citizens surpass others, even those born on the soil in the enthusiasm of their patriotic celebrations. We may hope that all of them, too, may be in fact as well as in name followers of Him who said:

They shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand. (John 10:28)

Rubies and Diamonds in Rivalry.

A jeweler reports in a trade journal the present situation as to the fashion for betrothal rings. It appears that the trade has observed a tendency among wealthy lovers to choose a betrothal ring having some other stones than diamonds. It has so long been the custom to give a diamond ring on these occasions, that a change seemed necessary. Of late, says the jeweler, the ruby has been the favorite stone. He does not believe, however, that the fashion will continue. The diamond has merits of its own which will drive the ruby out of the race. It is emblematic of purity, is noted for being indestructible, and is a famous talisman for preventing storms, all of which make it a desirable stone for the engagement ring. Besides which it is much easier to find a perfect diamond than a perfect ruby. Fine rubies without a flaw or blemish are so rare that if they weigh more than two carats they are from five to ten times as costly as diamonds of the same size.

There are numbers of stones, such as garnets and ruby-spinels, which are sold as rubies, which are not rubies at all, but are so like that only an expert can tell the difference. Summing up the merits of the two stones, the jeweler believes that diamonds will continue to be in favor for the purpose, especially for people who cannot afford to pay the high price of a fine, genuine ruby. Perhaps there would be less business for the divorce courts if lovers gave less thought about the proper style of ring, and more to the search for that wisdom which God gives to all who lack and ask him for it.

Wisdom is better than rubies, and all the things that may be desired are not to be compared to it. (Proverbs 3:15)

A Kick Worth Millions.

A remarkable story of the discovery of a famous mine is related by the San Francisco Chronicle. It states that the mine known as the "Noonday" in the Black Range, which is one of the richest in New Mexico, was originally discovered through an accident. One of the teamsters, who in 1887 carried freight from Lake Valley to the mining camps in New was rich beyond anything he had ever seen. He climbed back eventually and finished his journey. He did not do any more teamster's work, but sent to Denver for his brother, who was a miner, bidding him collect all the money he could and come to New Mexico. In a short time a gang of men were at work and both men are now worth large fortunes. Whatever the teamster may have thought when the mule kicked him, if he could think at all, it is safe to say that he does not now regard that kick as a misfortune since it led him to wealth. The time will come when the Christian will see his trials and afflictions in the same light if they have their intended effect in his spiritual enrichment.

For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. (II. Cor. 4:17)

An Abstainer's Fortune.

San Francisco journals report the transfer, by the order of the courts, of shares valued at half a million dollars to a young man who had submitted evidence of his being a total abstainer from intoxicating liquor. It appears that in 1891 the will of a recently deceased millionaire was offered for probate. It provided for the distribution among his children of all his property except half a million dollars. Each of his children received a share except one son, who was a notorious drunkard. The will gave him nothing, but directed that the half million dollars should be invested in certain shares, and that these should remain in the hands of trustees, who were instructed to transfer them to the dissipated son at any time within fifteen years, passed through a mild alkaline bath, and finally boiled in a weak solution of caustic soda, to which zinc has been added. When dried, the fibres emerge as long, silky flosse, clean, white, and ready for the comb of the spinner. They take the most attractive dyes and can be worked into every variety of fabric, from the finest quality of velvets to cheap drills and delicate laces. The combined lightness and toughness of the fibre render it peculiarly suitable for tents and ship canvas, and three-fifths more cloth of equal strength can be produced from Rhea than from the same weight of linen—that is, one thousand yards of Rhea canvas weighs only as much as six hundred yards of linen, its durability and resisting power to strain being also much greater. The difficulty hitherto, appears to have been to find acids which would remove the dust and resin without injuring the fibre. The same difficulty is experienced in the purification of human character. God sometimes uses affliction for the purpose, and the subject of it needs to have much faith in him to be sure that the removal of the dross is the end to be attained.

Fear the Lord, and forsake evil, and thou shalt prosper. . . . I will not make a full end of thee, but correct thee in measure. (Isa. 46:28)

Tried to Make Gold.

In the course of a conversation on the futile efforts of the ancient alchemists, a New York chemist said recently that the public has no idea how many persons still cherish the hope of being able to transmute base metals into gold. He knew one instance in a man, a customer of his who died three years ago. The man earned his living by making diamond pointers for use in lithographic work, and being a skillful workman he easily secured an income larger than he needed for his modest wants. He never married, but led a lonely, secret life in lodging-houses. He believed that he had the clue to a chemical process which would make gold, and all his spare time was given to experiments in this pursuit. He was extremely secretive and was tormented by the fear that some one would discover the secret of his formulas. None of his experiments succeeded, but he believed himself perpetually on the eve of the discovery which would make him the richest man in the world. He continued to work on, undismayed by his repeated failures, and confident in his belief that success would come some day. The fruits of more than forty years of hard work and study were found in his desolate room after his death. They were a few nuggets of yellowish metal about the size of walnuts, of no value. There can be no doubt that the poor man wasted his life, as many did in olden times, in the same pursuit. Men are generally wiser now and seek the end of attaining wealth, by other methods. In the light of Christ's teaching, however, the method makes little difference. The man who gives his life to the pursuit of wealth by any method, wastes it.

Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth . . . but lay up for yourselves treasures in Heaven where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt. (Matt. 6:19, 20)

A Bicyclist's Dilemma.

A lady who is an enthusiastic bicyclist had a disagreeable experience during a country excursion in Michigan. She and her escort were going over a country road when the lady's dress caught in the gearing of the wheel. Her companion went to her assistance. He proposed cutting it, but it was a new dress and the lady was reluctant to spoil it. The only way of getting the dress out was to take off a wheel; but unfortunately neither of them carried a wrench. The young man offered to return to the city to procure one if the young lady would wait. He was away a long time, and she waited with what patience she could until he came back, when he took the machine to pieces and released her. She saved her dress, but she will do well not to make that principle the invariable rule of life. There are entanglements in which it is wiser to suffer any loss, to secure a quick and certain escape.

It thine eye offend thee, pluck it out; it is better for thee to enter the Kingdom of God with one eye than having two eyes to be cast into hell-fire. (Mark 9:47)

ARMENIANS AT FRESNO, CAL., HOLDING PATRIOTIC CELEBRATION.

Mexico, was a hard-working man who found it difficult to eke out a decent living. In September of that year he had the offer of a load to be carried a distance of eighty miles, over the side of the Hogback, to a mining camp. As the road was narrow and of steep grade and the load heavy, several teamsters had refused it; but this man, being poor, was willing to accept. He succeeded in getting safely over sixty miles of the route and had reached a pass where the road was not more than three feet wider than his wagon, when one of the mules became obstinate. It kicked over the traces and would not budge an inch. The teamster whipped and coaxed in vain. In his effort to get the mule to work he received a kick from one of its hoofs which sent him clear over the edge of the precipice. Happily for him he did not fall on the jagged rocks at the foot, but was stopped by a tree growing on a ledge. He was unconscious for a time as the result of the shock, but when he opened his eyes he looked around wondering where he was. He soon realized what had happened and searched around for some stepping stones in the almost perpendicular wall of rock, by which he could climb back to his team. Then he saw to his amazement that the rock providing he could prove that during the five years immediately preceding his claiming them he could prove that he had been a total abstainer. The young man at once commenced his period of probation, and has succeeded in keeping sober for the stipulated time. On his satisfying the court of the fact, the order for the transfer of the shares was made. It may be hoped that he will continue sober now that he has acquired his fortune. He will thus get a double blessing. This is the Christian's experience. Not only does he enter upon an inheritance, but is fitted to enjoy it by a process which makes him a better man.

Giving thanks unto the Father, who hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. (Col. 1:12)

Preparing a Textile.

A scientific journal describes a new process which has been found successful in producing from Rhea fibre a substitute for linen. The bark of the Rhea plant which grows in India, China, and Japan it says, is cut in strips or ribbons, but these are useless for textile purposes, because of the dirt and resinous substances they contain. They are placed in baths of weak acid for a night, and are then

An interesting story of a revival, which came to a church in Indiana, is told in a communication which Rev. F. B. Meyer sends to the London Christian. In response to Mr. Meyer's question as to the beginning of the revival, the minister of the church said:

“The church had been blessed with faithful preaching for half a century, and had been swept by half-a-dozen revivals in that time; but there were plenty of members over fifty-five years of age that had passed through them all, and were still out of Christ. I began preaching. The burden of all my sermons at that time was, that the Church was responsible for the world, and that if the world was not won for Jesus, it was because the Church was out of condition.

"Out of this preaching of mine came a secret prayer meeting, held in my vestry for eighteen months. Towards the end of that period I set myself with renewed earnestness to preach to professors. For three months I had no word for the unconverted, and some of them began to fear that they were past saving; but during all that time I was constantly urging the Church to consider its responsibilities, and to become a people prepared for the coming of the Lord. Finally we decided to set apart Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday for special meetings, to humble ourselves before God and confess our sins.

"On the Thursday morning, at ten o'clock, when we were about to begin the meeting, all my officers rose up in a body, and came to the front, confessing that they had been unfaithful to their duties, and then fell on their knees entreating God to have mercy on them. There wasn't a dry eye in the house: grey-headed professors of religion were crying aloud for salvation, avowing that they had never truly experienced saving grace: members of the church were going to and fro across the room asking forgiveness of those against whom they had trespassed; and it seemed as though the very power of God had come down on the whole assembly. This had not been going on for long, before there was a noise at the door, and we found that a number of work-people were waiting for admission to the church. I unbarred the door and let them in, and they filled the place, crying aloud for salvation."

“We were blessed with some remarkable cases of conversion. There was one man who had been put out over some trivial matter, and had not been in the church for months; but at the invitation of a little girl of twelve he came to the Sunday evening service, and as I gave out the hymn, with the refrain, ‘Will you go?’ broke in with the words, ‘Yes, I am going right now,’ and immediately the whole congregation was turned into a Bochim, and on every side strong men were saying, ‘We will go, too.’ There was another case. A man had gone out of the church eighteen months before, declaring that he would never enter it again. His neighbors and children said that he never could be converted. The old minister, on the other hand, had faith to claim this hardened soul for Christ with undoubting assurance. He went to his home and said, ‘John Pye, I want you to come to church this afternoon.’ ‘I have said I won’t, and I won’t,’ was the wrathful reply, and he came toward the minister in a threatening manner to throw him out of the house, but his arm seemed suddenly paralyzed, and from that moment till the Sunday afternoon, three days and nights, he neither ate nor slept. He then sent for the minister and entreated him to pray for him. ‘No,’ was the reply, ‘it is of no use to pray for you till you have retracted your rash vow and promised to come to church this evening.’ At last he yielded. ‘I’ll come,’ he cried, ‘Will you pray for me now?’ They knelt together and he found mercy.

"That evening, he stood up before all the congregation and said, 'No one can tell me there's no hell.' I have been in it for eighteen months. You, minister, took my moral boots off eighteen months ago, and I've been in hell ever since; but, thank God, my chains are broken, and I'm free.' I had no need to preach a sermon that night. The conversion of this man became the talk of the neighborhood."

Work has now been obtained for a majority of the Armenians who arrived in New York lately, but a number of the immigrants are still at the Salvation Army farm in New Jersey, where those who are sent to employers may have to pass the coming winter. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has sent to the farm for the use of the immigrants during the cold weather another supply of blankets, from the surplus stock of the Bowery Mission. Many of the Armenian immigrants arriving here have absolutely nothing in the world except the clothes they wear, and they are ill-calculated to keep out the freezing blasts of our climate in winter. Any sound, warm clothing sent to the Bowery Mission, 105 Bowery, New York, for the use of the exiles, will be applied to that purpose.

THE CHURCH'S CRYING NEED.

Evangelist Moody's Clarion Call for a General Revival of Sunday Evening Gospel Services Widely Heeded—Many Warm Endorsements of his Plan.

ALREADY a number of letters have been received from pastors, church officials, and church members of many different denominations in response to the appeal of Evangelist Dwight L. Moody, for a widespread revival of Sunday Evening Gospel Services. All of these communications, without exception, are enthusiastically in favor of the plan outlined by the great evangelist for a much-needed "stirring of the dry bones" in the Christian churches throughout the nation.

Our readers will recall the earnestness with which Mr. Moody set forth the peril of the churches in neglecting the Sunday evening services. His language was, in substance, that righteousness and intelligence were needed to save the nation. "We need a revival of Gospel preaching—the plain, old-fashioned, unadulterated Gospel of Jesus Christ—in all our churches. The church that has no Sunday evening Gospel services, or what amounts to none, is dead! And every such service should be followed by an after-meeting for personal work." He explained that the Sunday evening service is and always has been, the best of all services for reaching the common people. "If you don't get them to church Sunday evening, you won't get them at all." He added that: "A service not based on the Gospel, and that does not preach Jesus Christ and him crucified, is of no value to meet the emergency," but he was convinced that if the Gospel alone were presented in a majority of our pulpits Sundays, we would not have any occasion for complaint of small audiences and lack of spiritual interest.

Below are a few of the numerous letters received in response to our invitation for a free expression of opinion on this most important topic. The language of the letters is strictly preserved, the names of the writers and the churches (all of which are in our possession) being withheld.

St. Louis, Mo.—I am one of the trustees of the church here. Sunday evening services are held, of a miscellaneous character. Our membership has increased in the past year about 100. I heartily endorse the suggestions of Brother Moody. In every church in America should be held Gospel meetings every Sunday night. Not only this, but I believe that the church membership should meet every Sunday afternoon, as a Bible Class, and study to make themselves "approved unto God that needeth not to be ashamed," so that each will be qualified to do his or her part in assisting the pastor.

Baltimore, Md.—Our church holds Sunday evening services. I'm very glad that Mr. Moody made those suggestions, and if you take the matter in hand, you will accomplish a vast amount of good. The tendency of "pastors" is to cater to the public tastes upon the questions of the day, both political and social. They want to see their name in the paper; but what Christianity wants is a teacher like him who went about doing good. The plain, simple Gospel is what we want. Christ yesterday, today, and forever is what God's people want. Tell the ministers to drop all "isms," and for the love of our good Lord and upbuilding of Christian character, preach us the "old, Marion Junction, S.D.—I think every church should have Sunday evening services. We do not have any in our church. Our membership has not increased any in the past year, and I am grieved to say that there were no conversions made.

Greensboro, N. C.—Our church holds Gospel meetings every Sabbath night, plain, simple Gospel. Since Jan. 1st, 1896, 34 have been admitted by certificate and 17 by examination.

Thessalon, Ont., Can.—The church I belong to has no particular name. We have the regular preaching service after the Epworth League service on Sunday evening. The growth has been very small and I do not know of any conversions in the past year. We have been talking of turning our League meeting into an evangelistic service, some time. We expect to have a series of revival services carried out soon. Mr. Moody recommended an after-service on Sunday evenings, and I have been impressed with the fact that it was necessary for a long time. A good impression may be made on a congregation, but at the close of the service they will go home and forget, whereas if there was some way of reaching the unconverted by practical personal work, such as might be done in an after-meeting of this kind, it would be lasting. There are thousands of people who are yet unsaved, and who might have been serving God for years. I hope that the people not only in the United States, but in Canada also, will catch some of Mr. Moody's enthusiasm.

Blockville, N. Y.—I would say, in regard to Mr. Moody's suggestion, that our church has preaching only once in two weeks, in the afternoon. We have not had much increase for a few years past. We do need an evangelist.

Liberal, Kan.—Sunday evening services are held in our church, and we have Gospel services. We have had five or six additions during the past year, four by letter, one from the Sunday School, one from the Catholic Church.

This is a village of about 250, with three Protestant denominations. We meet together every Thursday night to pray and plan for our future work outside the church to win souls for Christ. We earnestly desire your prayers. The only personal work in the church I have seen has been in this little place, and we have thought it kept the ones we wanted to reach especially from coming to church.

Eau Claire, Wis.—On every Sunday evening is held a real Gospel service, with a ten minute after-meeting for prayer, testimony and personal work. Our membership has had a gradual growth for the last two years, ending with the month of August, 1896, of 162 members. The conversions are estimated at 140. Our prayer is that the Master may abundantly bless you in your efforts in winning souls.

A large number of letters have been received. In every case where Gospel services are held on Sunday evenings, there has been a steady growth in membership, with more or less numerous conversions. Where no services are held Sunday evenings, the decay is evident from the reports. This rule is apparently without exception.

FAREWELL AND WELCOME.

(Suggested by the last written words of Rev. Dr. McCosh of Princeton University.)

FAREWELL, farewell, to hill and dale,
To mount, to purling brook and vale,
To lake and outflow, fields and river;

The soul's delight from God their giver;
To forest dear and shady dell,
Where fancy's fairy creatures dwell;

To sun and moon, to earth and sky,
And all the glittering hosts on high;

Adieu, my kindest, long adieu,
But welcome what exceeds all these,

Fair heaven, with splendor limitless,
Where fall all fear and all distress!
Heaven, where the mighty angels dwell,
Heaven, with the spirits of the just,

Made perfect by prevailing trust!
Heaven, where our Lord will greatly bless,
To greet those who the cross lay down,
With glad acclaim and victor crown!

All hail the glories of the sky!

Montenegrin Royal Homes.

The Palace of Cetinje, Where Princess Helene, the Future Queen of Italy, Passed Her Girlhood.

IN view of her present and future prominence in the courts of Europe and before the world, it is specially interesting at this time to learn something of the early life and home surroundings of the beautiful Princess Helene, who in all probability will yet be the Queen of Italy. Although the Prince of Naples owned a collection of photographs of all the eligible princesses of Europe from whom to choose his bride, he remained obdurate in his refusal to marry until he met the Princess of Montenegro. It was at the Exhibition at Venice, that the obstinate young prince capitulated to the beauty and superior talents of the lovely Princess whose childhood home lies near the Adriatic Sea, surrounded by gloomy black mountains, capped with snow.

The third daughter of Nikita I, monarch of the smallest principality in Europe, the new-made bride of Prince Victor Emmanuel, is just twenty-three years of age. When only twelve years old she was sent to school in St. Petersburg, where she remained several years, becoming at the same time acquainted with the German and Russian languages. But most of the Princess's life has been spent at the little Court of Montenegro, in the old Palace of the Princes of Montenegro at Cetinje, the small and feudal, like capital of the little hereditary European monarchy, which is only about the size of North Wales.

The life of the court and capital of

THE ROYAL PALACE AT CETINJE, MONTE NEGRO.

Montenegro is not only extreme in its simplicity, but even patriarchal. The majority of the people live in cottages built of stone, with interiors as bare and gloomy as the exterior surroundings of black soil and cold barren mountains. To western civilization, the primitive laws and customs which have always been identified with the home of the bride of the Crown Prince of Italy, seem in a way far removed and apart from the intellectual advanced and talented personality of the most beautiful woman in Europe to-day; whose childhood was passed where the real statute book of her country is national custom alone, and where justice is rendered even now in true primitive fashion.

In this "Black Mountain" monarchy to-day, the largest landed proprietor is the holder of sixty acres of land alone. Woods and pastures are common property of the clan, and freehold estates usually belong to the house or family instead of the individual. There are separate departments of justice, foreign affairs, war, finance, and education, but the latter is at a slow stage of progress. The very first Montenegrin newspaper did not appear until 1870, and the first book-shop in 1879. The printing presses at Cetinje issued the first books in the Slavonic language to be read by the people. The former president of the senate could neither read nor write, although he was acknowledged a poet whose verses and songs were a delight to this peculiar people.

Compared with the palatial homes of many European nobles and American statesmen, the house of a Senator of Montenegro presents a striking contrast. The houses are of stone, and built of stone, the square flat ceiling is supported by massive wooden pillars, rough and unadorned. The windows are cut in the stone walls, so high up they emit but little light. Guns and firearms, with the picture here and there of a prince or soldier, form the wall decorations. A few heavy, antique pieces of furniture, of mediæval fashion and make, constitute the only furnishing; the chief object being the great table at one end of the room, at which the Montenegrin statesman sits and schemes, and entertains his friends by discussing questions of interest to the country.

Ten Years' Waiting.

IN an address recently delivered, Rev. J. Macgowan, the devoted missionary at Amoy, China, who said he was a delegate from forty native Chinese churches with an aggregate membership of forty-one hundred, thus described his early experiences in China:

"When I returned to China it was to commence new work in a new region. It was a very beautiful region. It was a great semi-circular plain, and around plain there were high mountains, oftentimes I have looked at the mountains and thought how beautiful they were. The plain, however, was a kind of Sleepy Hollow. Even the rivers ran through this plain seemed to be sluggish, as if they had caught the temperament of the people. It seemed from first as though it was going to be a difficult place for a mission, and my inducement to start the mission there that the county town was in the centre of the plain, and the magistrate of all county lived there, and all the great suits of the county had to be settled at that town. There the farmers brought their produce, and there came the wife of those farmers whenever they wanted to buy a new dress. So I rented a house there, turned it into a kind of chapel, and began to work. There was great excitement. The great religions of China do not indulge in public teaching. Confucianism is too respectable to tell to the common people, and Buddhism is too effete to do anything so heroic as to go out and preach their gospel to the people. Crocodiles came into this chapel of ours, open-mouthed, listened to the wonderful utterances of the preachers. The scholar also came, and he stood upon the threshold with that intense look which Christians had worked out during the two thousand years on his face, and he listened to what was being said. We began work and preached on for a year. At the end of the year we looked, but we had made no progress whatever. We remarked to ourselves: 'This is the result of the character of the people; this is Sleepy Hollow, and it will take a long time to wake up these people. So we went on. At the end of another year we looked again at the faces of congregations; but it did not seem as if one Christian idea had entered the heart of any one of our hearers. The third year went with the same result, and the fourth year went and the fifth year came, and the old town seemed dustier than ever, and we seemed not to have touched one of the hearts of those great numbers of people who had listened to us for years. The sixth year came on; no soul! The seventh year came; not one! Not a single man, woman, or child could we lay our fingers upon and say, 'Here there has been some good done!'

The great hills that seemed to fling with light did not seem half so beautiful as years ago, and we began to talk about giving up the place. 'As we talked we thought: 'What! lose eight years of work! No!' But, my dear friends, it was not the point that touched us most; it was the honor of our Saviour! Was the Gospel to fail? No! We knelt down and we prayed, and when we got up our faces were set, and we looked at each other and said: 'We will never give up! Never!' The ninth year came and we had no impression. The tenth year came; these ten years of sorrow and agony to the workers—the tenth came, and the one fine morning the mountains seemed more beautiful than ever, and the dust seemed lifted right away from the city, and the faces of the passers-by seemed more friendly and beautiful to us, and we found that the long winter of ten years had gone by and that blossom more beautiful, more sweet than ever graced the earthly tree, had made our chapel fragrant. For years we have had in the place a self-supporting church. It has a pastor of its own, and it collects its subscriptions every year, pays its own preacher, and carries its church life as home churches do.

Good Out of Trouble.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning November 29. Psalm 27: 1-14.

PROBABLY there is no secret the knowledge of which would be of greater value to the human race than this of the way to get good out of trouble. Every one has opportunity of using it, for every one has trouble. Even those who might be comparatively free from it, make it for themselves. It is worthy of notice, too, that the suffering that people endure from self-made troubles is as genuine and as painful as that of people who could not avoid it if they would. Many a woman will weep as bitter tears over the loss of a lap-dog, as another woman sheds over the death of a child. Incidentally it may be remarked, as a matter of observation, that the people who are most industrious and successful in making trouble, seldom get to the end of their lives without having to bear some heavy troubles that are not self-made, and then they learn that they were foolish in putting from them the happiness that was once within their reach.

The question assumes that it is possible to get good out of trouble, and it is possible. The highest good that can come to any human being next to the salvation of his soul, is development of character. It is in that process that trouble renders service. There are many desirable characteristics which it produces and fosters. If it is wisely borne, it develops patience. The restiveness and fretfulness under suffering of one who has attained middle life without bearing much suffering, is a matter of common observation. A man who has had the blessing of good health, will be almost distracted by a slight tooth-ache, or some trivial ailment that would not disturb the serenity of a chronic invalid. Trouble may also develop moral strength. There are often so many ways out of trouble which involve wrongdoing, that the conflict with temptation has to be fought and in that conflict the victor gains power. Trouble also strengthens faith, if it fulfils its mission. It is easy to trust God and praise and bless him when he sends prosperity; but when adversity comes, it is sometimes hard to believe in his tenderness and loving care. There is a struggle, but if at the end of it the man is able to say, "though he slay me, yet will I trust in him," his faith has withstood the shock and has driven its roots deeper. Lastly, among many other benefits that trouble develops, is the power to help and sympathize with others. A Christian who has passed through deep waters, often becomes like a ministering angel to the afflicted.

How to get this good out of trouble is a problem not always solved. It is not solved by the rebellious sufferer. The man who feels that God has dealt hardly with him, misses the good and his suffering is wasted. Nor is it solved by the heedless or the despairing. Good comes out of trouble to the man who recognizes it as discipline, and honestly tries to discover what elements of his character it may strengthen, and to cheerfully acquiesce in his lot. This is a higher attitude than stoicism, which simply submits. It is the active co-operation which we expect from an intelligent child whose interests we are seeking to promote. We expect him to trust even when he cannot understand and to believe that he is not afflicted out of mere caprice.

FLITTING AWAY.

WILLIAM C. BRYANT.

CHAS. H. GABRIEL.

1. As shad-ows, cast by cloud and sun, Flit o'er the sum-mer grass,
2. And while the years, an end-less host, Come pass-ing swift-ly on,
3. Yet doth the Star of Beth-lem shed A lus-tre pure and sweet,
4. O Fa-ther, may that Ho-ly Star Grow ev-'ry year more bright,

So, in Thy sight, Al-might-y One, Earth's gen-er-a-tions pass.
The bright-est name that earth can boast, But glist-ens, and is gone.
And still it leads, as once it led, To the Mes-si-ah's feet.
And shed its glo-rious beams a-far To fill the world with light.

CHORUS.

Moderato, m.

Flit-ting a-way, flit-ting a-way, Flit-ting like the shad-ows a-way,
Flitting like the shadows, One by one we pass a-way, a-way, a-way,

Flit-ting a-way, flit-ting a-way, Flit-ting like the shad-ows a-way.
Flitting like the shadows, One by one we pass a-way, a-way, a-way.

PEACEFUL, lying in a dungeon:

Wretched, statue on a throne;
Lonely, though with thronging millions,
Only one; yet not alone;
Cheerful, on a bed of suffering;
Poor, though having gems of worth;
Sorrowing, while in heaven's own sunlight;
Rich, though having naught of earth.

Not alone, if our companion
Prove to be the risen Lord,
Never lonely; in the presence
Of the Spirit and the Word;
Do the watching "Cloud," who witness
All our onward progress here,
Wonder why we're ever dreary,
Why pressed down with doubts and fear?

THE PILGRIM.

A PILGRIM am I, on my way
To seek and find the Holy Land.
Scarce had I started, when there lay
And marched round me a fourfold band.
A smiling Joy, a weeping Woe,
A Hope, a Fear, did with me go;
And one may come, or one be gone;
But I am never more alone.

Thus, fellow-pilgrims, fare we on,
But in what mortals call my death,
My Fear is doomed to die anon;
When Woe shall leave me safe,—so saith
My sweet-voiced Hope,—and turn to bring
Some other soul; while Joy shall spring
With me through heaven's strait door, to be Forever of my company!

Turkey in Prophecy.

The Great Assassin Bringing the Long Career of Turkish Crime to the Culmination When Judgment will be Executed.

GRADUAL dismemberment, as we have seen, has been the lot of Turkey during this century. It was in 1792—a little more than a hundred years ago—that Turkey's reverses began in earnest, by the loss of the Crimea and the Kuban. During the next fifty years she lost

Greece and all the region between the Dniester and the Pruth. Since then, Bulgaria, Roumania, Servia, Bosnia and Herzegovina have thrown off the Turkish yoke, and Egypt has been practically wrested from her. Thus within little more than a hundred years the empire has shrunk to comparatively small proportions. Her revenues, too, have shrunk until she is little better than a bankrupt nation. Her national pride has been humiliated to such a degree that whatsoever nation she turns to for friendship, shows its friendly feeling by reproof and admonition, while her enemies flout her with impunity. The sultan has been scolded, threatened, lectured, and warned, with an arrogance never displayed toward any other modern monarch.

Turning from history to prophecy, we find them both in accord. The Seer of Patmos observed (Rev. 16: 12) that the Euphrates—the symbol of the Ottoman Empire in prophecy—was being "dried up." The figure points not so much to conquest as to such a gradual wasting away as has occurred. The object, too, is significant. It is that the way of "the kings of the East shall be prepared." That the wasting of the Turkish power may pave the way for the return of the Jews to their own land is obvious. Within a few months the project has been definitely revived. The artist Holman Hunt, who has been spending much of his time in Palestine, returned to England recently, bringing with him the positive assurance, derived from influential Turkish statesmen, that if a proposal to rent, or lease, the Holy Land, came from responsible Jewish capitalists, who were able to guarantee the payment of the rental, or tribute, it would be favorably considered. The Sultan finds so much difficulty in the collection of revenue that it would be a relief to him to make a bargain of that kind. Whether that or some similar project materializes, or whether the Jew will wait for the next stage of dismemberment in the hope of securing the country without the payment of tribute, does not appear, but it is certain that a Jewish acquisition of the Promised Land would be a solution of the Eastern Question that would find favor in the eyes of European statesmen. It would avoid the aggrandizement of either Russia or Austria, which is the dread of England and Germany, and it would have a sentimental advantage, which, even in this utilitarian age, has its influence. Besides this, the antipathy manifested toward the Jew in Russia and Germany has marvelously increased of late. Both countries are eager to eliminate the Jew, and therefore might be disposed to favor a wholesale deportation from their lands. We may be sure from prophecy that the kings of the East will return, and if, as is evident, the Turkish power has hitherto been the chief obstacle, that obstacle appears now to be crumbling away. The Ottoman Empire is falling to pieces by its own corruption.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

ances have recently been debating the question of the origin of the familiar term "Uncle Sam." Will you enlighten us?

There are several accounts of the origin of the well-known title, each varying only slightly from the others. One account, typical of the rest, is this: Samuel Wilson, usually called "Uncle Sam," was a government inspector of beef and pork at Troy, N. Y., 85 years ago. A contractor purchased some provisions, and the barrels were marked "E. A." Anderson's initials, and "U. S." for United States. The latter initials were not familiar to Wilson's workmen, who asked what they meant, and were answered "They mean 'Uncle Sam.'" A great deal of property afterward passed through Wilson's hands marked in this manner. The odd idea spread, and before long the United States was popularly referred to as "Uncle Sam."

Reader, Edmond, Okla. Ter. What is the difference between the regular Presbyterians and the Cumberland Presbyterians?

Mainly in the latter having abandoned still hold their place in the creed of the Presbyterian Church, although not so prominently as they did when the Cumberland Church had its origin as a separate organization in a great revival which in 1800 swept through the southwestern district of Kentucky. More preachers were urgently needed, and the Presbytery of Transylvania licensed a number of laymen to preach. Five years later the synod, hearing complaints that some of these laymen thus licensed were not sound in Calvinism, after ineffectual attempts to come to an agreement with them, prohibited the new men from preaching. Thereupon a new synod was effected in which the laymen were not required to subscribe to the "eternal reprobation, judgment and special grace." It was really an attempt to steer a middle course between Calvinism and Arminianism. The church was regularly constituted in 1829, and had a marvelous growth.

They regard Jesus as a great teacher, who, being in advance of his time, died a martyr's death, but they reject his claim to divinity. Would it not be better to live so useful and patient and helpful a life at home, through the grace that Christ has promised to his people, when they are in such painful circumstances, that all around you will love you and respect the religion that gives you power to lead such a life? If you let your light shine in your home you will be doing Christ service.

Its recurrence is frequently mentioned by the close to God. We would recommend you to do some work, Sunday School teaching, or mission work, specially for Christ. Try to win some souls for him. Pray earnestly for a new baptism of the Holy Spirit, and deny yourself some luxury that you may give something more to Christ's cause.

A. J. C., Albany, N. Y. Can a man be saved who does not attend church regularly, and is not a member of any church, yet considers himself a Christian?

We do not like to pronounce on the question whether any man can be saved. That matter is in the hands of God. There can, however, be no question as to the duty of any one claiming to be a Christian, connecting himself with a church and attending public worship. Christ required a public confession of faith in him. In our day, church membership is the form recognized for such confession.

Mrs. R. E. S., Dixon, Wis. What authority have we for believing that angels have wings?

The authority of the Bible. See Isaiah 6: 2-6; Ezekiel 1: 5-12; also, Zech. 5: 9; Revelation 14: 6; and other passages.

Mrs. Joseph Miett, Woonsocket, R. I. What authority has anyone to change the wording of a Bible passage? The verse (Job 19: 26) was quoted in my hearing the other day quite differently from the way it reads in my Bible.

In the Revised Version the verse reads: "And after my skin hath been thus destroyed; yet from my flesh shall I see God." The authority to make changes was given by the Church of England to two companies of eminent scholars, who consulted with American scholars and compared the edition of the Bible in common use with the oldest copies then known. Where they found passages incorrectly translated they made new translations. The passage you refer to was one of the likeness or semblance of" something else. Photography is a recent discovery. Portraiture was probably not implied, but simply an image having the general form or resemblance of something then extant, whether animate or inanimate. 2. Yes, they were poetry, but not versified in the modern sense. All ancient poetry was in the heroic or "blank verse" form.

Edward Clarke, Brooklyn, N. Y. How old was Azariah when he began to reign? Was he twenty-two years old, as stated in 11. Kings 8: 26; or was he forty-two, as stated in 11. Chronicles 27: 27?

The statement in Kings is correct. That in Chronicles is clearly an error, as it would make the man older than his father. The letter the Hebrews used for twenty is so like the one they used for forty, that the merest speck on the paper might make the sign for twenty appear the sign for forty, and at some time a copyist mistook it, and his blunder has gone on down to the present time. There is so strong a prejudice against making a change in the text of the Bible, that it has been deemed unwise to correct even an obvious clerical error probably not in the original.

Miss. A. E. McP., Garbulla, N. Y. What would you ask for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD 1897 Library in connection with the $2.00 offer?

Send us your full address and we will forward our combination offer.

L. E. B., Madison, Wis. How is it possible to reconcile belief in Christ's oneness with the Father with his being ignorant of anything known to the Father?

It is impossible to fully comprehend the mystery of the Trinity, but we can imagine that Christ in his loving compassion, voluntarily put from him certain attributes of the Godhead during the days of his flesh, in order that in all things he might be made like unto his brethren. As to his ignorance of a fact known to the Father, he explicitly stated that it was so (see Mark 13: 32). In what way or to what extent, if at all, the incarnation limited the divine attributes cannot be defined. Although Christ said (John 10: 30), "I and my Father are one," yet he said, too, "My Father is greater than I" (John 14: 28), and the fact of his praying to his Father indicated that in the days of his flesh there was a distinction between them that is incomprehensible to us. As we cannot explain the mysterious connection in our own being of the mind and the brain, we cannot understand the greater mystery of the Trinity.

"Believer in God's Revelation," Adrian, Mich. What authority have you for your statement that before the creation of Adam "there were in the world huge monsters of a kind now extinct?"

The authority of fact. The fossil remains of those monsters are in all the large museums. They were found in a stratum of rocks which were evidently formed by conditions of climate and temperature, in which human life could not have existed. Every student of geology is convinced that there must have been a time in the history of the earth when there were no men upon it, and the only living beings were fishes and animals of a low order of development.

S. S. Teacher, Jersey City, N. J. The statement in Matthew 12: 40: does not appear to have been borne out by the facts, as Christ seems not to have been in the tomb more than forty hours. How is it understood?

The passage has long perplexed Biblical students. The most probable explanation is that Christ adopted a mode of expression common among the Jews, and said that he should be in the grave three "evening-mornings," which the translators rendered three days and nights. The Jews also had a rule, of which there are several examples in other parts of the Bible, that any part of the onah, or period, counted as the whole. Thus the interval between the crucifixion and the burial on the Friday would be part of Friday, and would count as one "evening-morning;" from sunset on Friday to sunset on Saturday would count as the second; and from Saturday sunset to the resurrection on Sunday morning as the third. The disciples evidently regarded the Sunday as the third day, as you will see by the conversation on the way to Emmaus, when Cleopas said: "This is the third day since these things were done." (Luke 24: 21.)

THE VILLAGE OF CANA OF GALILEE, AS IT NOW APPEARS.

This photograph of the beautiful village, where Christ performed his first miracle, possesses a special interest. Cana is not far distant from Capernaum and lies on higher ground. The Syrian name by which it is now known is Kifir Kenna. It is a neat little village, on the sunny slope of a hill facing the southwest and surrounded by olive plantations and orchards. The remains of an old Greek church mark the traditional spot where the miracle is said to have been performed.

Inquirer, New Haven, Conn. How will a wicked man converted at the end of his life be placed? Will he have the same privileges as a man who has spent a lifetime in Christ's service?

Very little has been revealed to us about the conditions of life in heaven. It is therefore difficult to conceive of them. It is however reasonable to suppose that the Christian who has served his Lord for many years on earth would be better fitted to appreciate and enjoy the bliss of heaven than he who has lived in sin almost to the last. Christ's parable of the talents (Matt. 25: 14-30), and Paul's remark (1 Cor. 13: 12) imply that there will be differences. But as to places and dignities there, we know nothing.

CHAPTER XVI.

Riches certainly make themselves wings.

A LONGER time had already been spent at the seaside resort than Mrs. Seymour had intended. She was now in her usual health, and though still tormented by anxiety respecting the investigations in England, and was sadly crippled by the payments she had made to the lawyers there, she was very much like her former self. She was now anxious to return to Brookdale and resume her quiet life, and, if possible, secure some suitable employment for Milton which would eke out her reduced income.

Before leaving for Europe Mr. Barclay had offered to execute any commissions for her that she might entrust him with, and Mrs. Seymour, believing him to be a man of undoubted probity and of high intelligence, had confided to him all her story and her hopes of establishing Milton's title to the great estate then in litigation. She also told him the position of the investigations as to Carrie Walter's relationship to her and the search that was being made for the nurse who had been in charge of Carrie and her own child when the latter was accidentally drowned. This information was of more importance to Mr. Barclay than Mrs. Seymour knew. If it really had been her sister's child who was drowned, then, as Mr. Barclay was not slow to perceive, Carrie Walter was Milton's sister, and his chief and, indeed, only rival in her affections was barred from the race.

The young man made careful notes of all the facts, and promised to use his utmost endeavors to fulfil any instructions Mrs. Seymour might send him during his stay abroad. He also privately resolved to investigate on his own account, in the hope of establishing the identity of Carrie as Mrs. Seymour's daughter. He sailed away full of hope and enthusiasm.

His departure seemed the signal for the dispersion of the party. Before the close of the week Mrs. Seymour and Milton were back at Brookdale, and Mr. Price and his daughter had returned to Brooklyn, taking Carrie Walter with them for a visit.

Mrs. Seymour at once began her search for a position for Milton, in which she was aided by her pastor, Dr. Hellings, and her good friend, Mr. Plummer. By their joint efforts Milton secured an appointment in an educational institute in New York, where he was engaged to teach the younger pupils, receiving compensation partly in money and partly in the privilege of attending the higher departments.

A short time after this a financial panic swept like a hurricane over the country, from the busy Atlantic cities to the Pacific slope, carrying down before it business houses that were supposed to have foundations as staunch as a rock. Business men had never known anything approaching to it. Money was so stringent, and the demand for it so great to pay notes and other debts with, that fabulous prices were paid for its use. Men who were worth hundreds of thousands in the morning went to their brown stone palaces in the evening penniless and friendless.

This was particularly the case at the Stock Board, where millions of dollars changed hands every day, where there was the wildest gambling, and the transactions were based, not upon actual sales of stock shares, but were purchases and sales on speculation—mere wagers that the particular stock named would be higher or lower on a given day. The difference between the price at which the stock was sold per share, and the actual selling price upon that given day, was the profit to one and loss to another. Hence the operation was not a legitimate business affair, like buying pork, iron or cotton, but was neither more nor less than gambling; especially when false reports and unlawful means were used to bull or bear—that is, elevate or depress the price of a certain stock to suit the purposes of the wary, and often unscrupulous manipulators.

Several of the young men at the college were boasting of their gains in these stock operations, and one of them, who had made over $1000 in a week, by the fluctuation of a certain stock, asked Milton if he would take a "flyer" on 100 shares of "Reading."

"I want to make some money badly, but I don't understand you, Dibble," replied Milton.

"You don't Mr. Innocent? Ahem! well then, all you have to do is to put up a 'margin' of $500, and sell 100 shares of Reading Railroad stock, deliverable in ten days, say at $45 a share. Now, if in the ten days, Reading shares sink to $40, as they must and will do (if money keeps on getting tighter and tighter every hour), you perceive that, as you sold at $45, and can now buy at $40, therefore you have gained $5 a share, or $500, clear as a whistle, less the trifling commissions, and go home, after lifting your margin, with nearly $1000 in your pocket."

"But, Dibble, I have not one hundred shares of Reading stock to sell," said Milton.

"Bah! man, that makes no difference whatever. Stock speculators seldom buy and sell real stock, don't you know that?"

"Look here, Dibble," continued Milton, gaining light, "suppose the price goes up five dollars a share, instead of down: what happens then?"

"Why, you goose, that's impossible: but if it should advance, your $500 margin would be lost, of course; but you must 'bear' the market like sixty during the ten days: talk against the stock, and depress the price all you possibly can."

"What, whether I know anything against the stock or not?"

"Certainly, Mr. Conscientiousness, you must work for yourself, not for others, and need not be punctilious about observing the 'Golden Rule.'"

"Well, Dibble, not having the margin, I must decline at present. I cannot, however, see that it is honest or right to buy and sell in this way. Perhaps I don't understand the matter, but certainly I cannot follow your advice."

That evening as Milton was going to his boarding-house, he saw an unusual crowd of men with anxious faces passing in and out of the hotels, and he entered one of them and read on a bulletin board that the panic was still raging furiously: several heavy failures having occurred upon that day, and among these was the extensive dry goods firm of "Price, Barclay & Co.," while other large houses were on the brink of bankruptcy!

Milton heard an excited business man telling an acquaintance about the failure. He said that but for the misconduct of a partner, the firm might have managed to ride through the storm, as Mr. Price had an excellent reputation and good credit, as had his partner and main dependence, Mr. Barclay, who was in Europe.

The Co. of the firm was a young man, formerly a salesman, who had been taken in because of his ability to sell goods, not because of his integrity and fitness for that position. His name was Gilchrist, and from the first his proper expenses were more than exceeded by the cost of drinking and other vices, which brought him, he averred, into connection with wealthy men, and gave him opportunities of extending the business of the firm. When he saw other men making large sums by lucky speculations, he had been tempted to "put some money on a sure thing," that he might have funds for dissipation, and he had taken advantage of Mr. Price's absence for a day to secure a large sum from the bank, with which he had embarked in a colossal venture. It had failed, and the firm being unable to retrieve itself, had collapsed.

The heaviest sufferer by the failure was our friend Deacon Walter. The next few weeks were sad ones for him. As the days of suspense passed, the hope he entertained at first that Price, Barclay & Co., would pay a good dividend, declined. His loss would be heavy he found, and then he learned that it would be ruinous. His faithful friend Plummer, hearing of his trouble, went to see him. He found him at the office of his lawyer, trying to devise means to avoid threatened bankruptcy. Other debtors beside Price, Barclay & Co., had failed and the Deacon was heavily hurt. His proud spirit would not bend under the pressure, and he seemed determined to fight through all difficulties, or fall in the effort.

"You can't do it, Deacon," said the usually cheerful, but now sober voice of Mr. Plummer. "To attempt to pay all of your debts, while nobody pays you, will overwhelm you."

"But, Plummer, I owe the debts, that is certain, and common honesty compels me to pay them, and I will sacrifice anything and everything rather than fail to keep my promises."

"That is manly and honorable in you, Walter," said the lawyer, "but it is not justice, either to your creditors or to yourself: because no property can be sold now, except at a fearful loss, and for you to sacrifice it to meet present payments, leaving future ones unprovided for, is unjust. The property, if now sold at a reduced price, will not pay all of your debts; but by waiting till the panic blows over, business will revive, prices advance, and you can then pay everybody in full, and have left a nest egg for future operations. You should call your creditors together at once and make them an offer of forty or fifty cents on the dollar and get them to give you time on the balance."

This advice was acted upon, and the deacon soon called together all parties to whom he owed money, and told them frankly the exact condition of affairs. He first paid off his workmen and hands in full, and then asked and promptly received the extension asked for, shut down his mills until the storm blew over, and awaited the dawning of a more auspicious morning.

The deacon, without a wife to advise or a child to divert him, upon going to his room on that evening, with a heaving breast and heavy heart, looked into the mirror and found that his face was flushed and his eyes were unnaturally bright. The hair around his temples had turned gray, the result of his excitement and trouble for a month past; but of late, so absorbed had he been in money-making, that his devotions had been cold and formal. Instead of formally praying that night he cried unto God for direction and help, and rising from his knees, resolved to follow Christ more humbly and closely thereafter, and cultivate that faith that realizes that all things conduce to the eventual good of God's children.

Mr. Price had not the Deacon's comfort in his adversity. He had never paid any attention to religion, and in his dark days he was without the support that religion alone can give. He was an honest man and he had given up everything he had in the world to his creditors, and deeply regretted that it would go so far short of paying their claims.

His splendid mansion, furniture, and which were bought for him at the sale by a compassionate friend, with which to start in a humbler sphere. They secured a small parlor and two chambers, in a respectable family consisting of Mr. and Mrs.

In his prosperity, Mr. Price was a large shareholder in a Fire Insurance Company, and its President; now, when his shares and stocks had been sold to pay his debts, he gladly accepted a position of clerk in the same office, hoping that he could fulfill its duties, and with his salary, support his family. But it was soon evident that Beside this, a few of his grasping and some with violent abuse. But the poor man had not wherewith to pay, and it was cruel so to persecute him.

Again, many persons came to the descriptions and donations to charitable and church enterprises. They knew of his failure, but they hoped he would continue to contribute to their funds, and it mortified and dispirited him, to be compelled to explain daily, his altered circumstances to the importunate solicitors.

Still worse than this, his son, little Harry, a boy of eight or nine years, while lifting something beyond his strength, injured his hip, and had been unable to walk since, without crutches, with every prospect of being permanently lame. He was a constant care and expense to the family when least able to bear it.

When the Brooklyn mansion was vacated by Mr. Price's family, the best of Nellie's clothing and her personal effects were packed in large boxes, and by permission of the landlord, were stored on the sixth floor of the store formerly occupied by Mr. Price. Now, when Nellie wanted to gain access to the boxes, in order to obtain a few dresses and shawls which she proposed selling, that she might pay the doctor for attending her invalid brother, and to procure little delicacies for him, she could not find her property, nor get any satisfactory information about it. Nobody, after a lapse of six months, seemed to know anything about the boxes, except one porter, who was positive that Mr. Gilchrist, the former partner of Mr. Price, who had brought ruin upon him, had removed them.

When this last supposed recourse failed them, the family were greatly distressed, as a change of residence to a cheaper location became necessary; besides, Nellie must seek employment, to help support the family. No wonder that Mrs. Price, a proud, prayerless woman, was loud in her complaints; but when she arraigned God as unjust, and the author of her sorrows, and daily reproached her husband, and said irritating things to Nellie, Mr. Price's heart seemed to break, and his spirits seemed to fail. Soon after he was stricken down with illness, and passed suddenly away from earth, leaving a bereaved family in great distress and abject poverty.

The insurance company gave Mr. Price a decent burial, and purchased some cheap furniture for the future home of his family. Alas! what a comment upon human greatness!

"There is no use, Nell; we're doomed, and if there be any God, he's preparing even now to curse us finally," exclaimed poor Mrs. Price one sultry September day, as on reviewing their position all hope seemed to be abandoned.

But Nellie's faith never faltered, and like bruising the flowers to obtain the perfume, the lower she seemed to sink in the eyes of the world, the brighter shone forth her faith in God, and the sweeter became her submission to these strange rulings of his providence.

Requests for Prayer.
The Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Nov. 1, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

For the Conversion of Relatives and Friends. "Sorrowful Mother," Valparaiso, Ind., begs for prayer for the conversion of her son, who is away from home and under evil influences.—"Praying Wife and Mother," Hurley, for the conversion of her husband, who is far away from home and living a godless life; also that her only child may become a child of God.—T. C., Pesotum, Ill., for the conversion of a motherless girl who ever had a religious training, and has been led into a sinful life by a heartless man. Her case is a very pitiable one, and as God has promised to hear prayer, the writer begs that prayer may be offered for her.—Sunday School Teacher, Memphis, Tenn., that two night boys who gave promise of being God's servants, but have been drawn aside through worldly surroundings, may give themselves to Christ, and be kept from sin.—A. G. B., Hollister, Cal., for the conversion of a young man who is under the power of sin, and feels himself unable to overcome a strong temptation.—"Anxious," Fredonia, N. Y., that an adopted daughter and her husband, for whose conversion many prayers are offered, may give their hearts to the Saviour.—Believer, Eau Claire, Wis., that her husband and step-child, who are infidels, may be led to see the error of their way and seek and find salvation through Christ.—"One of the Least," Williamsville, Mass., that a dear child, who has wandered far from God, may be brought back, and may be led to forsake sin and seek pardon through Christ.—"Anxious Sister," Ithaca, N. Y., for the conversion of two brothers, one of whom is sceptical and the other intemperate.—S., Red Bud, Ills., on behalf of her son, a child of many prayers, who has been astray through the temptations that assail young men who cannot get employment.—"Anxious Believer," Faucett, Mo., on behalf of four young men who are living in sin, that they may lead them to repentance; also that a dear who is addicted to strong drink may be freed from his bondage and made a new creature in Christ.—"Aged Widow," Centre Point, O., for the conversion of her son and one of his friends who are encouraging each other in evil ways.—"Reader," Greensburg, Pa., that a young man, the only son of Christian parents, who is sunk in sin and degradation, may turn from his evil ways and seek the Lord.—"Distressed Mother," Riner, Va., that her three sons who are breaking their mother's heart by their wicked ways and are enmity with each other, may be led to Christ and be at peace with God and each other.—"One who is Acquainted with Grief," for the conversion of an ungodly husband who is addicted to drink, and for a son who is infidel to his soul's salvation, that both may be saved by the power of the Holy Spirit.—"Mother," Fort Edward, N. Y., for the salvation of her son who is surrounded by fierce temptations.—"J. M. B.," Chatsworth, Can., that a dear brother may be led to give his heart to Christ and to return to the home he has deserted; also, that a dear friend afflicted with an inherited propensity for strong drink may be delivered and be kept through the power of Christ from all evil.—"Sister in Christ," Socorro, N. M., for the conversion of her husband and a dear brother, who might do much for the Master's cause if they were his servants.—"Constant Reader," Brooklyn, N. Y., that a dear boy who is homesick, friendless and penniless through falling under the power of intoxicating drink may not despair but seek forgiveness from God and be restored.—"Mother," Salt Lake City, Utah, for the conversion of two sons and a daughter who are all indifferent to the welfare of their souls.—"M. J. C.," Brevard, N. C., that two dear sons may be saved by the power of Christ.—"Mother," Rocky Point, Cal., that a son who is away from home seeking employment may be kept from sin and made a child of God; also for the conversion of a daughter who is not concerned about her eternal welfare.—E. L., Chicago, Ill., on behalf of her husband and an unconverted brother, both of them of good moral character, unconscious of the need of a Saviour, that they may be led to seek Christ.—Reader, Wheeling, W. Va., for the conversion of the father of a family who is under a delusion about his spiritual condition, and is neglecting the education of his family.—Reader, Buxton, Me., for the conversion of a beloved daughter.—M. E., Quincy, Ill., that three dear brothers may be saved.—Reader, Doon, N. J., that a bright young man who has been a patient in the Keeley Institute, and has gone back to the drink, may seek in Christ the power to resist temptation.—Reader, Saline Co., Mo., for the conversion of a wayward boy who is away from home and exposed to severe temptation; also that a brother and a sister-in-law may be brought to Christ and may have the grace to train their little ones for God.—Believer, Corry, that two children may be converted.

For the Restoration of Health. E. G. Pulaski, O., asks prayer for the recovery of her mother and brother who have been stricken with paralysis.—Believer, Princeton, Neb., for the recovery of a mother from a painful disease of the eyes.—Anxious Mother, Evansville, Ind., on behalf of an afflicted son and daughter, that both may be healed in body and mind.—Reader, Hammond, La., for the recovery of a beloved sister.—Invalid, Long Branch, N. J., that her husband may be restored to health.—Subscriber, Fairland, Mich., for the recovery of a mother whose little children sorely need her care.—Friend, Washington, S. C., that a dear son-in-law, who has long been a sufferer, may be restored to health.—Widowed Mother, Tenn., for the recovery of her only child, whose malady is a puzzle to the physicians, that the dear Lord would raise her up.—Believer, Atlantic, Iowa, that a mother who has long been an invalid may regain her health and be able to attend to the bringing up of her young family.—Subscriber, Altoona, Pa., who has a young family dependent on him, asks that prayers may again be offered for his recovery, as they were some weeks ago.—L. L. Philadelphia, Pa., that God would restore to her and her mother the sense of hearing, which they sorely miss.—Believer, Hannibal, O., that a sister who is very sick may be healed by the Great Physician.—One Who Tries, Bridgeport, O., that a beloved one may recover from a most distressing affliction.—Friend, Wilsonville, Ont., for the recovery of one of God's children, who, after a Christian life of thirty years, has fallen a victim to melancholia, and fears that her soul will be lost; she is greatly distressed, and prayers are earnestly asked that her reason may not give way.

For Special Troubled Husband asks Blessings. prayer that his wife, who is separated from him because of a difference of opinion, may soon be reconciled and return.—"Praying Mother," Lancaster, Pa., that her husband, who is an earnest Christian, may receive the help he needs in his business, and that his financial difficulties may be relieved.—S. P. L., Norwich, N. Y., that strength may be given according to the need.—L. M., Hammondsport, N. Y., that such financial help may be given as will prevent the loss of a home and the eviction of an aged Christian mother.—"Pastor," Brownsville, Pa., that God would make him a blessing to his people, and that he may be faithful to his duty and have the help of God in his work.—"Believer," Kirwin, Kan., that God would send help so that he may be enabled to meet heavy obligations which are pressing heavily.—Reader, that God would grant the needed strength to overcome a besetting sin.—Reader, Maxwell, Ont., that God would bless the efforts of his people in Toronto who are trying to prevent the desecration of the Lord's day.—Sad-Hearted Faith, Georgia, that God would mercifully interpose on behalf of a man who is charged with crime and is liable to suffer because the only witnesses are interested in the suppression of the truth.

Persons desiring the prayers of the Converts' Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission should address their letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 91-102 Bible House, New York.

Blindness Prevented.
THE ABSORPTION TREATMENT A SUCCESS.
The New York Observer says: "In the absorption treatment we find the most successful and humane method of treating diseased eyes or weakened vision ever devised. It is a boon to the suffering humanity, hundreds having been successfully treated at the Bemis Sanitarium for diseases of the eyes often said to be incurable, without the knife or risk, and as the treatment assists Nature to do its own work without the use of drugs, the patients feel that a new lease of life as well as eyesight has been given them. Among the grateful patients we find the Rev. B. N. Palmer, D.D., of New Orleans, La., well known to our readers. Dr. Palmer, some two years ago, noticed his eyesight failing, and consulted Dr. Knapp, of New York, and Dr. Pope, of New Orleans, who diagnosed the case as atrophy. After being under treatment one year, they pronounced his case hopeless and further treatment was abandoned. On July 24th, 1896, one eye being nearly sightless and the other failing, he consulted E. H. Bemis, Eye Specialist, of the Glens Falls, N. Y., Sanitarium, remarking that he had 'nothing to lose, and a great deal to gain,' as cataracts were forming which would make blindness sure, and the little sight left was only available with the aid of a strong magnifying glass. On Sept. 7th, six weeks after commencing the absorption treatment, the strong lens had been laid aside, and the glasses discarded years ago now enable him to read again, to the great surprise of himself and friends."
"In order to bring before the public the advantages of the absorption treatment, which does away with all risk in treating the eyes, and furnishes a home treatment which can be safely used at the patient's home when it is impossible to visit the Sanitarium, we would state that a valuable pamphlet will be forwarded to any address free, and should be read in every family, as it gives the cause of failing eyesight and diseased eyes, how prevented and cured. The rapid increase in the number of persons who are becoming blind and relying upon artificial aids to see, demands a treatment which will reach the cause."

SAPOLIO

WAITING, LOOKING, HOPING.

I am waiting for the morning
For the portals of the city,
Where none ever sigh or grieve,
Where the walls are built of jasper,
Where the streets are paved with gold,
Where the mansions glow with splendor
That to mortals is untold;
I am waiting, I am waiting,
In the darkness and the cold.

I am looking for the dawning
Of the day when, ever free,
I can leave behind my troubles,
And my Saviour's beauties see,
When I shall to sin and sorrow
In this valley bid adieu,
And mount home to endless glory
With the holy and the true;
I am looking, I am looking,
Others here are looking too.

I am hoping for the hour
When I shall from earth depart,
Hoping that my blessed Saviour
Then will cheer my fainting heart,
And that when the surging waters
In their fury 'round me roll,
He will point me home to heaven,
Bright and blissful Christian goal;
I am hoping, I am hoping, —
Jesus come and cheer my soul!

Armenians at the Bowery Mission.

On Saturday night, November 1st, the Bowery Mission received food and shelter to twenty-four Armenian exiles, who were en route to places of employment in distant states. They were attentive listeners at the Mission service. They understood very little of the language, yet they knew the speakers were talking of Jesus. Superintendent Wyburn stayed with them until midnight and became thoroughly acquainted with them. Nearly all could read a little English, and he presented each of them with a New Testament. They kept him busy listening while they read. One Armenian lad had a picture of the Saviour, and they gathered around him, and pointing upward, whispered the sacred name, Jesus. They gave the Mission leaders to understand that they loved him, for whom so many of their dear ones at home had already offered up their lives.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION

The Companion of the Whole Family.

The list of those who will contribute to THE YOUTH'S COMPANION during the coming year is, as usual, long and brilliant. It includes not only popular writers of fiction, but also some of the most eminent naval officers, travellers and explorers, men of science and statesmen.

Life and Work at Washington.

When Mr. Gladstone was Prime Minister he contributed to THE COMPANION, as did Mr. Blaine when Secretary of State. All the members of the present American Cabinet but three, have written for its columns. During the coming year the following features of national work will be described by members of the national government:

EARLY DAYS OF THE POST-OFFICE, HON. WM. L. WILSON, Postmaster-Gen'l.
BUILDING A WAR-SHIP, HON. HILARY A. HERBERT, Secretary Navy.
WHAT THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL DOES, HON. JUDSON HARMON.
THE LIFE OF A SENATOR, HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE.
THE LIFE OF A CONGRESSMAN, HON. THOMAS B. REED.

For Ambitious Boys.

THE HABIT OF THRIFT, Andrew Carnegie.
BECOMING A DOCTOR, Dr. Austin Flint.
HOW LINCOLN EDUCATED HIMSELF, Jesse W. Weik.
FORESTRY AS A PROFESSION, Gifford Pinchot.
THE LARGEST SALARIES, Carroll D. Wright.

For Ambitious Girls.

TRAINING THE VOICE, Madame Lillian Nordica.
A GIRL WHO BECAME FAMOUS, Mrs. Burton Harrison.
NURSING AS A CAREER, Dr. W. L. Love.
MARRIAGE SETTLEMENTS, Elizabeth Bisland.
FLOWER-GROWING FOR PROFIT, Rene Bache.

Popular Writers for 1897.

In addition to twenty-five staff writers, THE COMPANION Contributors include not only the most popular writers of fiction, but some of the most eminent Statesmen, Scientists, Travellers and Musicians.

Ian Maclaren. Geo. W. Smalley. Hon. Theodore Roosevelt. The Marquis of Lorne.
Rudyard Kipling. Harold Frederic. Col. George E. Waring, Jr. Lady Jeune.
Hall Caine. Hamlin Garland. Dr. Carl Schurz. Lady Harcourt.

REV. W. H. MILBURN, THE BLIND CHAPLAIN, OPENING THE U. S. SENATE WITH PRAYER. (See page 177.)

Young Men Challenged to Nobility.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: II. Kings 6: 17: . . .

"And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man."

ONE morning, in Dothan, a young theological student was scared by finding himself and Elisha the prophet, upon whom he waited, surrounded by a whole army of enemies. But venerable Elisha was not scared at all, because he saw the mountains full of defence for him, in chariots made of fire, drawn by horses of fire—a supernatural appearance that could not be seen with the natural eye. So the old minister prayed that the young minister might see them also, and the prayer was answered, and the Lord opened the eyes of the young man, and he also saw the fiery procession, looking somewhat, I suppose, like the Adirondacks or the Alleghanies in autumnal resplendence.

Many young men, standing among the most tremendous realities, have their eyes half shut or entirely closed. May God grant that my sermon may open wide your eyes to your safety, your opportunity, and your destiny!

A mighty defence for a young man is a good home. Some of my hearers look back with tender satisfaction to their early home. It may have been rude and rustic, hidden among the hills, and architect or upholsterer never planned or adorned it. But all the fresco on princely walls never looked so enticing to you as those rough-hewn rafters. You can think of no park or arbor of trees planted on fashionable country-seat so attractive as the plain brook that ran in front of the old farmhouse and sang under the weeping willows. No barred gateway, adorned with statue of bronze, and swung open by obsequious porter in full dress, has half the glory of the old swing gate. Many of you have a second dwelling-place, your adopted home, that also is sacred forever. There you built the first family altar. There your children were born. All those trees you planted. That room is solemn, because once in it, over the hot pillow, flapped the wing of death. Under that roof you expect, when your work is done, to lie down and die. You try with many words to tell the excellency of the place, but you fail. There is only one word in the language that can describe your mean-

Now, I declare it, that young man is contented with what he has, and looks out into the world with a charm like this upon him. The memory of parental solicitude, watching him grow up, and praying for him, is a great blessing. I never knew a man faithful both to his early and adopted home, who at the same time was given over to dissipation, or indulgence in wickedness. He who seeks his enjoyment chiefly from outside association, rather than from the more quiet and unpresumptuous life of home, is a man who is never happy. I never knew a man who, after he had left his father's house, and his death of shame. If you seem unnecessarily isolated from your kindred and former associates, is there not some room that you can call your own? Into it gather books and pictures, and a harp. Have a good fire, and a good bed. And let the mirth stand back from the threshold. Let the tears stand back from the door of prayer. By the memory of other days, a father's counsel, and a mother's love, and Another defence for a young man is industrious habits. Many young men, in starting upon life in this age, expect to make their way through the world by the use of their wits rather than the toil of their hands. A boy now goes to the city and fails twice before he is as old as his father was when he first saw the spires of the great town. Sitting in some office, rented at a thousand dollars a year, he is waiting for the bank to declare its dividend, or goes into the market expecting before night to be made rich by the rushing up of the stocks. But luck seemed so dull he resolved on some other tack. Perhaps he borrowed from his employer's money drawer, and forgets to put it back, or for merely the purpose of improving his penmanship, makes a copy-plate of a merchant's signature. Never mind; all is right in trade. In some dark night there may come in his dreams a vision of the penitentiary; but it soon vanishes. In a short time he will be ready to retire from the busy world, and amid his flocks and herds cultivate the domestic virtues. Then those young men who once were his schoolmates, and knew no better than to engage in honest work, will come with their ox-teams to draw him logs, and with their hard hands to help heave up his castle. This is no fancy picture. It is every-day life. I should not wonder if there were some rotten beams in that beautiful palace. I should not wonder if dire sickness should smite through the young man, or if God should pour into his cup of life a draught that would thrill him with unbearable agony; if his children should become to him a living curse, making his home a pest and a disgrace. I should not wonder if he goes to a miserable grave, and beyond it into the gnashing of teeth. The way of the ungodly shall perish.

My young friends, there is no way to genuine success, except through toil, either of head or hand. At the battle of Crecy, in 1346, the Prince of Wales, finding himself heavily pressed by the enemy, sent word to his father for help. The father, watching the battle from a windmill, and seeing his son was not wounded and could gain the day if he would, sent word, "No, I will not come. Let the boy win his spurs, for, if God will, I desire that this day be his with all its honors." Young man, fight your own battle, all through, and you shall have the victory. Oh, it is a battle worth fighting! Two monarchs of old fought a duel, Charles V. and Francis, and the stakes were kingdoms, Milan and Burgundy. You fight with sin, and the stake is heaven or hell.

Do not get the fatal idea that you are a genius, and that, therefore, there is no need of close application. It is here where multitudes fail. The curse of this age is the geniuses: men with enormous self-conceit and egotism, and nothing else. I had rather be an ox than an eagle; plain and plodding and useful, rather than high-flying and good for nothing but to pick out the eyes of carcasses. Extraordinary capacity without work is extraordinary failure. There is no hope for that person who begins life resolved to live by his wits, for the probability is that he has not any. It was not safe for Adam, even in his unfallen state, to have nothing to do, and therefore, God commanded him to be a husband and a father. He was to dress the garden and keep it, and had he and been at work, they would not have been sauntering under the trees and hankering after that fruit which destroyed them and their posterity; a proof positive for all ages to come that those who do not attend to their business are sure to get into mischief.

I do not know that the prodigal in Scripture would ever have been reclaimed had he not given up his idle habits and gone to feeding swine for a living. The devil does not so often attack the man who is busy with the pen, and the book, and the trowel, and the saw, and the hammer. He is afraid of those weapons. But woe to the man whom this roaring lion meets with his hands in his pockets!

Do not demand that your toil always be elegant and cleanly, and refined. There is a certain amount of drudgery through which we must all pass, whatever be our occupation. You know how men are sentenced a certain number of years to prison, and after they have suffered and worked out the time, then they are allowed to go free. So it is with all of us. God passed on us the sentence: "By the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread." We must endure our time of drudgery, and then, after awhile, we will be allowed to go into comparative liberty. We must be willing to endure the sentence. We all know what drudgery is connected with the beginning of any trade or profession; but this does not continue all our lives, if it be the student's, or the merchant's, or the mechanic's life. I know you have at the beginning many a hard time, but after awhile those things will become easy. You will be your own master. God's sentence will be satisfied. You will be discharged from prison.

Bless God that you have a brain to think, and hands to work, and feet to walk with, for in your constant activity, O young man, is one of your strongest defences. Put your trust in God and do your best. That child had it right when the horses ran away with the load of wood and he sat on it. When asked if he was frightened, he said: "No, I prayed to God and hung on like a beaver."

Respect for the Sabbath will be to the young man another preservative against evil. God has thrust into the toil and fatigue of life a recreative day, when the soul is especially to be fed. It is no new-fangled notion of a wild-brained reformer, but an institution established at the beginning. God has made natural and moral laws so harmonious that the body as well as the soul demands this institution. Our bodies are seven-day clocks, that must be wound up as often as that, or they will run down. Failure must come sooner or later to the man who breaks the Sabbath. Inspiration has called it the Lord's Day, and he who devotes it to the world is guilty of robbery. God will not let the sin go unpunished either in this world or the world to come.

This is the statement of a man who has broken this Divine enactment: "I was engaged in manufacturing on the Lehigh River. On the Sabbath I used to rest, but never regarded God in it. One beautiful Sabbath when the noise was all hushed, and the day was all that loveliness could make it, I sat down on my piazza, and went to work inventing a new shuttle. I neither stopped to eat nor drink till the sun went down. By that time I had the invention completed. The next morning I exhibited it, and boasted of my day's work, and was applauded. The shuttle was tried, and worked well, but that Sabbath day's work cost me thirty thousand dollars. We branched out and enlarged, and the curse of heaven was upon me from that day onward."

While the Divine frown must rest upon him who tramples upon this statute, God's special favor will be upon that young man who scrupulously observes it. This day, properly observed, will throw a hallowed influence over all the week. The song and sermon and sanctuary will hold back from presumptuous sins. That young man who begins the duties of life with either secret or open disrespect to the holy day, I venture to prophesy, will meet with no permanent successes. God's curse will fall upon his ship, his store, his office, his studio, his body, and his soul. The way of the wicked he turneth upside down. In one of the old fables it was said that a wonderful child was born in Bagdad, and a magician could hear his footsteps six thousand miles away. But I can hear in the footstep of that young man on his way to the house of worship to-day the step not only of a lifetime of usefulness, but the oncoming step of eternal ages of happiness yet millions of years away.

A noble ideal and confident expectation of approximating to it are an infallible defence. The artist completes in his mind the great thought that he wishes to transfer to the canvas or the marble before he takes up the crayon or the chisel. The architect plans out the entire structure before he orders the workmen to begin, and though there may for a long while seem to be nothing but blundering and rudeness, he has in his mind every Corinthian wreath and Gothic arch and Byzantine capital. The poet arranges the entire plot before he begins to chime the first canto of tingling rhythms. And yet strange to say, there are men who attempt to build their character without knowing whether in the end it shall be a rude Tar tar's tent or a St. Mark's of Venice—men who begin to write the intricate poem of their lives without knowing whether it shall be a Homer's "Odyssey" or a rhymester's botch. Nine hundred and ninety-nine men out of a thousand are living without any great life-plot. Booted and spurred and plumed, and urging their swift courser in the hottest haste, I ask "Hollo, man whither away?" His response is, "Nowhere." Rush into that busy shop or store of many a one, and taking the plane out of the man's hand or laying down the yard-stick, say: "What man, is all this about, so much stir and sweat?" The reply will stumble and break down between teeth and lips. Every day's duty ought only to be the filling up of the main plan of existence. Let men be consistent. If they prefer misdeeds to correct courses of action, then let them draw out the design of knavery and cruelty and plunder. Let every day's falsehood and wrongdoing be added as coloring to the picture. Let bloody deeds red-stripe the picture, and the clouds of a wrathful God hang down heavily over the canvas, ready to break out in clamorous tempest. Let the waters be chafed and froth-tangled, and green with immeasurable depths. The take a torch of burning pitch and score into the frame the right name for it—the soul's suicide. If one entering upon his life's journey would only, in his mind on paper, draw out in awful reality the dreadful future, he would recoil from it and say: "Am I a Dante, that by my own life I should write another 'Inferno'?" But if you are resolved to live a life such as God and good men will approve, do not let it be a vague dream, an indefinite determination, but, in your mind or upon paper, sketch it in all its minutiae. You cannot know the changes to which you may be subject, but you may know what always will be right and always will be wrong. Let gentleness and charity and veracity and faith stand in the heart of the sketch. On some still brook's bar make a lamb and lion lie down together. Draw two or three of the trees of life, no frost-stricken, nor ice-glazed, nor winnipped, but with thick verdure waving like the palms of heaven. On the darkest cloud place the rainbow, that pillow of the dying storm. You need not print the title on the frame. The dullest will catch the design at a glance, and say, "That's the road to heaven." Ah, me! On the sea of life, what innumerable ships, heavily laden and well-rigged, yet seem bound for no port! Swept every whither of wind and wave, they go up by the mountain and they go down by the valleys, and are their wits' end. They sail by no chart, they watch no star, they long for no harbor.

I beg every young man to-day to draw out a sketch of what, by the grace of God, he means to be. Think no excellence so high that you cannot reach it. He who starts out in life with a high ideal of character, and faith in its attainment, will find himself encased from a thousand temptations. There are magnificent possibilities before each of you young men of the stout heart, and the buoyant step, and the bounding spirit. I would marshal you for grand achievement. God now provides for you the field and the armor and the fortifications. Who is on the Lord's side? A captain in ancient times, to encourage his men against the immense odds on the side of their enemies, said: "Come, my men, look these fellows in the face. They are six thousand, you are three hundred. Surely the match is even." That speech gave them the victory. Be not, my hearers, dismayed at any time by what seems an immense odds against you. Is fortune, is want of education, are men, are devils against you, though the multitudes of earth and hell confront you, stand up to the charge. With a million against you the match is just even. Nay, you have a decided advantage. If God be for us, who can be against us? Thus protected, you need not spend much time in answering your assailants.

Many years ago word came to me that two impostors, as temperance lecturers, had been speaking in Ohio, in various places, and giving their experience, and they told their audience that they had long been intimate with me, and had become drunkards by dining at my table, where I always had liquors of all sorts. Indignant to the last degree, I went down to Patrick Campbell, Chief of Brooklyn Police, saying that I was going to start that night for Ohio to have those villains arrested, and I wanted him to tell me how to make the arrest. He smiled and said: "Do not waste your time by chasing these men. Go home and do your work, and they can do you no harm." I took his counsel, and all was well. Long ago I made up my mind that if one will put his trust in God and be faithful to duty, he need not fear any evil. Have God on your side, young man, and all the combined forces of earth and hell can do you no damage.

And this leads me to say that the mightiest defence for a young man is the possession of religious principle. Nothing can take the place of it. He may have manners that would put to shame the gracefulness and courtesy of a Lord Chesterfield. Foreign languages may drop from his tongue. He may be able to discuss literature, and laws, and foreign customs. He may wield a pen of unequalled polish and power. His quickness and tact may qualify him for the highest salary of the counting-house. He may be as sharp as Herod and as strong as Samson, with as fine locks as those which hung Absalom, still he is not safe from contamination. The more elegant his manner, and the more fascinating his dress, the more peril. Satan does not care for the allegiance of a cowardly and illiterate being. He cannot bring him into efficient service. But he loves to storm that castle of character which has in it the most spoils and treasures. It was not some crazy craft creeping along the coast with a valueless cargo that the pirate attacked, but the ship, full-winged and flagged, plying between great ports, carrying its millions of specie. The more your natural and acquired accomplishments, the more need of the religion of Jesus. That does not cut in upon or hack up any smoothness of disposition or behavior. It gives symmetry. It arrests that in the soul which ought to be arrested, and propels that which ought to be propelled. It fills up the gulleys. It elevates and transforms. To beauty it gives more beauty, to tact more tact, to enthusiasm of nature more enthusiasm.

When the Holy Spirit impresses the image of God on the heart he does not spoil the canvas. If in all the multitudes of young men upon whom religion has acted you could find one nature that had been the least damaged, I would yield this proposition.

You may now have enough strength of character to repel the various temptations to gross wickedness which assail you, but I do not know in what strait you may be thrust at some future time. Nothing short of the grace of the Cross may then be able to deliver you from the lions. You are not meeker than Moses nor holier than David, nor more patient than Job, and you ought not to consider yourself invulnerable. You may have some weak point of character that you have never discovered, and in some hour when you are unsuspecting the Philistines will be upon thee. Samson. Trust not in your good habits, or your early training, or your pride of character: nothing short of the arm of Almighty God will be sufficient to uphold you. Your greatest want in all the world is a new heart. In God's name I tell you that.

I would like to see some of you this hour press out of the ranks of the world and lay your conquered spirit at the feet of Jesus. This hour is no wandering vagabond staggering over the earth, it is a winged messenger of the skies whispering mercy to thy soul. Life is smooth now, but after awhile it may be rough, wild, and precipitate. There comes a crisis in the history of every man. We seldom understand that turning point until it is far past. The road of life is forked, and I read on two sign-boards: "This is the way to happiness." "This is the way to ruin." How apt we are to pass the fork of the road without thinking whether it comes out at the door of bliss or the gates of darkness.

Many years ago I stood on the anniversary platform with a minister of Christ who made this remarkable statement: "Thirty years ago two young men started out in the evening to attend the Park Theatre, New York, where a play was to be acted in which the cause of religion was to be placed in a ridiculous and hypocritical light. They came to the steps. The consciences of both smote them. One started to go home, but returned again to the door, and yet had not courage to enter, and finally departed. But the other young man entered the pit of the theatre. It was the turning-point in the history of these two young men. The man who entered was caught in the whirl of temptation. He sank deeper and deeper in infamy; he was lost. That other young man was saved, and he now stands before you to bless God that for twenty years he has been permitted to preach the Gospel."

"Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth; but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment."

In the Land of the Incas.

Last Remnants of the Famous Race that once Ruled Central America—An Inca Church and Hamlet—A Paraguayan Idol.

W O thousand miles or more to the westward of the Atlantic Coast of South America, clinging to the spur of the majestic Andes, are remarkable relics of the ancient and powerful Incas. These relics show the decay of art and originality in the human race in that part of the globe. At Colon, Peru, stands what is undoubtedly the only remaining "Temple of the Sun" on the continent—a monument to the noble people by whom it was built, and concerning whom there is only a legendary record. To this temple come at regular periods a few pure-blooded descendants of the Incas. These Indians still cling to the ancient relics and rituals of their forefathers. A regular yearly pilgrimage is made to the Temple, for the purpose of celebrating the festivals of their religion, as was done a thousand years or more ago, at "The Holy Inca City," Cuzco. Then they came from the farthest borders of their domain, but to-day, the little handful of "Children of the Sun" are within easy access of the only remaining Inca hamlet and its holy sanctuary. The Inca photographs on this page are of rare interest, showing a section of the Inca hamlet with a group of the villagers and the exterior of the Inca Temple. Before many years the last vestige of this once magnificent but now dying race, will have vanished from the earth.

South America has been truthfully called the "Neglected Continent," the appellation having reference to its moral as well as its intellectual state. It has not by any means kept pace with the rest of the world. Yet some of its governments are much more progressive than others and this is especially true of Chili and Brazil. In a majority of South American countries the influence of the Roman religion, almost universally predominant there, has been distinctly adverse to education. A correspondent, Mr. King, who has lately traveled much in South America and has had excellent opportunities for observation, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows: "The Romanism of South America, compared with that of more enlightened countries of the present day, must, I think, be very like the old heathen worship as it might have existed in some remote mountain hamlet, where rude images would be worshipped with ruder rites by rustics who had half forgotten or never understood their original meaning. The nearest approach to this peculiar element, of all others seen on the Southern hemisphere, was among the Paraguayans, a people who have an air of languid gentleness and graceful figures, whose women are lustrous-eyed with thick tresses of jetty blackness, and a style of beauty that harmonizes with the brilliant flowers and sunny skies of their native land. Like the flowers, the loveliness of the Paraguayan women soon fades and, having little or no education or accomplishments to make them interesting, their charms are soon gone forever. These people are Nido-Spanish in blood and descended from tribes which inhabited the country before the conquest. They still retain the aboriginal tongue, Gharani, now a written language of about four hundred words, instead of adopting the language of their conquerors.

Their favorite idol is a poor wooden-looking figure seated on a half-moon, crowned with stars and dressed in tinsel and paltry finery, and she is worshipped and feted. Except in salutation the name of the Lord is never heard. It came into my mind one day to ask one of the worshippers, who made the world and all things else, and without hesitation came the answer, "La Virgine Maria." At a stated time and place, each year, a great feast is appointed and pilgrimages are made to it from great distances, considering the rough roads.

This fiesta is always the occasion of a great love-feast and jubilee, lasting several days. One of the photographs on this page shows the Virgin and Child, being the subject of the image worship mentioned. The figures are almost covered with gilt decoration and are calculated, by the display of tinsel and finery, to attract the widest attention and inspire awe in the minds of the ignorant country people.

Paraguayans are peaceful, simple people, fond of flowers and fetes. They belong to a warlike race, but the warrior element has long since disappeared, and they prefer peace to the excitements of battle and are fairly content with their lot. Although religious liberty now prevails in their country, their subservience to the priests is so recent that years must pass before the prevailing traditions and superstitions lose their hold upon the popular mind.

Solomon's Sin.

Sunday School Lesson for December 6.
1 Kings 11: 4-13. Golden Text: 1 Cor. 10: 12.
By Mrs. M. Baxter.

LET him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." (1 Cor. 10: 12.) No man of Old Testament times ever had a better opportunity than Solomon. He was favored and plenty were his portion. Endued by God, at his own request, with wisdom to a degree which was without precedent, favored by special manifestations of God, commanding a world-wide reputation for piety and for wisdom: every advantage possible was his which could tend to make him walk with God—and yet he failed! What a lesson it is to us that the richest gifts of God and the most favorable circumstances, cannot make human nature other than the fallen thing it is! What then becomes of all the

of human nature, of which so many writers speak, so many religious teachers boast? If a Solomon, who wrote such strong words to warn the young men of his time against impurity fell into this very sin, although he was wiser than all men, what becomes of human wisdom as a safeguard from sin? He warned his son against "the evil woman" . . . the flattery of the strange woman, and said: "Lust not after her beauty in thine heart; neither let her take thee with her eyelids." (Prov. 6: 24, 25), and yet "Solomon loved many strange women!" (1 Kings 11: 1). The king sinned with his eyes open; he could never say it was in ignorance, and that he had been betrayed into it unawares. Speaking of this sin in others, he says, "Can a man take fire into his bosom and his clothes not be burned? Can one go upon hot coals and his feet not be burned?" Yet of the strange women of the surrounding nations whom, contrary to the express command of God, he took to him, it is stated, "Solomon clave unto these in love." (1 Kings 11: 2).

Probably Solomon counted on his wisdom and ceased to be dependent upon God. Probably in the days of his glory he would think in his heart, "There is no danger for me to do what a man less wise could not do without danger." Thinking he stood should fall. Sin has a strange, fascinating power. Our Lord Jesus expresses it in the words, "Whoever committeth sin is the servant of sin" (John 8: 34). Just as the intoxicating drink takes possession of until a thousand years have elapsed. Just as Solomon was placed in circumstances so favorable in their advantage for the service of God, so will be the inhabitants of the world during the thousand years' reign of Christ. Yet, even in the millennium, unconverted human nature will be unable to stand as soon as temptation arises! All the influence of the external reign of righteousness will not change fallen human nature. Only a new birth, another nature, which is from above, and which is "born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John 1: 13) can make fallen man righteous.

Solomon's heart was "not perfect with the Lord his God, as was the heart of David his father." (1 Kings 11: 4.) David also sinned, sinned grievously; but the broken and contrite heart, which returned to the God from whom he had wandered, manifested in his psalms a constantly increasing acquaintance with, and appreciation of, his God, which does not appear in any of the writings of Solomon. There is profound wisdom in the Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, and they have their precious place in God's Word, but they do not bring us into the presence of our God, and open unto us the very heart of Jesus, as do the Psalms of David. Solomon speaks of the foolishness of sin, but David of the sinfulness of sin; Solomon sees the vanity of things, David the corruption of his own heart; Solomon's hopes in all that he could be and could have were blighted; all was vanity and vexation of spirit; David lost hope in himself but his hope was ever fresh in the Lord his God; God filled David's heart, therefore his heart was perfect with the Lord his God.

And so we have the pitiable picture of this wisest of men falling into superstitions of which any man of ordinary common sense could see the folly. He whose fame concerning the name of the Lord had attracted men of all nations to come to him as the great preacher of his time, "went after Ashtoreth, the goddess of the Zidonians, and after Milcom or Molech the abomination of the Ammonites!" It was but a little step from this first disobedience to God under the influence of the forbidden wives which he had taken, to go a step further, to the dishonor of his God, and to his own shame, the very Solomon who had built the beautiful temple, and had prayed, as the father of his people, that God would place his name there, went the length of building a high place, a rival temple for Chemosh the abomination of Moab, in the hill that is before Jerusalem, and for Molech the abomination of the children of Ammon! "And likewise did he before all his strange wives, which have caused him to do wickedness against the Lord his God." Once yielding to them at the cost of his own honor, he could not stop. He was on an inclined plane, and his end is left untold.

Fallen Solomon! Consider the lilies how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin, and yet I say unto you that even Solomon in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these. "All flesh is grass, and all the glory of men as the flower of grass. The grass withereth and the flower thereof fadeth away." (1 Pet. 1: 24). Solomon in his falling away

"And the Lord was angry with Solomon, because he had not kept the covenant which the Lord his God commanded him to keep: and the Lord said unto him twice, 'When the Lord Jesus he kept not that which the Lord commanded him, he would establish his kingdom.

if he, on his part, would walk in his ways as David walked, and keep his commandments. But now, the Lord, without appearing to him, said unto him, 'Forasmuch as this is done of thee . . . I will surely rend the kingdom from thee, and will give it to thy servant.' And then he said in his forbearing mercy that it should not be in his days, but those of his son, and that one tribe should still be left for David's sake and Jerusalem. But Solomon had peace no more, God against him, enemies also were stirred up against him: Hadad, Rezon, Jeroboam disturbed his once peaceful reign, his glory and his power departed with his declining faithfulness to God; his popularity also, and the name of Solomon is now as much associated with his fall as with former glory. What a lesson on earthly glory! Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the use of Sunday School Teachers.

ASAD picture is presented in the lesson. The courtly writer of Chronicles is silent about it, but the writer of Kings is too honest and too spiritual to pass over the shame and sin which eclipsed the glory of Solomon's reign. He says the King's heart was not perfect; his wives were able to turn it away from God. After the long and glowing description of Solomon's glory, he opens a stained page with the ominous, "But." The beginning of the trouble was in the heart. That is where declension always begins. Solomon had bitter, personal reason for giving the caution, "Keep thine heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life." His first overt sign of declension was in a concession to his foreign wives. At first, he appears to have been very scrupulous in this matter. We learn from 11 Chron. 8: 11 that he would not let the daughter of Pharaoh live in the City of David because it was holy and her presence would have been a profanation. But later, in the broad tolerance that a man whose heart is not wholly with his God is apt to show toward error, Solomon seems to have consented that his Tyrian wife should worship Ashtoreth, or Astarte, as she had been accustomed to do. A more prudent man, making such a concession, would have taken care that an innovation so offensive to his people, should be as private and unostentatious as possible. But having yielded so far, the lady would probably have little difficulty in cajoling her amorous husband to provide a temple of a splendor befitting his wealth.

Accordingly, the license to Astarte ascended from the Mount of Olives, where it could be seen from the very doors of the Temple. This was peculiarly offensive, because the worship of Astarte often included licentious rites. She is believed to have represented the moon, or queen of heaven, and to have been the female divinity corresponding with Baal the sun-god. Jealousy in the Tyrian wife would have been easily kindled. Solomon's Moabite wife would be no less so. The Tyrian wife, so the same privilege as the Tyrian wife. So a shrine was raised where she could worship Chemosh. Then the Ammonite wife had to be satisfied, and an altar was set up to Molech, the cruel god who was believed to require the sacrifice of children. How many more women there were worshipping heathen deities, under Solomon's auspices, we are not told, but these were enough to bring down the indignation of God. Solomon was in the harassed condition in which many a man has found himself since his time, in which he cannot do what he believes to be right without involving himself in a quarrel with a godless woman, whom he loves. The writer Kings, according to his custom, shows that the evil was the result of disobedience to an explicit command of God. Solomon violated not only the injunction against marrying heathen women, but the prohibition against multiplying wives. It is probable that the extent of the violation in the latter case was not so great as stated in our edition of the Kings. It is little likely that Jerusalem afforded sufficient accommodation for seven hundred queens. The number is likely to be a copyist's error, and should be seventy instead of seven hundred. An expression Solomon's Song (6: 8) confirms this view. That perfect poem shows there was at least one woman in Israel who was not dazzled by Solomon's splendor, but preferred a virtuous home with a humble husband to the tainted glory of a king's harem.

His heart was not perfect. A great preacher compares the heart to a cistern. "You have seen," he says, "one of those great reservoirs from which through innumerable pipes the water is carried to sprinkle the streets and supply thousands of houses for culinary and cleansing purposes. Well, the heart is a reservoir of the human body. Arteries and veins carry the blood to and from the heart and every part of the body is in connection with it. If the heart does not perform its functions, if it is diseased the whole body suffers, for its supply of nourishment is tainted. So the heart stands in the spiritual sense. Get the heart right and there is right thinking, a benevolent hand and a foot ready to run on a good business. But when the heart is wrong the eye is lustful the tongue lying and profane and the hand ready for evil work."

Then hast not kept my covenant. God promises of blessing to Solomon were contingent on his being faithful to him. There was an agreement that he should be prosperous and live to old age if he would serve the Lord. God reproached him with breaking the agreement and not living up to its conditions. A quaint preacher a dressing miners drew a picture of two mines. He represented pay-day at one of the mines, and described the long line of men coming to the cashier's desk to receive their wages. Presently, some came up whom the cashier did not know. "Where have you been working?" he asked. "We were working in the other pit," they answered. "Then that is the place to go for your money." "No," he said, "we like your pay best; we are tired and we want rest and we want peace and plenty. At the pit where we have been working they are treating us cruelly; we get no pay but blows and hard work. Won't you pay us?" But the cashier says, "No, you chose to work in the other pit and you must take the wages the pay; you cannot work for one employer and get your wages from another." "That was fair, my friends was it not?" the preacher asked. His hearers answered that it was. "Then," said he, "don't you serve the devil unless you want his wages. The wages of sin is death!"

Sacrificed unto their gods. It seems a most incredible that a man so wise as Solomon should have offered sacrifice to an inanimate image such as the depicted in the illustration on this page. Yet the old carvings show that this was the form in which Ashtoreth was worshipped. People who despise idolaters however, sometimes have their spirit. A lady, in conversation with the famous preacher, Mr. Romaine, said there was at least one of the commandments she had never broken, she had never worshipped idols. "Madam," said the preacher, "is there any amusement or habit of which you are very fond?" The lady admitted that she enjoyed a game of cards better than anything in life. "Suppose," said Mr. Romaine, "I were to convince you that card-playing was a sin offensive to God, would you give up card-playing so as not to displease him?" "I do not think I could give it up," was the reply. "No, even if it made God angry with you?" The lady thought a minute and said: "No, I am afraid there is no motive strong enough to make me abandon it." "Then," said the preacher, "cards are your idol and to them you must look for salvation. You are as much an idolater as a heathen who worships an image of wood or stone."

Our National Senate.

Reassembling of our Highest and Most Dignified Legislative Body—Rev. W. H. Milburn, the Eloquent Blind Chaplain—The House of Representatives.

AN annual event of national interest is the assembling of Congress, when the Senators and Representatives who have been chosen to make laws for the people of the Union, meet in their respective chambers for the first time at the beginning of a new session. Both chambers are in the Capitol, a magnificent building of colossal dimensions and noble design, which for grace and beauty in all its proportions, skill in the execution of every detail, exterior and interior, and advantage of position, is hardly surpassed by any public building on the globe. On the crest of an eminence that stands within a spacious park of 40 acres, all on gradually rising ground, its noble columns and commanding dome are visible at a distance of many miles, and viewed on any side, give the impression of majesty and grandeur. The park has been artificially laid out and has many attractions for visitors. There are in it several trees that were planted by Washington while President, and one of the number, to the north of the Capitol, is known as the "Washington Elm," and is both admired and revered.

The Capitol itself includes a central building facing east, and which is connected by corridors with two extensions or wings. It is 751 feet in length, and with its porticos and steps covers an area of about four acres. To adequately describe this noble structure, with all its statues of Carrara marble, its beautiful Rotunda, its busts, bronzes, emblematic designs, and its gallery of glorious paintings, would occupy whole pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The United States Senate and the House of Representatives are located in the extensions. Photographs of the interiors of both chambers, showing where the senators and representatives sit, appear with glass panels, with paintings of a patriotic character. The Vice-President of the United States is the President of the Senate, and sits on a dais at the northern end of the chamber, with the Sergeant-at-arms on his right and a door-keeper on his left, desks of the clerks and Senate reporters being ranged in front, and the desks and chairs of the Senators being arranged in semi-circular rows around the chamber. The Senate possesses a dignity equal to that of any body of legislators in any country, and its powers and responsibilities are enormous. As a rule, only the worthiest and most representative men in a community ever reach the Senate.

Few men are better known throughout the length and breadth of America than "The Blind Man Eloquent," Rev. William Henry Milburn, D.D., the Chaplain of the Senate. He was born in Philadelphia, Penn., on the 26th of September, 1823. When he was five years of age his left eye was accidentally injured, and through unskillful medical treatment its sight was destroyed. Later in life he lost sight entirely. In 1844 he began his career as a Methodist preacher among the scattered settlements in the grasses and prairies of Illinois. When twenty-two years of age, Mr. Milburn was elected a Chaplain of Congress, and has filled that position many times. His portrait appears on this page, and in the colored illustration on the front page of this issue our artist has depicted with realistic accuracy the impressive scene during the prayer at the opening session of the United States Senate.

In the southern extension of the Capitol is the Hall of the House of Representatives, a legislative chamber of noble proportions. It is 139 feet in length and 93 feet wide, and its ceiling is in glass panels adorned with the coats-of-arms of the

An Old-Time Thanksgiving.

Rev. Dr. Talmage tells of the Joys of the National Festival in Country Homes.

WE have not only the present surroundings to make us happy, but our minds are crowded with vivid reminiscences, writes Rev. Dr. Talmage.

On a day like this the memory becomes a kaleidoscope. You give to the kaleidoscope of memory a turn and there they are, natural as life, around the country hearth on a cold winter night. Hear the hickory fire crackle, and see the shadows flit up and down the wall. Games that sometimes well-nigh upset the chairs—"Blind Man's Buff," "Who's got the Button," "The Popping Corn," "The Molasses Pudding," and the witch stories that made the neighbors' boys afraid to go home after dark. Hickory nuts on one dish, roseate apples on the other. The boisterous plays of "More Bags on the Mill," "Leap Frog," "Catcher," around and around the room until some one got back room when you joined hands, and one of the loveliest stood in the ring! What a circumference to what a centre!

Another turn—the old meeting-house, solemn and sleepy, bumble-bees humming about the old clap-boards, horses under the shed stamping at the flies, choir in the gallery with a broken fiddle. Farmers in their sleeves aroused from their slumbers by the hymn: "My drowsy powers, why sleep ye so?" Aged minister, good enough for translation. The old church from floor to ceiling full of old-fashioned religion, one ounce of which is worth twenty tons of humbug of modern evolution. Where's the old minister now? Where's the choir now? Where are the leaders who sat around the pulpit and listened till the sermon got to the seventeenth?

Turn again the kaleidoscope of memory, and there is the old country school-house where the master pulled our ears till they have always since been a little out of proportion. The tin cup out of which fifty drank without any fastidiousness. The gad cut out of the woods by the boy who was to suffer it in his own chastisement. The modest house in the woods and the jealousies because a pair of black or blue eyes would have uncomplimentary preferences. The bullies of ten years old imposing on those of seven. The rising of mirthful feeling among the ribs, quaking the young diaphragm and rising till it twitched the corners of the mouth and suppression was no more possible, and though frowning schoolmaster sat on the valve it would come to explosion, shattering the whole school into splinters of fun, the one giggle setting off a whole magazine of cackling. There then was the corn-husking and the "raising" frolic, and here the snowballing carousal, and there the sleigh-riding party, and there the springtime blossoms and here the treat of the first ripe harvest apples. But the crown of these yearly festivities was Thanksgiving. Was anything ever half so joyous?

Infection in Oysters.

At a recent meeting of the British Association, two learned professors—Messrs. Boyce and Herdman—read papers on the subject of oysters and infection. A fact brought forward was that when oysters were laid down in pure water, a natural process of cleansing took place, and previous sewage or other contamination was thus entirely got rid of. It would appear that typhoid germs can live for fourteen days in sea-water of 35 deg. cent., while in cold sea-water they may live for twenty-one days; and when large quantities of the microbes are added to the water their presence may be demonstrated for a longer period than when small quantities are employed. The bacilli do not actually breed or multiply in the sea-water. Infection must arise from the actual microbes which enter the water, and not from their descendants or progeny. It is also certain that the typhoid microbe does not increase either in the body or in the tissues of the oyster. Where oysters are infected with typhoid germs, and placed in a stream of pure sea-water, the bacilli disappear in from one to seven days. Thus the oyster utilises its pure environment to get rid of its unwelcome and uninvited germ-guests.

various States. To the south on a platform, stands the Speaker's chair, and in front of it is a marble table, near which on a small pedestal, lies the mace.

Above the principal door is a large clock which has become famous, owing to the fact that the sergeant-at-arms seldom fails to turn back the hands in the closing hours of the final day of a session. The portraits, frescoes, bronzes, statues, and other works of art in the Committee rooms, halls, and staircases are of great merit and represent almost fabulous outlay. Not the least of the Capitol's sights is the dome.

the somewhat tedious ascent to which is amply rewarded by a view which, in certain respects, could hardly be equalled.

Famine Stalks in India.

The Grim Spectre again Threatens to Decimate the Population of many Provinces—The Government's Measures for Succoring the Natives.

INDIA is once again overshadowed by famine in many of her provinces. Owing to the failure of rain, and the continual drought, the wheat and cotton crops will be very short, especially in Northern India; the Southern and Western provinces will also be seriously affected. How great the deficiency may prove cannot as yet be ascertained, but the evidence in the shortage is of a serious character. While the Indian Empire, as a whole, produces sufficient food each year for its aggregate population, at certain points the food fails, and where the means of transportation between the provinces are inadequate, terrible suffering arises and multitudes of people starve and die. These constantly recurring famines have caused unusual anxiety and exertion to the English Government in India's behalf, the cost of the famine of 1874-76, costing England about $32,500,000, and that of 1877, nearly $30,000,000.

During the famine of 1876, there was the most frightful suffering throughout the whole country. Parents sold their children for a small supply of rice, barely sufficient to last the adults in the family three days. Thousands died in the streets.

At the close of the famine, one of the cities where the native relieving officers were distributing rice. Men and women were sitting around patiently waiting, many with gaunt hunger written on their faces. But they got nothing, although the rice bags, full to bursting, were piled up in a corner. The native officials had lists of names, and only those who were on the list received relief. The turn of the patient watchers would come sometime—if they lived. A few questions by the native officials, and then, drawing his sword, he ripped the rice bags open one after another and scattered the precious food in the direction of the watchers. The native officials were horror-stricken, and explained that "their names were not on the list, and now they had to wait a dozen times than have them die here."

This famine seems to be very likely to threaten the country lying between Madras, Bangalore and Bellary, in the north. The people inhabiting this portion are largely agriculturists and cotton weavers. The increase, and a few months ago, the rivers overflowed and washed out all the rice. There was practically no rain during the season.

work, and the people were provided with with one scanty meal a-day, and the only alternative left for the poor was to go into the jungles, and feed on the noxious weeds. Many people who had not even these weeds to eat, went to the lakes, and took wet clay and swallowed it. A great many died in that way. More than a hundred thousand perished during this famine. My brother-in-law said that he went and found all the servants who were in charge of the relief work looking well-fed, while the people who were supposed to have received relief looked thin and sickly. I hear that the ambassador at St. Petersburg is arranging to send wheat to Northern India through Tibet. A large part of the population lives on a great deal of rice; in Northern India they live on wheat. When deprived of rain, everything stops short. They do not eat meat; those who live on wheat could manage to get along on rice, and vice versa. I understand this famine is likely to spread over Northern and Central India, and that the government is already making preparations to start relief work in Rajputana, Punjab and Oudh."

Tennessee's First Sunday School.

The Pioneer Building still Standing—Over a Hundred Years Old.

THE oldest Sunday School in Tennessee and one of the very oldest in the West, is still in existence. It was established by Anthony Caldwell, in Jefferson Co., in 1810, but soon outgrew the capacity of the building in which it first met and for a time was held under the trees. The school was kept up almost constantly till the civil war. Afterward the Baptists adopted the school and in time built a church there. The home of this pioneer school is shown in the photograph on this page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Weather-worn and stained by time, the old building looks as though it might yet stand for many years.

Tennessee has other venerable Sunday Schools with interesting histories, and some of these are mentioned in a letter recently received from Isaac Emory, a missionary of the American Sunday School Union, in which he writes as follows:

"New Bethel Presbyterian Church was organized in 1821. A lady named Jackson came here from New York, (she now lives in Brooklyn), and taught school and had one of the best Sunday Schools in the county. She was here in the seventies. The influence of this lady has led many of the young people into the Christian life and they have become the best workers and citizens we have. One hundred and thirteen schools are now in full operation in this county."

Our Own Missionary's Tour.

Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School Missionary in the southwest, has just returned to his headquarters at Kirksville, Mo., after completing a tour of his extensive district. The season has been a busy one with Sunday School work, Gospel addresses to out-of-the-way churches, and the distribution of religious literature. Funds are needed for the support of Mr. Sharp's work, and friends of the work are invited to send their contributions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

All contributions will be promptly acknowledged in these columns.

Anybody's Children.

POOR sad little ones, with the die of a fearful mintage on their faces—the mintage of misery and starvation—full of a wretched precocity; wise to do evil; swift to run on any errand of mischief; all their natural tact and brightness bound 'prentice to the devil, before they could say "yes" or "no" to the compact.

I saw hundreds of these miserable little ones enjoying a brief respite from their cares and sufferings at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home last August, and I shall never forget the sight. It was on a warm sunny day, and the wide-spreading Home under its shadowing trees, and the long green lawns crowded with playing children, made a most interesting picture. The beautiful Hudson River was before them, and an immense tent sheltered a number of long tables, on which the evening meal was spread. As our party approached, the children came running to meet us with happy shouts of welcome; clinging to Mr. Klopsch with all the natural affection of boys and girls, who know, and love, their benefactor. Every slum of New York had its representative in some half-fed miserable little lad or lass; and the marvelous thing to me was the rapidity with which they had accustomed themselves to the pleasant comforts and restraints of decent living. Many had never before known the luxury of a bed, or of proper bed-clothing; yet they crept between the white sheeting with little exclamations of delight; and in some cases, when they went back to the city, asked permission to take their bed back with them.

Three lessons are taught in this Home: To love God, to love their country, to be gentle and courteous to each other. In the pretty little chapel of the Home, they gathered with an orderly rapidity that showed, not only kind, pleasant discipline, but a remarkable teachableness. Their happy voices blended sweetly in song and prayer, and the short service was enjoyed because they were not mere listeners, but in all the simple exercises, took an active share. As they came out of the chapel the supper bell rang; and they ran joyfully towards the tent; the boys ranging themselves in a double file, between which the girls passed; the boys doffing their caps as they did so; a little lesson of good influence. Then up flew the Stars and Stripes! and the children saluting it, sat down, singing a verse of thanksgiving. Their supper was of good bread and butter, fresh milk, and fruit; and no one who is not familiar with the utter dirt and filth, in which these little ones ordinarily snatch a mouthful of food, can form any idea of what a wonderful thing it must be to them, to sit at clean tables, and for a week or two eat like human creatures—plentifully, neatly, with laughter and thanksgiving.

During the last three years THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has entertained nearly six thousand of these waifs of humanity, and doubtless the lessons of piety, patriotism, and kindness, so happily taught, will never be forgotten. Many a boy and girl have at least received an ideal, which they will be ambitious to realize in their future life; and the more forcible characters may become centres of good, in their sinful and wretched surroundings. But this work so Christlike, needs great extension. It is but a little covert from the intolerable heat and misery of the city slums in summer. It ought not to be a summer rest, but a permanent Home. Moreover, there ought to be thousands of such homes for anybody's and nobody's children, all over the land. Every child whose parents are unwilling, or unworthy, to bring it properly up, is lawfully and naturally the child of the State; and it is the supreme interest of the State to accept this duty in its fullest sense. She ought to provide Homes, not Reformatories, for all who have no homes, from whatever cause. These Homes, should be many and small, for it is not the military, or monastic discipline, but the domestic, which educates the morals and affections. And these children should be taught to consider it a great honor, and not a shame, that they are the sons and daughters of the republic. If the republic did this duty, what an army of defenders it would be constantly raising up! What a bulwark against civil faction and foreign foes! What a reserve of steady noble citizens, to leaven every State into which they might be sent!

There is no need to speak of the expense of maintaining such a host of children. We maintain them now. They cost us in Reformatories and Prisons, far more than if they were brought up in Infant Homes and Industrial, Mechanical, and Agricultural Schools. Neither should we say, such a scheme would be morally ineffective. These wretched children are not born "sinners above all others," they are what circumstances and neglect have made them; they are capable of all, that circumstances and care have made us. Are good children among the wealthy of spontaneous growth? Do they not need line upon line, and precept upon precept; the care of parents and teachers, the restraining influences of religion, education, and society?

Such a charity as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home is a very thought of heaven, and many a poor, miserable child will die, and carry into the next life, not one happy memory, but many, of the lovely, wonderful days it spent there. But these neglected children cannot be much longer left to such charities, however noble. They should be adopted by the republic. If parents won't do their duty, they forfeit their rights, and these rights lapse to the State. When children have been ten or twelve years under the vilest influences, what can Reformatories and Prisons do? Infant Homes must eventually make Reformatories and Prisons unnecessary; and this as much for our sake as theirs. For the children of to-day are the to-morrow of society. It is they who are to become the fathers and mothers of the future.

SILHOUETTES FROM LIFE

WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Thanksgiving.

OVER in Germany there is a woman whose life has been full of hard work. often work in the fields, through all her life. Her sweet, patient face and toil-worn hands show that her lot has never been an easy one, but there has been one great consolation through every experience, for the fairies that hovered over the cradle of Johanna Ambrosius dropped there a wonderful gift—the gift of the poet's eyes to see God's fair world with, and of the poet's tongue to tell what the eyes saw. Would you like to hear one of her verses?

My native land I will not leave,
Whatever may be told;
Above all other countries it
Doth shine with purest gold.
Let Fortune smile in other realms.
In richer pomp of hue,
Nowhere save in my native land
Laughs sun from skies as blue.

That's the way you and I feel about our native land, or our dear home-land, isn't it, friends? For there is a witchery about this dear America of ours that makes the Scotchman, the German, the Irishman, the Scandinavian, the Italian, learn to love it so heartily, and hold it so dear that when they go back to the old home, and stay there awhile, they become home-sick for the new land, the glad land, the strong and brave land, God-given on this mighty continent.

I said to Norah, who had wearied till she could again have a sight of the cabin home near the soft green banks and limpid waters of Killarney, "Why did you not stay at home, Norah?" "Faith," she answered, "I was twice happy: happy to go back to it, and happy to leave it, and see America again. America's the place for me."

Now, from Norah and my kitchen to the first Thanksgiving-day on American soil, is perhaps a far cry. But Thanksgiving is so purely an American festival, that it is rather interesting to glance back and look at the state of affairs which existed when the grand old fathers of the nation set it apart, performing as they did so one of the sublimest acts in history. For the graveyards were thickly furrowed with the mounds under which not only delicate women and children, but strong men were buried in that first desperate struggle with the hard conditions of life in the New England, as they fondly called it, and the scanty harvest was but an earnest of what might yet be their overflowing abundance.

The first Thanksgiving-day in this great country was observed by church-going and solemn prayer and praise.

THOUGHTFUL OF THE COMING FEAST.

and by a family gathering. It set the pattern which ever since we have followed.

No other gala season of the year, not even Christmas, sets in motion so many forces, sees cars and boats so packed with children and grandchildren going back to the old home; sees old people so forgetting their age, and young people so honoring the old, and altogether witnesses such beautiful reunions as we find at Thanksgiving. Men immersed in business cares take time now to run up to the rocky farm in Massachusetts, or the prairie home in Wisconsin, or the wheatfield of Dakota, to be boys again beside their parents. "I'm growing to be quite an old gentleman," said my friend whose eighty-eight years are his crown of glory, "but I tell you when Thanksgiving comes I'm a boy again, for my children and their families all come back to keep the day with me. Sam from California, Paul from New York, Kitty from Chicago, Mary from Philadelphia, Abner from Boston: they're widely scattered, but they make a point of coming home at Thanksgiving and bringing a troop along. When the stage rattles up in the dusk of the day before Thanksgiving and the boys and girls and babies come piling out, it is a great day or me. And though mother is in heaven, we all feel, somehow, that she is very close to us when Thanksgiving Day gathers and packs the family under the old roof-tree."

There have been inroads into our Thanksgiving customs in some quarters, where the good old American fashion of family dinners, and of previous family church-going in the morning have fallen a little into abeyance. But we must not allow this. As carefully as we guard any other of our splendid institutions, we must guard Thanksgiving under the flag.

My country 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
We must sing, joining in with "Old Hundred," and "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," in the same sweet, uplifting service.

I am not forgetting you, dear friend, to whose house and life a great sorrow has lately come. I sympathize with you from a full heart. I remember the summer day when the light for me was blurred with tears, because my best beloved was taken hence. I remember this home, and that one, where the darkness is deep because a noble son, a beautiful daughter, a fair child, has been snatched away by death. How can we lift the song when our hearts are broken? What room is there for joy when we are always looking at a vacant chair, and our whole being cries out for "the touch of a vanished hand, and the sound of a voice that is still?" How can we be joyful when there is no joy?

Well, it is hard, but much of life is hard, anyway, and sometimes peace is better than joy. If we can acquiesce in God's dealings, and realize that all he does is done in love, we shall then, though in much sorrow, be able to bless his name, for our spirit will be that of his servant, who said, "though he slay me, yet will I trust in him," and we cry with David, "I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High."

Then, too, there will steal upon our souls as we sit in the shadow, a sense of the unreality of this changeling life, and of the nearness of heaven and the unseen world, and in that hallowed hour we will be wafted higher, and an atmosphere of tranquility will enfold us. Thanksgiving, if we but try to absorb its spirit, will set us on a plane above this material life.

"What," whispers my little friend Molly, "are we to do, if we are disappointed in our plans, if we can't do anything we want to, if the barn burned down and we had no insurance, if the mortgage is foreclosed, if our debtors don't pay us, if we hear the screech against the bottom of the flour barrel and have no idea where the bread is coming from for the hungry boys, if the coal is out, if we're shivering in threadbare coats, if we're as poor as picked chickens?" It does require great faith to be thankful in the face of want and suffering, but some of God's dear children have learned how to triumph, and when they learn that victorious lesson the angels behold walking with them in the hottest furnace fire "One whose form is like unto the Son of God." Yes, we can always try, my friends, and you know, as I do, that trying is half the battle. I know what I am talking about, for

Face to face with trouble
I have very often stood,
To find that pain has sweetness,
And to learn that God is good.

So, a blessed Thanksgiving feast to you, my dear friends and readers of the grand CHRISTIAN HERALD army of pilgrims, traveling step by step the road that leads us home. We clasp hands and take courage at this white milestone of Thanksgiving, 1896. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

A Dahomean Solomon.

It is dated of Adarossa, a celebrated king of Dahomey, that he once wished to decide which of the two, the drunkard or the fool, was more stupid and helpless. He took two fair specimens, and after shutting them up in a grass hut, he ordered this to be set on fire. As soon as the fool felt the heat he made desperate efforts to get out and thus saved himself. The drunkard, on the contrary, lay like a log and was burnt to death. Then the king said: "There is no doubt: the fool is better off than the drunkard. There is a glimmer of reason left in him. Therefore, if a fool does something wrong I shall punish him, so as to deter him from doing it again. But the drunkard, who is dead drunk, has no knowledge of what he does. Therefore, even if he should smite me, the king, in the face, I would not resent it. He is below a fool."

A Slave Auction at Fez.

Described by a Traveler who Personally Witnessed it.

NO more romantic or exciting experience in Africa has been had in recent years than that of Mr. G. Herbert Phillips, a traveler who spent some ten weeks in the dominions of the Sultan of Morocco. Adapting himself to the Arab life, he bade adieu to civilization at Tangier, and with his caravan penetrated about 1,200 miles into the interior. He even penetrated into some of the little-known Sus country, and passed through the territory of the Beni Hasan tribe, one of the most dangerous in Morocco.

"I asked my host at Fez," said Mr. Phillips, "whether there was a slave market there, as I was curious, if such were the case, to visit it. He told me there was, and that he would inquire when there would be a sale. The result of the inquiry was that on the evening of Sunday, May 31st, I was conducted to what had the appearance of an old-fashioned market-place. There was an open square, and round was a kind of arcade, in which the people sat. The slaves, who were Soudanese negresses, brought up from the Soudan through the desert in caravans, were ranged in a recess in the corner. The slave dealers, healthy and substantial-looking men, led out each of the slaves in turn, and in Arabic shouted out the merits of each. These slave sales are invariably held in the evening, the idea being that if there are any imperfections in face or figure, they are less likely to be noticed in the twilight. Eight women and two girls were offered for sale, and before the actual bidding commenced the intending purchasers went up to the recess in which the slaves were waiting, and examined them closely.

"The first woman brought out was one apparently about twenty-two years of age, although she might have been less, as they age very quickly. She was dressed in a kind of calico covering with a girdle. There was bidding in the usual auction way, the dealers going round and shouting out the offers as they were made. The bidding was, of course, in Moorish money, and the first woman was bought for a sum equivalent in English to nearly $50. Then a young girl of perhaps ten years was sold, the price in her case being about $55.

"During all this I was standing under the arcade, but, being dressed in an ordinary English tourist suit, I kept behind the Moors who accompanied me, and, so far, had been unobserved. I was aware that the Moors object to any stranger being present at these sales, as they do not wish information about the traffic to get abroad. I had seen the two sold, and in the case of the girl, the scene was heart-rending, as she cried bitterly and was greatly distressed. I could stand it no longer, and walked out into the middle of the square, and the large attendance of Moors present then saw that a European was there. They gathered together in little groups, there was a hurried whispering amongst them, the unsold slaves were formally marched off, and the Moors dispersed, most of those present proceeding to the great mosque near by."

Reasons for Thanksgiving.

GIVE still organ on Thanksgiving day this year. Pull out all the glad stops, and while we pray and while we sing, let us make a joyful noise unto the Rock of our salvation. Gather your families together. Let your children be arrayed in their brightest robes. In the morning let the temples of God ring with hosannahs, and in the night let your homes be filled with congratulation, laughter and song. Turn on all the lights, bracket, chandelier and candelabra. Throw another armful of firewood on the hearth and let the fire blaze out cheerily. When you and I are gone and our children go out and look at the place where we sleep, may they be enabled to say: "There rest the father and mother who knew how to make their children happy on Thanksgiving Day."

On such a time as this shall we not render thanksgiving to God? What a wonderful change! It was not a great while ago when governments forbade religious assemblages; now they invoke them. The father, the husband and the brother sit now at the end of the pew through custom—a custom established in the dark ages of persecution, when it was necessary for the male members of the family to sit at the head of the church pew, armed for defence of those who could not defend themselves. Now, on Thanksgiving Day we meet in churches at the call of secular authority.

This Thanksgiving morning finds this land above all others in a position to be grateful. The so-called bears in the grain market and all the other markets are such that the great masses of the people have no idea of what God is doing for this country. We had a bad Winter, it was said. Yes. We had a bad Spring, it was said. Yes. We had a bad Summer. Yes. But we had a good God, and, notwithstanding all the deluges, and all the insects, and all the political excitement, happily settled, the lap of the nation is filled with blessing. Shall we then render today a jeremiad, or a grand march? It what wealth, what civilization. Lift up thine eyes, oh nation, at the glorious prospect!

Between Sundays.

MANY Christians do not appreciate it, indeed it is a great waste of time, unless there be some positive advantage to be gained. The French nation at one time tried to have a Sabbath only once in ten days. The intelligent Christian finds he needs a Sabbath every three or four days, and so builds a brief one on the shore of a week-day, in the shape of an extra religious service. He gets grace on Sabbath to bridge the chasm of worldliness between that and the next Sabbath, but finds the arch of the bridge very great, and so runs up a pier midway, to help sustain the pressure. There are one hundred and sixty-eight hours in a week, and but two hours of public religious service on Sabbath. What chance have two hours in a battle with one hundred and sixty-eight?

A week-night meeting allows church membership utterance. A minister cannot know how to preach unless in a conference meeting he finds the religious state of the people. He must feel the pulse before giving the medicine, otherwise he will not know whether it ought to be an anodyne or a stimulant. Every Christian ought to have something to say.

Miss Frances E. Willard Thanks Our Readers.

En route to St. Louis, Nov. 9, 1896.

Dear Dr. Klopsch:

It is in my heart to thank your generous subscribers for almost the first help that came to Lady Henry Somerset and me in our work for the Armenian refugees at Marseilles. That thousand dollars brought more solid comfort than any but the hungry and shelterless can comprehend. So far as I know, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has given more money to help the Armenian sufferers than any paper in the world. This is a record worthy of the leadership and traditions that have made the paper the Gospel Cosmopolite of journalism—long may it reign!

Lady Henry Somerset desires me to express her special thanks and appreciation to your readers. She is still hard at work for the cause, having established an office in London with expert helpers and great, capable speakers in the field. The need was never so great as now.

I am proud of those American Homes that have received the Marseilles refugees, and more than ever convinced that ours is "God's Country."

Yours in the Master's cause,

wisest men in all departments of merchandise say that business is looking up, and that our greatest prosperities are yet to come. It is the inevitable law of nature, which is also the law of God, that the material resources of this country must in the future produce material wealth. You will hear the anvil ring with a sturdier blow. You will see the furnaces glow with a fiercer fire. You will see the wheel-hov strike with a swifter dash. America has not yet been fully discovered. Various Americas have been found, but there are better ones perhaps to come. Columbus found only the shell of this country. Agassiz came along and discovered fossiliferous America. Silliman came and discovered geological America. Longfellow came and discovered poetic America. But there are other Americas yet to be found. Our resources have not all been tested. We have a land capable of supporting three thousand, six hundred millions of people.

We have only just begun to open the outside door of the great underground vault in which nature holds its treasures, the copper, the zinc, the coal, the iron, the gold, the silver. If you have ever crossed the mountains to California you have had some idea of it. The rail trains have only just begun to bring the harvests of the West down to our seaboard. The American fishermen have only just begun to cast their net on the right side of the ship. The dry-docks have just begun to set the keels and clamp the spars of trading ves-

Every man is a walking eternity. The plainest man has Omnipotence to defend him, Omniscience to watch him, Infinite Goodness to provide for him. The tamest religious experience has in it poems, tragedies, histories, Iliads. Ought not such an one have something to say? If you were ever in the army you know what it is to see an officer on horseback dash swiftly past carrying a dispatch. You wondered as he went what the news was. Was the army to advance, or was the enemy coming? So every Christian carries a dispatch from God to the world. You may have a letter committed to your care, and after some days you find it in one of your pockets; you forgot to deliver it. Great was your chagrin when you found that it pertained to some sickness or trouble. God gives every man a letter of warning or invitation to carry, and what will be your chagrin in the judgment to find that you have forgotten it. A week-night meeting widens the pulpit till all the people can stand on it.

Such a service tests one's piety. No credit for going to church on Sabbath. Places of amusement are all closed, and there is no money to be made. But week nights every kind of temptation and opportunity spreads before a man, and if he goes to the praying-circle he must give up these things. The man who goes to the weekly service regularly through moonlight and pitch darkness, through good walking and slush ankle deep, will, in the Book of Judgment, find it set down to his everlasting credit.

BRIEF NOTES.

There are now Christian Endeavor Societies in Illinois connected with 33 denominations.

Dr. Barnardo this year Celebrates the Thirtieth anniversary of his work of rescuing waifs and strays in London.

The Salvation Army Self-Denial Week in Great Britain produced $115,000, or $27,000 in excess of that of last year.

The new Lord Mayor of London is a Jew. He is the fourth Jew elected to that office, his father having been the second.

The Seaman's Bethel, for which a request was recently made for papers, is at Boston, Mass. Religious papers are specially desired, and those which have illustrations are particularly acceptable.

The Rev. Dr. Pentecost began a Series of fourteen days' mission meetings at Cardiff on Nov. 9, in connection with the Presbyterian Church there. He begins a fortnight's mission in Liverpool on Monday, Nov. 30.

Professor Drummond, the Famous Author of "Natural Law in the Spiritual World" and other works, is still lying very ill in the South of England, wholly confined to bed and unable to write. The doctors are hopeful of an early improvement.

St. Bartholomew's Church, New York, is a beneficiary under the will of the late Mrs. W. H. Vanderbilt. She bequeathed a quarter of a million dollars to the rector and wardens of the church, with instructions that the sum should be invested and the income applied to the uses of the church.

Evangelist Geo. L. Barker has been holding services at Mizpah Meeting House, Baltimore, Md. Rev. Joseph K. Snyder, the pastor, writes us that fully one hundred have already made profession of faith, as the result of God's blessing on these services, and more are expected to declare themselves for Christ.

Ambrose Park, Brooklyn, N. Y., has been secured for the convention of the Young People's Baptist Union of America for 1897. The work of preparing for the meetings will be begun as soon as the contract is signed. The present building will be renovated, and a canvas roof will be stretched across the large pavilion.

Dr. Beverly O. Kinnear is delivering lectures on the unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, every Thursday evening, in the Managers' Room of the Bible House, New York. The lectures begin at 8.15 P. M. Those who have read Dr. Kinnear's book on "Impending Judgments" will know how interesting these lectures are likely to be.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes says that in England, in spite of the wealth of the Episcopal Church, and the prestige it enjoys as the established church of the nation, the Nonconformists provide more church accommodation than the Church of England, and have in their Sunday Schools in the aggregate 400,000 more scholars.

Dr. L. W. Munhall is taking an active part in the Evangelistic movement in Philadelphia. The meeting at Seventh and Spring Garden Streets was crowded to hear the famous Evangelist, and many conversions are reported. Rev. George C. Needham, Dr. J. A. Wharton, and other evangelists are assisting in the work, which promises to attain great proportions.

One of the most unique services rendered by a Christian Endeavor Society is reported from Yarker, Ont. A young man died whose parents were so poor that they could not pay the cost of opening a grave. The Christian Endeavor Society took charge of the funeral and in order to reduce expenses to a minimum they took spades in hand and dug the grave themselves.

Ainslie St. Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, had a memorable service on Nov. 8, when Dr. R. S. Dawson gave the right hand of fellowship to the sixty-two new members who have united with the church since the revival services conducted by Evangelist Grant C. Tullar. During those services 215 persons signed cards declaring their resolve in Christ's strength to lead consecrated lives. Many of these have already united with other churches.

The second annual Convention of the National Gospel Mission Union was held November 18-20, in Chicago. Four sessions were held daily in the First Congregational Church. Many eminent mission workers from all parts of the country were present, and related their experiences. The Helping Hand mission in South Halsted Street, which is under the auspices of the Gospel Mission Union, took charge of the management of the Convention.

Charles S. Studd, a well-known missionary, who has labored during the past ten years in China, is now making a tour of American colleges to get recruits for the foreign missionary field. Mr. Studd is a graduate of Cambridge University, England, and a leader in Christian work among the colleges there. He is a guest of the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association. Mr. Studd was a famous athlete at college, and has been equally famous in the missionary work in China.

Nicola Eyoub Tams, the Syrian Evangelist, has been delivering a course of lectures in the Baptist Church in Twenty-third Street, New York. The new light Mr. Tams was able from his Oriental experience to throw on the Bible was greatly appreciated. Mr. Tams also lectured at the Methodist Metropolitan Temple, of which Dr. Cadman is pastor. Several friends, attired in the Oriental costumes Mr. Tams has in his possession, sat on the platform making clear the lecturer's description of Oriental life.

The News of the Loss of Steamship Day Spring, belonging to Dr. J. G. Paton, the apostle of the New Hebrides, is confirmed. She was wrecked to the north of New Caledonia. Eight of the crew, including the captain, were saved out of seventeen. No missionaries were on board at the time, but the cargo consisted of three months' supplies for the various mission stations on the islands. All the mails were also lost. The insurance will not by any means cover the loss, but already a lady has forwarded $500 towards a new ship.

Dr. John Hall, of the Fifth Ave. Presbyterian Church, New York, baptized eleven Hebrew converts on Nov. 8th at Mr. Warszwawak's Mission, Grand Street. Six of them were adult—four men and two women. Dr. Hall made a congratulatory address before administering the rite, in the course of which he took occasion to say that the true Christian had feelings only of respect and love for the Jew, and always deprecated his ostracism and persecution. Mr. Warszwawak and Mr. Liechtenstein addressed the meeting in German after Dr. Hall had spoken.

THE BIBLE

AND THE NEWSPAPER

Siberian Exile Life.

FROM the testimony of Mr. R. L. Jefferson, who has travelled extensively in Siberia and relates his experience in Black and White, a new view is obtained of the Russian exile system. Mr. Jefferson went to Siberia with the common notions of the outrageous cruelties practised on the men and women who had incurred the displeasure of the Russian government; but he frankly confesses that these notions were not confirmed by his observation. It was at Moscow he saw for the first time a gang of exiles start for the bleak, inhospitable land. They were ordinary peasants who had been convicted of murder or robbery with violence. There is no country in the world where such men would go unpunished, and in some countries the majority of them would be hanged. They were clad in coarse, gray, woolen clothing, with shackles on their ankles and guarded by a dozen soldiers with fixed bayonets. Following them, at a short distance, was a motley crowd of women and children who had accepted the privilege of going to Siberia, so that their husbands and fathers might not be lonely in their exile. They were all put on board the car at the railroad depot to be conveyed to Nijni Novgorod, whence a steamer conveyed them to Irtomsk. There they landed and climbed by a pass in the Ural mountains to Tiuren. There another steamer would await them on which they would be conveyed to the city of Tomsk. This is the focus of the great Siberian highways which lead to all parts of the vast convict-land. The exiles are required to walk along one of these roads to the district to which they have been assigned. Mr. Jefferson saw some of these gloomy processions. A few soldiers went at the head; then came the convicts with fetters on their ankles, each man carrying a bag on his back containing food, and, suspended from his waist, a tea-kettle and other cooking utensils. The women and children followed, and at the rear of the procession were several wagons containing the bedding and articles of domestic use belonging to the convicts. Some of the children, tired with the march, were riding in the wagons and the guard was chatting affably with them. Mr. Jefferson did not get access to the mines, or the great convict prisons, but he saw much of the out-door life of the convicts and they appeared to be contented and prosperous. In some instances they were better off than they had been in Russia. Their food was secure and they could work for wages, under indulgent employers. In one of the houses where there was a large retinue of servants, the coachman is a murderer, and every employee is criminal of some kind. They are at liberty to go where they please within certain limits, and to engage in any kind of work. Their punishment consists in their expatriation and their loss of all civil rights. They cannot appeal to the courts, nor will the police protect them. They are outlaws, but as a rule, they do not suffer from the fact. Many of them remain voluntarily in Siberia when their term of exile has expired. These facts, of course, apply to the criminals of a certain class, not to those who work in the mines nor to the political exiles, whose punishment is sometimes severe. Mr. Jefferson thinks that in the treatment of this class of criminals the Russian government is lenient as compared with other governments, inasmuch as it spares their lives and gives them a chance to amend their ways. If they avail themselves of it they are not molested, but if they break the laws in Siberia, their punishment is swift and condign. In this the government has divine example. The Psalmist declares that God deals so with offenders.

With the pure thou wilt show thyself pure, and with the perverse thou wilt show thyself forward. (Ps. 18: 26.)

A Missing Corner-Stone.

The rector and parishoners of a Protestant Episcopal Church in the northern district of New York City wants to find some aged man, who knows where the corner-stone of the church in which they have long worshipped, is located. The congregation is about to erect a new stone church on the site of the old edifice. In tearing down the old church they kept a close watch for the corner-stone, expecting to find in its cavity some interesting relics which would naturally be placed there when the church was built. But the stone has not been found. Whether it is lower it improved, and applied to the city about it, but they were informed that the road did not belong to the city. They therefore raised a subscription among themselves and had the work done. The road was then used more than ever. Last week, however, the drivers were disgusted at finding that a fence had been erected across the road and a notice affixed warning off trespassers on private property. It was necessary to travel a mile to the south or half-a-mile to the north to find a parallel road connecting the two main thoroughfares. It appears that one of the adjacent estates changed hands recently, and the new owner learned that the road was on his property. The public has had the use of it for several years, but he claims that he has the right of ownership and has exercised it in closing the road. The residents who recently improved it, propose to test the validity of his claim by an action at law. Even if he succeeds in proving that he has the right to close the road, he would be wise in leaving it open. The rights of property ought never to operate to the injury of others. The Christian doctrine applies to this as to many other matters in which it is too often ignored:

All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient. Let no man seek his own, but each his neighbor's good. (1. Cor. 10: 24.)

A Laborer's Fortune.

A young man at Lockport, N. Y., who a few weeks ago was looking for any kind of work by which he could earn enough to provide him with food and clothing, is now on his way West to receive a fortune father. There was no will, and the young man inherits his entire estate as next heir. It may be hoped that he has learned a lesson from his painful experience, since his father cast him off. Though he need no longer have the dread that his evil ways may offend his father, he may be sure that they will lead to his own ruin.

He that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul (Prov. 8: 36)

A Sheriff in Peril.

A sheriff in South Carolina had a narrow escape, on November 8th, of losing his life in the execution of his duty. He had in his custody a negro, charged with the cold-blooded murder of a white man in his district. There was great popular indignation against the prisoner, and threats of lynching were freely made. The sheriff, however, was determined that the man should be tried by process of law, and he ordered the jail to be well guarded. Early in the morning the sheriff received a written order from a magistrate, requiring him to hand the prisoner over to two deputies, to be brought to him for a preliminary examination. He gave the deputies an order for the prisoner, but warned them to take care that the lynchers did not get him. They said they had brought a guard who were strong enough to protect the prisoner. Soon after they started, the sheriff heard that the lynchers were in pursuit, and were sure to capture the murderer. He at once harnessed his horse and followed in a buggy. After a long ride he saw the party a long way off. The prisoner was being held in a buggy, and a number of men followed on horseback. He was unable to overtake them, so he took his horse out of the buggy, and rode after them bareback. When he was near enough he shouted, but they paid no heed. The sheriff was indignant, and after a warning he drew a pistol and fired at the crowd. His horse was unaccustomed to fire-arms, and was frightened. It swerved and threw its rider into the road. By the time the sheriff had picked himself up and caught his horse, the party was out of sight. He followed by the road he thought they would take, but could not find them. Finally he determined to go to the magistrate and report that the lynchers had captured the prisoner. He arrived about night-fall, having been traveling all day. To his amazement he found the prisoner safe in jail. No attempt had been made to take him or lynch him. But the magistrate said that the guard who brought him in reported that they had been followed by a man riding horseback, who had fired a pistol at them. They supposed he was a leader of a party of lynchers, and they would have shot him if he had not given up the pursuit. Then the sheriff realized how narrow had been his escape from death. In his excitement, he had not recognized the magistrate's deputies who had charge of the prisoner, and hastily came to the conclusion that he had fallen into the hands of lynchers, who were carrying him to execute summary punishment upon him. His indignation was aroused, and regardless of the number of the party, he would have attempted to rescue the man if his horse had not thrown him. The guard, like the sheriff, were under a mistake, and it is well that there was no bloodshed. Each, in the desire to protect the prisoner, suspected the other of design to do him harm. A like mistake in politics and in religion causes people to be enemies who should be friends. Rival political parties often suspect each other of being unpatriotic, and rival denominations think each other false to Christ's cause. Men often need the reproof Christ gave to his disciples when they said:

We saw one casting out devils in thy name and we forbade him because he followeth not with us (Luke 9: 49.)

down in the foundations than they have dug, or whether it has been overlooked and carted away with the other stones, no one knows. No one now in the neighborhood remembers the old church being built, but it is assumed that there was a corner-stone, and that the relics and records of the time would be put in it. The inquiries so far made have, however, failed to lead to its discovery. If it cannot be found soon, the erection of the new building will have to go on without it, but the rector and his people are reluctant to proceed without finding the stone. This is a matter, however, of only sentimental importance. A more serious matter, which is seen in too many places where new churches have sprung up in place of the old, is when the new church has left the essential Corner-stone out of its theology.

Jesus himself being the chief Corner-stone. (Eph. 2: 20.)

An Owner's Rights.

An interesting case is likely to come before the law-courts of New York. Residents in the neighborhood of Washington Heights have been accustomed to use a narrow lane connecting Boulevard Lafayette with the Washington Ridge Road, by which they could reach the Fort Washington Depot or the dock at Fort Washington Point. As wealthy business men settled in the vicinity, the road was more and more frequented. Some time ago a number of them were desirous of having estimated at more than two million dollars. It appears that about 1840 an enterprising man went to Michigan and settled in Mackinac County, in the northern part of the State. He raised enough money to purchase a large tract of land, on which he built a log cabin. He worked hard and improved his land. He went into the cattle breeding business, which proved very profitable. During the war he made a large sum by the cattle he sold to the Government. But he added the larger part of his fortune through the discovery of a rich vein of copper on his land. This was worked with enormous profit. He had married soon after the close of the war and had one son. He determined to make a gentleman of him and give him a college education. He supplied him liberally with funds, and allowed him to choose his own way of getting a thorough education. The young man became dissipated and wasted his time and money. At last, he did something so disgraceful that his father, who had borne much from him, lost patience and disowned him. The young man appealed to him in vain. No more money was to be had. He had to earn his own living. He secured work on the canal, but recently that failed and for some weeks he had been looking for work. He was in great straits, when one day recently a letter was placed in his hands informing him of the sudden death of his Professor Dyche of the University of Kansas, has recently returned from a prolonged tour in Alaska, during which he had some singular experiences. He saw three smoking mountains, encountered an earthquake, and found coal so soft that it could be cut with a knife. He had the pleasure of meeting Princess Tom, a native Yokutai noble lady, who is esteemed the richest woman in the territory of Alaska. She has $15,000 in $20 gold pieces. On her right arm she wears bracelets each hammered out of a single piece of gold, and on her left arm she wears bracelets, each made from a ten-dollar gold piece. She has hundreds of blankets, sea otter skins, etc., and owns a schooner and two sloops. She is sixty-five years old and has just obtained her fifth husband, a man twenty years old, for whom she paid five hundred blankets. The Thlingit women manage the household and hold the purse.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

A correspondent in New York City sends us the following letter:

From the published reports of Mr. Moody's Cooper Union services, I gather that he proposes, as a proof of Christian faith, a full belief in the literal inspiration of the whole Bible the actual test being a belief in the miraculous story of Jonah and the whale. "If Jonah goes, Christ goes," are Mr. Moody's own words, as currently reported in the daily press.

I am a constant reader of your journal, and, I hope, a consistent Christian; but this proposition staggers me. Mr. Moody preaches Christianity. Upon what ground, logical, theological or otherwise, does he establish as a test of Christianity a belief in a miraculous event which is related in Hebrew literature of a period long ante-Christian, and which, despite the efforts of those who are constantly distorting Scripture to find "types" where none exist, has never yet been regarded by our ablest commentators as having any more than a figurative or allegorical meaning? I am afraid that to establish such a test would dismay many good Christian men and women. Paul declared that he knew only Jesus Christ and Him crucified (see 1 Cor. 2-2) and that to the Christian is credit enough. The Saviour Himself made belief in Himself, obedience to the law and brotherly love the cardinal points of Christian conduct. Mr. Moody is the first to make the startling discovery that "when Jonah goes, Christ goes." I say, God forbid. Let us hold fast to Jesus as our Rock. Everything else is non-essential.

A HUMBLE BELIEVER.

We publish this letter because many other readers may, like its writer, be staggered by the test Mr. Moody is said to have applied. But Mr. Moody is perfectly logical. In explaining away the story of Jonah and treating it as a myth people impugn the authority and infallibility of Christ himself. He said, (Matthew 12: 39, 40), "An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given to it but the sign of the prophet Jonah; for as Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." It is inconceivable that Christ should have used a myth as the basis of so important a statement. He evidently believed it to be an historical fact, and we need no better standing ground than that on which Christ took his stand. When men begin to pick and choose what parts of the Bible they will accept or reject, they give up the only infallible court of appeal which has been the basis of Protestantism for more than three hundred years. The observation of Mr. Moody is one common to the whole church: the man who begins by doubting the miracle of Jonah is not long before he doubts the resurrection of Christ; and when he reaches that point, he is in the condition of having no effective Gospel to preach. Paul wrote: "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain and your faith is also vain; ye are yet in your sins, and we are of all men most miserable."

M. A. B., Thomastown, O. How can I get the young people of a Sunday School class interested in the International Lessons?

It is extremely difficult just now, as the Committee who select the lessons have displayed a singular lack of judgment in their work. The best advice we can give is to try to extract from the subjects some lessons which they can apply to their everyday lives. Suggestions which will help you appear every week on the Sunday School page of this journal.

M. Bliss, Germantown, Pa. I hear some one say that the Chinese—and most other Orientals—do nearly everything the opposite way we do. To what extent is this true?

To a remarkable extent, as far as the Chinese are concerned. Here are a few of their eccentricities as noted by an observant critic: 1. They read and write from right to left and from foot of page to top. 2. The surname precedes the given name. 3. They shake their own hands instead of shaking their friends' hands. 4. White is mourning with them and dark colors are used on festive days. 5. They serve fruit and sweets first at dinner. 6. Their men are their only dressmakers. 7. Their compass points south instead of north.

L. E. C., Poughkeepsie, N. Y. What is understood by "the marks of the Lord Jesus" to which Paul refers in Galatians 6: 17?

They have a reference to the practice of branding slaves with their owners' initials. A slave by showing the brand proved to whom his service was due and that no one else had a claim upon him. The marks of the Lord Jesus Paul bore were the scars received in his service—the marks of the rod with which he was beaten and the wounds he received in fighting with wild beasts. He showed them as evidence that he belonged to the Lord Jesus.

G. E. F., Randolph, Vt. 1. How did the servants of Hiram transport the timber that was used in building the Temple, from Mount Lebanon to the seaport? 2. How were the stones transported from the quarry to Jerusalem?

1. In his letter to Solomon (see 11. Chronicles 2: 16) King Hiram expressly states that the wood from Lebanon would be brought in floats by sea to Joppa, and that Solomon should provide bearers to carry it overland to Jerusalem. Verse 18 of the same chapter recites the appointment by Solomon of 70,000 men as "bearers of the burdens," and 80,000 to be "hewers in the mountain." 2. The royal quarries were near the city, and extended un-so bring them to the city." In the following chapter he further wrote, "The whole structure of the Temple was made with great skill. . . . There appeared to be no sign of any hammer or other instrument of architecture; but as if, without any use of them, the entire materials had naturally united themselves together, that the agreement of one part with another seemed rather to have been natural than to have arisen from the force of tools upon them." It is not uncommon for Oriental wood workers, cabinet makers, carpenters and the like, to work without nails, using closely-fitting wooden pegs instead, which are easily wedged in without the force that is needed to drive a nail.

F. L. Boynton, Kingfisher, O. T. I am trying to furnish Christian reading to fifteen of the county jails of Oklahoma Territory. Will not a few of your readers furnish their CHRISTIAN HERALDS weekly for this work after they have read them? I will furnish addresses of jails to which they may forward papers.

A. G., Canada, Kans. Do the prohibitions of 1. Timothy 2: 9 and 1. Peter 3: 4 apply to the curling or crimping of the hair? Should a Christian who has been reproached for those practices discontinue them?

There seems to be no need to discontinue them if you do not devote time to the purpose that should be given to important duties. Women in the Apostle's day who decked their hair with gold and jewels, were women to be avoided. Even of the others who were more moderate, the Apostle would rather that they should be known and admired for their graces of character than for the adornments of their persons. It is so still. A Christian woman Merab was the wife of Adriel. The statement that Michal brought up his children in 11. Samuel 21: 8 may imply that her sister died young, and Michal was a foster mother to them, or her name may have been substituted for Merab's by a copyist's mistake.

E. J. S., Congerville, Ill. To whom and to what time does the prophet refer in Jeremiah 23: 6?

To Christ during his Millennial reign. The prediction has never yet been fulfilled and never will be until Christ reigns as King after his second coming.

S. J. B. Bancroft, Mich. Was Solomon in the priests' court when he offered sacrifices and blessed the people? If so, what right had he in there?

There is much that is mysterious about Solomon's proceedings. He had no right under the Levitical law to offer sacrifices, but it is stated that he did so, and one passage appears to imply that he went into the Holy of Holies. His having brazen oxen to support the laver was also a distinct violation of the commandment. There appears to have been a laxity of observance at that time, which is not accounted for either in the Bible or by Jewish writers.

W. W. Goodland, Kans. What is the meaning of Christ's injunction (Luke 16: 9) to make friends of the mammon of unrighteousness?

The Revised Version has the rendering, "Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness." Christ's teaching appears to imply that benevolent actions towards his people in this life are specially remembered in heaven. The beneficiaries remember the kindness they received and give a glad welcome to the man who befriended them, when he appears among them. Thus, even money, which was called the mammon of unrighteousness, may be so used as to affect our eternal happiness. The description of the judgment in Matt. 25: 31-46 conveys a similar lesson.

Inquirer, Salem, Oregon. 1. What has been the sin of those mentioned in Heb. 6: 6, whom it is impossible to renew to repentance? 2. Is backsliding the unpardonable sin? 3. Is not the promise that if we confess our sins, God will forgive us, contradicted by the warning that if we do not forgive others, God will not forgive us?

1. The falling away appears to be accompanied by some kind of ridicule of religion. The impossibility referred to is not punitive, but is a necessity of the case. The backslider is notoriously difficult to restore. He knows so much, and has experienced so much of religion, and it has yet failed to keep him from falling, that he cannot be induced to make another effort. It is impossible only so far as he makes it impossible by his attitude. 2. No; backsliding is not the unpardonable sin. Otherwise God would not promise to receive and forgive the backslider, as he does in so many places. If the backslider is sorry for his sin and goes back penitently, desiring to be forgiven, God will forgive him. Penitence is necessary. You would not forgive your child if he was not sorry for his fault. 3. The forgiveness of those who have injured us is a condition of our own forgiveness. The confession mentioned in the promise is not a mere lip confession, but a renunciation of sin, and the unforgiving man must renounce his unforgiving disposition with his other sins.

The introduction of secular music into religious services is a matter that calls for the utmost discretion and sound judgment. Nothing could be more out of place than to hear a congregation lending all the energies of its lungs to a hymn set to the tune of "Annie Laurie," "Robin Adair," or perhaps some melody already worn threadbare in the variety halls. Sentimental or sensuous music should not supersede the sacred and serious, in divine worship.

Inquirer, Burlington, Vt. Do you think it possible that the prophecy (11. Peter 3: 10) of the earth being burned up and the elements melted, could ever be literally fulfilled? Could anything cause soil and rock to burn?

Read in the light of other prophecies the indications are for a fire which shall purify rather than destroy. It is, however, quite conceivable that destruction by fire should occur. Many astronomers have held the belief that the earth is gradually being drawn nearer to the sun and that in the process of ages it may fall into it. If such an event should ever occur, the whole world and all in it would be consumed as the Apostle describes.

RUNNING THE GAUNTLET.

OR

THE SHIELD OF A CHRISTIAN MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

By W. L. S. BAKER.

CHAPTER XVII.

HAPPILY, Mr. Barclay had completed his arrangements in the investigation in England as to Nellie Walter's parentage before the news reached him of the failure of his firm. The distractions incident to that calamity might have absorbed all the young man's attention had the news reached him earlier and it might have so crippled him financially, that he could not have expended the funds necessary to have the mystery of Nellie's identity fully solved. But already a commission had been sent to Australia to take the deposition of the Scotch nurse who was in attendance on the children when one of them was drowned. Mr. Barclay was now simply waiting to receive the report of the commission and had leisure to make his plans for the future when the news of the failure arrived. After a delay that seemed interminable the report came to hand and Mr. Barclay put it with the account of the situation in the matter of the lawsuit, in succinct shape and mailed it to Mrs. Seymour. A few days later he closed his own business and followed it to America in person.

When Mrs. Seymour received the package of papers, she turned at once to the report from Australia, which as she had divined, was decisive and cleared away every shadow of doubt on the subject. It was a full and complete confession by the nurse of the deception that had been practised.

The nurse confessed that when she found that one of the children had been drowned, in the bathing-room of the Heath mansion house, she seized the living child, as if belonging to her mistress, Mrs. Walter, and handed the dead baby to Mrs. Seymour's nurse. The Scotch girl soon discovered the living child to be Mrs. Seymour's, by the scar on its arm caused by the physician's device to prevent their being mistaken one for the other. The nurse communicated that fact to Mrs. Walter upon her return from the drive; but Mrs. Seymour who was absent, attending her sick husband, would probably never know the truth, and, having another child, her son Milton, she would not miss the baby with the same keenness as if she had none. Mrs. Walter silenced the voice of her conscience and caring nothing for the sorrow of the sister whom she disliked, took possession of the infant Carrie and bribed the nurse to abet her in the crime.

of Mrs. Walter (which seemed like a punishment for her sin), and the removal of the nurse to Australia, placed the matter in a position almost beyond discovery, but for the persistent efforts of Mr. Barclay.

tion between the Seymour and Walter families, although having no idea what it for the astounding revelation which Mrs. Seymour at once communicated to her; but when Milton rushed into the room, were still children, being soothed by a comforting mother. All of them were weeping; not at lost pleasures and hopes, but at newly-found springs of joy, which would henceforth exist between these three loving hearts forevermore!

But what of Deacon Walter? The poor, desolate, heart-stricken man was overcome by the scene when he was hurriedly summoned to the Seymour cottage to hear the strange news, which practically involved the loss to him of his only child. He was crushed by the intelligence more than he had been by the ruin of his business and loss of his property. He stood behind the widow, weeping bitter tears; his hands covered his face, and he groaned in spirit as he uttered his silent prayer for grace and strength equal to his day.

He was a great sufferer, truly, but had he searched his own heart he could plainly have seen in his present anguish, a punishment for his conduct towards Mrs. Seymour, during most of the preceding ten years. His thoughts had been always full of suspicion; he impugned her motives and judged her improperly on many occasions; and he was but reaping the harvest he had sown. He was now convinced of his error, and saw in Mrs. Seymour, just what his friend, Mr. Plummer, had frequently assured him she was—a sincere, earnest, Christian woman.

It was finally arranged that for the present, Carrie should remain with Mr. Walter, until it was decided what was best to be done.

A few days subsequent to this, Mr. Barclay arrived from England bringing encouraging reports about the prospects of recovering the property belonging to Milton, and urged Mrs. Seymour to go in person to England and prosecute the claim.

She consulted Deacons Walter and Plummer, and finally decided to start on her journey as soon as arrangements could be completed, escorted by the former gentleman, who had business in Scotland. Deacon Plummer advanced the money to pay his brother deacon's expenses, as the latter was too much reduced even to command the amount necessary, while Mrs. Seymour executed a second mortgage on her home, borrowing thereby the money for her expenses, and for use in England. In a few weeks, the arrangements being all completed, they sailed from New York. Deacon going with them.

From the dock where he had watched the steamer depart, with his mother and Carrie and Mr. Walter on board, Milton strolled through the New York streets feeling very desolate and lonely. As he passed a brilliantly-lighted store, he noticed a tall, graceful lady, clad in cheap mourning dress. Something familiar about her figure and step caused him to look at her closely, but she was heavily veiled, and he could not see her features. Fearing to accost a stranger, Milton allowed she lived. He was convinced that this was Nellie Price, whose fate he had for weeks vainly striven to ascertain.

Milton was right. It was Nellie, changed, indeed, but Nellie herself. She disappeared in the hallway of a great ten-in toil for the household; cooking, cleaning, washing, ironing, to say nothing of the attention required by her brother. And then came ten hours of constant work in

O, man of wealth and pleasure; O, daughter of luxury and ease, you do not know,

This evening there was a crisis in the life of Harry, and for nourishing food which

Mrs. Price required. Nellie's poor four dollars a week was all they had, and every week some little treasure had to be sacrificed to cover expenses. On this evening, searching through her trunk for something she could pawn or sell, she had come upon a jewelry-case which had hitherto escaped her notice. It contained the costly set of coral presented to her by her mother on her birthday two years before. No doubt it cost over one hundred dollars, but she could not hope to sell it for more than twenty dollars; still, it had no hold upon her heart-strings, and finding it was like a providential interposition. She soon started out with the jewelry, and, after being questioned, scrutinized, even insulted, she pawned them for twenty-four dollars, and felt greatly relieved. With it all, on that very evening a song of prayer and praise went up from her humble home, in a sweet, confiding, trust voice.

For three successive days did Milton Seymour haunt the neighborhood of the tenement house, waiting to see Nellie come out again. But he was disappointed and dispirited at his want of success; a casual remark, however, made by a man on the first floor showed Milton that he had not been deceived in his recognition.

One day as he was watching the tenement house in the hope of again encountering Nellie, he saw Mr. Barclay approach, and remembering that his acquaintance with Nellie was longer than his own, he concluded that Mr. Barclay was there to see Nellie, Milton's jealousy was aroused but he gave his friend cordial greeting.

Whatever Mr. Barclay's object may have been, it was put aside in an evident wish to talk to Milton. "Several years ago," said Mr. Barclay with great seriousness when the first greeting had been exchanged, "it was my fortune or misfortune (whichever the ultimate result proves to be correct), to form the strongest affection for a beautiful young woman. The passion was not reciprocated, because of her attachment to another; but now matters have changed, and perhaps she is free; but unusual circumstances intervene—"

"Tut! tut? Barclay," said Milton, interrupting him with some impatience in his tone and manner, "if you refer to Nellie Price, the first thing is to find—halloo! what's that?"

A loud scream was heard from the upper window of the house near which they were standing.

"Some drunken man scaring his wife, I suspect," said Mr. Barclay. "Do not mind him, but attend to me, for I am very much concerned. Seymour, have you heard from your mother, or sister Carrie, lately?" asked Mr. Barclay, with a peculiar tenderness in his voice and manner, as he took the cherished name upon his lips.

"Yes," answered Seymour, "they took your advice and went to England. Mother hoped you could arrange to return, too. Carrie seemed to be very sorry you could not be with them. Perhaps she will be won by some aristocratic English lover."

Barclay's heart was too full to make any reply; too happy was he to know that Carrie, if she did not formally "let him know," at least had him in her thoughts, perhaps in her heart. But the English lover,—Ah!

Mr. Barclay had no heart to hear more, and shaking hands with Seymour walked briskly away. Milton was glad of his going for he caught sight of the same tall, graceful, sombre-attired figure he had seen a few days before. Hurrying after it, he said in a low, earnest voice: "Sister Nellie, will you not remove your veil, and shake hands with your old friend and brother, Milton Seymour."

The veil was removed, as was her glove, and the gaslight streamed into the pale face of Nellie Price. She placed her hand into Milton's warm grasp, and said:

"It is I, brother Milton; you may hardly recognize me after the changes produced by adversity. But I am not changed toward you. Remember I owe my life

She spoke warmly, but she had evidently been through a great deal of the relationship between Milton and Carrie, and supposed that they were still engaged to be married. "I am not changed toward you," she said, "but I am not changed toward you. Remember I owe my life to you. I would not allow her heart's affections to come again bound up in Milton, and to serve him, she would not do anything which tended to distract his thoughts from Carrie.

Before the interview closed Milton had told her all and she had learned to her intense joy that there was no longer a barrier to their love. Now that it was proved that Milton was Carrie's brother, Nellie could admit without dishonor that she had loved him from the first and could hear with joy his protestations of undying affection. Milton accompanied Nellie to her home that they might tell Mrs. Price of their plighted troth and receive her blessing.

A new surprise awaited them in the humble tenement. During Nellie's absence Mrs. Price had received a visit from her husband's partner, Mr. Gilchrist, whose misconduct had brought about the failure and had led to Mr. Price's death. He had been converted in a mission and in the strength of Christ had resolved to lead a new life. He had hunted up Mrs. Price's address and came to tell her the news and to assure her that his first step in his better course would be to make restitution as far as money could make it for the wrong he had done. As a proof of his sincerity he brought five hundred dollars with him which he placed in the delighted lady's hands as an earnest of future payments.

Mrs. Price gleefully showed Nellie the bills and bade her give up her place in the book-bindery at once and get their treasures out of pawn. With Mr. Gilchrist's undoubted ability, now that his habits were reformed there was no doubt of his making money and of restoring them to some measure of comfort.

Milton was so happy in his engagement and so busy in his plans for the future that he completely forgot Mr. Barclay. That gentleman had been unable to rest while Carrie was on the other side of the Atlantic, in danger of becoming the prey of some English aristocratic suitor. He had taken the first steamer after his interview with Milton. The result was told in a letter Milton received from his sister Carrie. She wrote:

"A great joy fills my heart, and I must tell you of that, first of all, after my sorrows and heart-breakings! I am engaged to Mr. Barclay; and he is as happy as I am. The dear fellow tells me that he has loved me for years, but he was too honorable to make it known. But mamma is also rejoicing; for years of anxiety, labor, expenditure and prayer have just been rewarded by a decree of the court, restoring the immense Heath estate of our great uncle, Arthur Heath, to his only male heir. Yes, my dear brother, you have two immense estates. Papa Walter is not exempt from our happiness, having received from his brothers money enough to pay off all of his debts. It gladdens my heart to see how cordial he is with mamma. All his old suspicion and dislike is gone; he knows how good she is and likes her exceedingly. God is blessing us, brother; let us return thanks to him."

Carrie told all she knew, but there was something she did not know. Deacon Walter had not only overcome his dislike of the widow, but had realized that his hopes of future happiness lay in a union with her, and after many urgent appeals Mrs. Seymour had consented to become his wife. But for the absurd English law prohibiting the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister they would have been married at the same time and place as Mr. Barclay and Carrie, who were united in a dingy London church one dull morning. Mr. Barclay had business arrangements which necessitated his remaining for several months, and he persuaded Carrie to cast in her lot with him. Deacon Walter and Mrs. Seymour came back to America soon after the ceremony. They clung to each other with a warmth of affection rare to people affianced in middle life. Perhaps it was their previous dislike drew them more closely together; or it may have been that both, losing their children, would now be alone in the world.

Milton and Nellie gave them a glad welcome and within a few weeks two weddings were celebrated at Brookdale which brought out the entire population of the town. Congratulations poured in on all hands, and it was difficult to tell whether the new Mrs. Seymour or the new Mrs. Walter was the more popular bride. Through many sorrows and trials they and their beloved husbands had passed into a haven of joy and peace.

Strong Faith.
Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning December 6.
Mark 9: 14-29.

ALTHOUGH people have ceased to ascribe physical disease to the possession of demons, they have not ceased to need the power which delivered the demoniac. If the boy, described in the passage associated with the topic, had lived in our day, he would not have been taken to a religious teacher, but to a physician, who would have treated him for epilepsy. But the change of method could not have improved on the result. The physician could not do more for the boy than Christ did, if he could do as much. The boy is represented as being perfectly cured. There are many eminent Christian teachers who contend that this power cures diseases still, and any remarkable cures have been reported; but the question which is of more vital concern to us is whether this power will not cure maladies more prevalent, which the physician cannot cure. It is useless to take to the physician, for cure, men who are suffering from violent and malignant tempers, men of coarse and profane lips, or men under the power of their passions and lusts. For the novation of these a higher power is needed than the physician has at command. There is abundant evidence that this power is in existence, and operates with invariable success. There are scores of missions in our land which could produce specimen cases of sober men who were once drunkards, men of pure lives who were once vicious, honest men who were once incorrigible thieves, gamblers, and men of generally kindly disposition who were once brutal; and these men testify that the power which transformed them is the power of Christ. The manner of the cures is much a mystery to us as was to the Apostles. We know only that the same conditions are indispensable. "If you canst believe," is still the stipulation Christ makes. The man who lays hold on the power with his faith, the blessing is sure. And the converse is still true, that there are cases in which Christ himself can do no mighty works because of their unbelief." Dimly and imperfectly we get glimpses of the subjective psychological working of this mysterious force. Physicians confess that in difficult cases there is an important factor in their problems. If the patient has faith in the physician's skill, the prospects of a cure are materially increased. Why it should be so, we do not know, but the fact is well established. And in these supernatural cures there is no room for doubt. Once get a man, who desires to be delivered from his sins, to believe that Christ will deliver him and will deliver him, and he will be delivered. The thing has been tested and proved from the days of Augustine to the present day. Then there is another side to the subject. The disciples tried to cure the sufferer and failed. So the church often is now. But the cause of the failure is far to seek. If Christian people believed that Christ had the power to save people from their sins; if in the pulpit there was less frivolity, less preaching on evasive subjects, less half-heartedness and hesitation, and a bold, unwavering, hesitating faith in Christ's power, we would see miracles again. The power of living faith has never reached its limits.

THE NIGHTINGALE PSALM.

THIS precious Psalm, O, heart song, rare,
For Faith's dear children on life's ways,
Breathing the comfort of God's love,
Through lengthening years of earthly days.
Jehovah, Lord, my Shepherd is,
He leadeth me, still holds my hand,
In pastures green he makes me rest,
Beside still waters with him stand.

Aroma of the Sabbath breath.
Through this loved Psalm like odors comes,
From gardens fair of spices sweet,
Laden with choicest rich perfumes,
The lullaby of God's own love;
Cradled and turned by him in heaven,
With soothing charm for rest and cheer,
To earth's poor crying children given.

By the Good Shepherd guided still,
I forward go in untrodden way,
His road from wandering keeps me safe,
The Saviour still, my staff my stay,
Still struggling in earth's wilderness;
Entering death's shadowed valley lone,
List to the Shepherd's tender voice:
"Fear not, I'm ever with my own."

Goodness and Mercy—angels fair—
Through all my life shall follow me,
Until I reach the blessed end—
My eyes the King in beauty see,
And still in heaven mid music rapt,
The melody of seraph choir,
It will be sweet to sing this Psalm,
While David tunes immortal lyre.

Israel's Restoration.

The Lost Ten Tribes to be Gathered with the Jews in one Nation.

BY REV. E. J. HYTCHE.

HOLY Scripture contains many definite promises to the descendants of Jacob that, whether they be Judahites, or the sons of Ephraim, their dispersion shall end, and that at an assigned period. One prediction will suffice to show this fact (Deut. 30:1-5): "For when they shall return unto Jehovah, their God, and shall obey thy voice according to all that I command thee—thou and thy children, with all thy heart and all thy soul"—then as a result of such national penitence God says, "I will have compassion on them, and will return and gather them from all the nations. If any of thee be driven unto the utmost parts of heaven, from thence will the Lord thy God gather thee, and from thence he will fetch thee." Yet, after all, this is but a specimen of the teaching of all the Hebrew prophets, from Isaiah to Malachi, as to the future national existence and the restoration of the Jews when "the time" or the reign of the Gentiles shall come to an end. And more even than this: for during the Millennial Age they will—as in the days of David and Solomon—become one nation. For the Divine promise, by the pen of Ezekiel, has never been fulfilled (Ezek. 37:15-22). "I will take the children of Israel from among the Gentiles whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side and bring them into their own land, and I will make them one nation upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all." The distinction between the ten and the two tribes is forcibly expressed by Isaiah when he intimated that God (Isa. 11:12), will "assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth." The same distinction between the houses of Judah and Ephraim will mark this personal interposition of the most High on their behalf. For, by the pen of Zechariah, God said (10:6-8), "I will strengthen the house of Judah, and I will save the house of Joseph, and I will bring them again to place them. And they of Ephraim shall be like a mighty man, and their heart shall rejoice as through wine—yea, their children shall see it." But there is reason to believe that at first they will not arrive there en masse, but in units: and hence we read (Jer. 2:14), "I will take you one of a city, and two of a family, and will bring you to Zion," a phrase synonymous with Jerusalem. The ten tribes, however, will not thus return by relays which may be counted on the fingers, they will be restored not by units, but as a great nation. Hence it is Hosea, who was the prophet of the ten tribes, says, as the amanuensis of the Holy Spirit (Hos. 2:14-15), "I will allure her and bring her into the wilderness, and speak friendly to her; and I will give her her vineyards from thence [that is the desert], and the valley of Achor for a door of hope, and she shall sing there as in the days of her youth." At present there are but few signs of the approaching restoration of Judah, and much less of Ephraim, but of this we may be sure, that God having promised, will surely bring it to pass in his own time.

Unsanctified Coin.

Unconsecrated gifts are an offence to the Almighty. "There is not one reason for the Church of God posing before the world as a money-making institution," writes Rev. E. W. McClusky. "Our Lord does not need unsanctified coin, nor does he ask his people to secure it by all sorts of worldly methods. He ordained giving as an act of worship, not because he desired or needed a gift, but because of the fruit that would abound to the account of the giver." When the Christian can say, he is sure to receive in return 'good measure and running over.' These money-making methods rob the Christian more or less of the burdens—the spiritual or temporal blessings—that can come to him only as a result of giving to the Lord. Especially are they a stumbling-block in the way of the weak brethren and the babes in Christ. Many have never learned to give. Missions languish not because of lack of funds, but because so many of God's children do not realize what a privilege it is to give to the Lord. The church is simply reaping what it has sown."

SINGER SEWING MACHINES do Good Work DURING A LIFETIME.

There is a big difference between the cost of making a first-class sewing machine, embodying the best of materials and workmanship, and one made in the cheapest manner. The buyer of the cheap machine soon pays the difference of price in the constant cost for repairs, to say nothing of its annoying inefficiency.

Results Make Reputation.

Singer Machines, either lock-stitch or chain-stitch, are the successful result of long experience and constant improvements in the endeavor to make nothing but the best sewing machines for family use. The accomplishment of this result requires six of the largest, best-equipped factories in the world, the best inventive talent of the age, and the constant employment of twelve thousand workmen. Singer Machines are sold only by our employees, and not through dealers or department stores.

The Value of Reputation.

A reputation based on half a century's experience, dealing directly with the women of the family all over the world, is unique, and stimulates a worthy pride. THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY aims to maintain its well-earned reputation for fair dealing during all time. It is permanent, its offices are in every city in the world, and parts and supplies for its machines can always be easily obtained.

Requests for Prayer.

AT the Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Nov. 1, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

For the Conversion of Relatives and Friends. "Distressed Wife," Springfield, Ill., that God would change the heart of her husband.

who has deserted her, and convert him, wherever he may be, and bring him back to his home a new creature in Christ.—Devoted wife, Monie, Ill., for the conversion of her husband, who is leading a good moral life, but is intolerant of religion; also that a brother who is breaking the hearts of his godly parents, and is setting a bad example to his young children, may be led to repent of his sins and give his heart to God.—Anxious Mother, North East, Pa., that her only child might turn to the Lord and become dutiful and obedient.—Grieving Wife, Pemberton, Colo., for the conversion of her husband, and that grace may be given him to control his temper, and enable him to overcome his habit of profanity, which is detrimental to his children.—Subscriber, Washington Co., O., that God would look upon his unconverted sons and answer the many prayers offered on their behalf.—Young Believer, Bradford, Pa., that a very dear friend may be brought to feel his need of a Saviour, and find in Christ the one thing he lacks.—Anxious Wife, Bonham, Tex., that a beloved one whose feet have been traveling in forbidden paths may seek forgiveness through Christ, and may receive grace to trust in the Lord's strength, instead of his own.—Believer, Newark, N. J., that God in his mercy would save a beloved friend and keep her from the sin that will cause her irreparable shame.—Anxious Mother, Patriot, O., that one who in great sorrow has lost faith and hope may be brought to trust in Christ to the salvation of her soul.

For the Restoration of Health. Reader, Sioux Falls, S. D., for the recovery of a man who is very sick.—M. A. B., Lyme, N. H., for the recovery of one who has suffered long from nervous prostration.—G. A. M., Washington, D. C., for the recovery of a dear father, who has been ill several months.—Subscriber, Washington Co., O., that a wife who is critically ill may recover.—Believer, New Plymouth, O., that a wife may recover her health.—The following persons also ask for prayer that God would heal them of their sicknesses: Troubled One, Lakeland, Fla.; Brother, Leetonia, O.; J., Chicago, Ill.; Grieving Wife and Mother, Pemberton, Colo.; Constant Reader, Averitt, Va.; W., Forestville, Conn.; E. W., Fall River, Mass.; M. E. C., Minneapolis, Minn.; A. W., Cuyahoga Falls, O.; Christian, Hayesville, O.

Many other requests for prayer were received and were duly presented at the Converts' Prayer Meeting, as were those on November 8 and 15, but we have not space this week to publish them in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

New Cure for Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.—Free to All Readers.

Readers will be glad to know that the new botanical discovery, Alkavis, has proved an assured cure for all diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or by disordered action of the kidneys or urinary organs. It is a wonderful discovery, with a record of 1200 hospital cures in 30 days. It acts directly upon the blood and kidneys, and is a true specific, just as quinine is in malaria. We have the strongest testimony of many ministers of the gospel, and renowned doctors in this business, men cured by Alkavis, when all other remedies had failed. Many ladies also testify to its curative powers in disorders peculiar to womanhood. So far the Church Kidney Cure Company, No. 414 Fourth Avenue, New York are the only importers of this new remedy, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis (replied by mail) to every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. It is sent to you entirely free, to prove its wonderful curative powers.

Armenian Relief.

Progress of the Work The Sultan's Promises The Refugees in America.

ALBANY Every cable despatch now received from Constantinople contains some statement intended to reassure the friends of Armenia. Little confidence is placed in Abdul Hamid's promises, however, either by the European Powers or their Ambassadors at the Turkish capital. The latest cablegrams show that while peace prevails, the situation is really critical, and the families of the diplomats and influential foreigners have left Constantinople, in anticipation of trouble in the near future. It is not believed, however, that the Moslem authorities will again attempt the enforcement of a policy of ruthless massacre, since it would be almost certain to be followed by European intervention.

Distress and suffering still exist in many parts of Armenia, and especially in the Harpoot district. Reports from other quarters seem to indicate a perceptible subsidence of the suffering. Since the opening of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Relief Fund, nearly $48,000 have been distributed in relief measures at various points in the field, including Van and sixteen other stations in Armenia proper, the relief station for fugitive Armenians at Urumiah, Persia, the work among the exiles at Marseilles, France (concerning which Miss Frances Willard has written a characteristic letter to our readers, which we print on page 880), and the work among the exiles who have reached these shores and been sheltered in New York. During the week $1,000 has been appropriated from the Fund toward the feeding and sheltering at the Salvation Army's Farm at Ramsey, N. J., of the exiles who came on the Obdam and California.

The following additional sums have been contributed to the work:

	$51,557.06
Mrs. C. E. Church	2.00
Junior C. E. Society, Middle Valley	3.00
M. I. Honell	75

A WONDERFUL BARGAIN!!

$150 GOLD AND "Samantha at Saratoga" FREE!

The great 583-page subscription book, with hundreds of illustrations. Our sole object in making this remarkable offer, which involves a positive financial sacrifice on the part of the publisher of WOMAN'S WORLD AND JENNIES MILLER MONTHLY, is to increase our list of new subscribers.

Everybody knows "Josiah Allen's Wife." Everybody should know her latest book, "Samantha at Saratoga." This book was written under the inspiration of the summer season 'mid the world of fashion at Saratoga, the proudest pleasure resort of America, where princes of the old world, with Congressmen, Presidents, Millionaires, Railroad Kings and Princes of Commerce of our own great nation, with their wives, their beautiful daughters and all the gayest butterflies of fashion, luxuriate in balmy breezes, display their person in costly jewels, exquisite equipages, and revel in all the extremes of fashionable dissipation. "Samantha at Saratoga" is a volume of common sense that is pure and innocent, as the prattle of a child, keeps the reader constantly enjoying at ever fresh feast of fun. This work is issued in one volume of 583 pages, size 8x6, and 2 1-8 in. thick, and weighs 2 lbs. and 4 ozs. Printed on a superior quality of paper, made expressly for this work, profusely illustrated by E. Opper of F. & Z., and is the regular subscription book that sells for $2.50.

Who can form the greatest number of words from the letters in INDUSTRIOUS? You can make twenty or more words, we feel sure, and if you do you will receive a great reward if you comply with the simple directions in this advertisement and use the letter more times than it appears in the word. This Settles It!

No person can possibly doubt the truth of our statements herein. You could not be justified in doing so? Would it be possible for us to fool the readers of this paper year after year? Would The Christian Herald, the greatest religious paper in the world be a party to such deception? Would thousands upon thousands of its readers write letters to us saying we do as we agree, and give more than we advertize? Would the refined intelligence and religious scruples of Church members deliberately give their sanction and assistance to fraud, misrepresentation and unfairness? And would these people urge their friends, relatives, and neighbors to buy sets of these famous World's Fair Souvenir Teaspoons if they were not exactly as we represent them—the GREATEST BARGAIN ever offered by a reliable firm! We make these statements and ask these questions to banish your last, lingering doubt; to brush aside your hesitation; and convince you that for a wedding, birthday, or Christmas present, or for daily table use, or to save as a memento of the great World's Fair, a set of six of these matchless Teaspoons at 99 cents is unquestionably an opportunity that you must not overlook.

These two letters were not solicited by us. Don't look upon them as "testimonials," but as genuine remarks of appreciation from total strangers.

GENTLEMEN: * * * I wish to thank you for the very liberal manner in which you have treated me in sending premiums as they have all been quadruple plate instead of triple plate as I expected. It is refreshing in these days to find a concern that gives more than they advertise.

Visitors to the World's Fair will remember seeing Souvenir Spoons sold on the grounds at $1.50 each, or $9.00 for six, while here we sell you a set of six for only 99 cents.

A Bargain Indeed!

The spoons are divided into two different sets as follows; Set No. 4 comprises these six buildings—Manufacturers, Horticultural, Woman's, Fisheries, Machinery Hall, Transportation. Set No. 5 comprises these six—Administration, Art, Agriculture, Electrical, Mining, Government.

You can have either set you like, but under no circumstances will less than a set of six be sold, nor will they be divided in any other manner than above. Bear in mind that these are not cheap, washed-over spoons, but genuine triple-plate silver on white metal, stamped LEONARD MFG. CO., A 1—a guarantee of reliability. They are

These are the original World's Fair Souvenir Teaspoons. The price of 1893 and all failure of a syndicate of private persons to produce at the Fair, have now thrown them back on our hands, and clearly but surely we are awakened to the public in the fact that the most beautiful, the most reliable, and the most serviceable, a set of six of these matchless Teaspoons at 99 cents is the Grandest Bargain of the Times.

You will pay $1.50 for six ordinary plain, plated spoons—here you get a beautiful pattern, with gold-plated bowls, at only 99 cents for six. A hundred dollars invested in something else for a birthday, wedding, or Christmas gift wouldn't give half the genuine delight and satisfaction. Our references are the First National Bank, Chicago, any Express Company, or Bradstreet's reports. Send money by express or postoffice money order, or registered letter. We do not accept personal checks. State whether you prefer set No. 4 or set No. 5. Be sure to send for our new 1896-97 Catalogue of incomparable silverware bargains; mailed free. Address

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

RUTH THE GLEANER

THE DYING CENTURY.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: II. Kings 20:1. "Thus saith the Lord, Set thine house in order; for thou shalt die, and not live."

Nineteenth! O alarm bell do I ring in the utterance of this text, for in the healthy glow of your countenances I find cause only for cheerful prophecy; but I shall apply the text as spoken in the ear of Hezekiah, down with a bad carbuncle, to the nineteenth century, now closing. It will take only four more long breaths, each year a breath, and the century will expire. My theme is The Dying Century. I discuss it at an hour when our National Legislature is assembling, some of the members now here present, and others will arrive by the midnight trains, and to-morrow morning, from the North, South, East, and West, all the public conveyances coming this way will bring important additions of public men, so that when to-morrow, at high noon, the gavel of Senate and House of Representatives shall lift and fall, the destinies of this nation, and through it the destinies of all nations struggling to be free, will be put on solemn and tremendous trial. Amid such intensifying circumstances I stand by the venerable Century, and address it in the words of my text, "Thus saith the Lord, Set thine house in order; for thou shalt die, and not live."

Eternity is too big a subject for us to understand. Some one has said it is a great clock, that says "Tick" in one century, and "Tack" in another. But we can better understand Old Time, who has many children, and they are the centuries, and many grand-children, and they are the years. With the dying Nineteenth Century we shall this morning have a plain talk, telling him some of the good things he has done, and then telling him some of the things he ought to adjust before he quits this sphere and passes out to join the eternities. We generally wait until people are dead before we say much in praise of them. Funeral eulogium is generally very pathetic and eloquent with things that ought to have been said years before. We put on cold tombstones what we ought to have put in the warm ears of the living. We curse Charles Sumner while he is living, and cudgel him into spinal meningitis, and wait until, in the rooms where I have been living the last year, he puts his hand on his heart and cries "Oh!" and is gone, and then Doctor Sunderland, Chaplain of the American Senate, accompanying; stopping long enough to allow the dead Senator to lie in state in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, and then to the grave. Not long before, damnable resolutions had been passed in regard to him, and then the boom of minute-guns, until we bury him at Mount Auburn and cover him with flowers. What a pity that he could not have been awake at his own funeral!

What a pity that one green leaf could not have been taken from each one of the trees while he was yet alive at the Arlington! What a pity that out of the great choirs who chanted at his obsequies one little girl, dressed in white, might not have solo! The post-mortem expression contradicted the ante-mortem. The nation could not have spoken the truth both times about Charles Sumner. Was it before or after his decease it lied? No such injustice shall be inflicted upon this venerable Nineteenth Century. Before he goes we recite in his hearing some of the good things he has accomplished. What an addition to the world's intelligence he has made! Look at the old school-house, with the snow sifting through the roof and the filthy tin cup hanging over the water-pail in the corner, and the little victims on the long benches without backs, and the illiterate schoolmaster with his hickory gad, and then look at our modern palaces of free schools, under men and women cultured and refined to the highest excellence, so that, whereas in our childhood we had to be whipped to go to school, children now cry when they cannot go. Thank you, venerable Century, while at the same time we thank God. What an addition to the world's inventions! Within our century the cotton gin. The agricultural machines, for planting, reaping and threshing. The telegraph. The phonograph, capable of preserving a human voice from generation to generation. The typewriter, that rescues the world from worse and worse penmanship. And stenography, capturing from the lips of the swiftest speaker more than two hundred words a minute. Never was I so amazed at the facilities of our time as when, a few days ago, I telegraphed from Washington to New York a long and elaborate manuscript, and a few minutes after, to show its accuracy, it was read to me through the long-distance telephone, and it was exact down to the last semicolon and comma. What hath God wrought! Oh, I am so glad I was not born sooner. For the tallow candle the electric light. For the writhings of the surgeon's table God-given anæsthetics, and the whole physical organism explored by sharpest instrument, and giving not so much pain as the taking of a splinter from under a child's finger-nail. For the lumbering stage-coach the limited express train. And there is the spectroscopic Fraunhofer, by which our modern scientist feels the pulse of other worlds throbbing with light. Jenner's arrest by inoculation of one of the world's worst plagues. Doctor Keeley's emancipation for inebriety. Intimation that the virus of maddened canine, and cancer, and consumption are yet to be balked by magnificent medical treatment. The eyesight of the doctor sharpened till he can look through thick flesh and find the hiding-place of the bullet. What advancement in geology, or the catechism of the mountains; chemistry, or the catechism of the elements; astronomy, or the catechism of the stars; electricity, or the catechism of the lightnings. What a development in the arts! At the beginning of the century, clothing itself, so far as the great masses of the people were concerned, to a few and distant, got on a common mass of church-bass viol, was enchantingly dropping from thousands of fingers in Handel's Concerto in B Flat, or Guilman's Sonata in D Minor. Thanks to you, O Century! before you die, for the asylums of mercy that you have founded,—the blind seeing with their fingers, the deaf hearing by the motion of your lips, the born imbecile by skilful object-lesson lifted to tolerable intelligence. Thanks to this century for the improved condition of most nations. The reason that Napoleon made such a successful sweep across Europe at the beginning of the century was that most of the thrones of Europe were occupied either by imbeciles or profligates. But most of the thrones of Europe are to-day occupied by kings and queens competent. France a republic, Switzerland a republic, and about fifty free constitutions, I am told, in Europe. Twenty million serfs of Russia manumitted. On this Western continent I can call the roll of many republics,—Mexico, Guatemala, San Salvador, Costa Rica, Paraguay, Uruguay, Honduras, New Granada, Venezuela, Peru, Ecuador, Bolivia, Chili, Argentine Republic, Brazil. The once straggling village of Washington to which the United States Government moved, its entire baggage and equipment packed up in seven boxes which got lost in the woods near this place, now the architectural glory of the continent, and admiration of the world.

The money power, so much denounced and often justly criticised, has covered this continent with universities, and free libraries, and asylums of mercy. The newspaper press which, at the beginning of the century was an ink-roller, by hand moved over one sheet of paper at a time, has become the miraculous manufacturer of four or five, or six hundred thousand sheets for one daily newspaper's issue. Within your memory, O Dying Century! has been the genesis of nearly all the great institutions evangelistic. At London Tavern, March 7, 1802, British and Foreign Bible Society was born. In 1816 American Bible Society was born. In 1824 American Sunday School Union was born. In 1810 American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, which has put its saving hand on every nation of the round earth, was born at a haystack in Massachusetts. The National Temperance Society, the Women's Temperance Society, and all the other temperance movements born in this century. Africa, hidden to other centuries, by exploration in this century has been put at the feet of civilization, to be occupied by commerce and Christianity. The Chinese wall, once an impassable barrier, now is a useless pile of stone and brick. Our American nation at the opening of this century only a slice of land along the Atlantic coast, now the whole continent in possession of our schools and churches and missionary stations. Sermons and religious intelligence which in other times, if noticed at all by the newspaper press, were allowed only a paragraph of three or four lines, now find the columns of the secular press in all the cities, thrown wide open, and every week for twenty-six years without the omission of a single week, I have been permitted to preach one entire Gospel sermon through the newspaper press. I thank God for this great opportunity. Glorious Old Century! You shall not be entombed until we have, face to face, exalted you. You were rocked in a rough cradle, and the inheritance you received was for the most part poverty, and struggle, and hardship, and poorly covered graves of heroes and heroines of whom the world had not been worthy, and atheism, and military despotism, and the wreck of the French revolution. You inherited the influences that resulted in Aaron Burr's treason, and another war with England, and Battle of Lake Erie, and Indian savagery, and Lundy's Lane, and Dartmoor massacre, and dissension, bitter and wild beyond measurement, and African slavery, which was yet to cost a national hemorrhage of four awful years and a million precious lives. Yes, dear Old Century, you had an awful start, and you have done more than well, considering your parentage and your early environment. It is a wonder you did not turn out to be the vagabond century of all time. You had a bad mother and a bad grandmother. Some of the preceding centuries were not fit to live in,—their morals were so bad, their fashions were so outrageous, their ignorance was so dense, their inhumanity so terrific. O Dying Nineteenth Century before you go we take this opportunity telling you that you are the best and the mightiest of all the centuries of the Christian Era, except the first, which gave the Christ, and you rival that century the fact that you, more than all the other centuries put together, are giving the Christ to all the world. One hundred and twelve thousand dollars at one meeting few days ago contributed for the world evangelization. Look at what you have done, O thou abused and depreciated Century! All the Pacific isles, barred and bolted against the Gospel when you began to reign, now all open, and some of them more Christianized than America. No more, as once written over the church doors in Cape Colony, "Dogs and Hottentots not admitted." The late Mr. Darwin contributing twenty-five dollars to the Southern Missionary Society. Cannibalism driven off the face of the earth. The gates of all nations wide open for the Gospel entrance when the church shall give up its intellectual dandyism, and quit going with higher criticism, and plunge in the work, as at a life-saving station the crew pull out with the life-boat to take the sailors off a ship going to pieces in the Skerries. I thank you, old and dying Century; all heaven thanks you, and surely the nations of the earth ought to thank you. I put before your eyes, soon to dim for the last sleep, the facts tremendous. I take your wrinkled old hand and shake it in congratulation. I bathe your fevered brow, and freshen your parched lips from the fountains of eternal victory.

But my text suggests that there are some things that this century ought to do before he leaves us. "Thus saith the Lord, Set thine house in order; for thou shalt die, and not live." We ought not to let this century go before two or three things are set in order. For one thing, this quarrel between labor and capital. The nineteenth century inherited it from the eighteenth century, but do not let this nineteenth century bequeath it to the twentieth. "What we want," says labor, "to set right is more strikes and more vigorous work with torch and dynamite." "What we want," says capital, "is a tighter grip on the working classes and compulsion to take what wages we choose to pay, with reference to their needs." Both wrongs sin. Both defiant. Until the Day of Judgment no settlement of the quarrel, if you leave it to British, Russian or American politics. The religion of Jesus Christ ought to come in within the next few years and take the hand of capital and employee and say, "You have tried everything else, and failed; now try the Gospel of Kindness. No more oppression and no more strikes. The Gospel of Jesus Christ will sweeten this acerbity, or it will go on to the end of time, and the fires that burn the world will crackle in the ears of wrathful perversity and indignant toil while their hands are still clutching at each other's throats. Before this century sighs its last breath would that swarthy labor and easy elegance would come up and let the Carpenter of Nazareth join their hands in pledged everlasting kindness and peace. When men and women are dying they are apportioned among their children mementoes, and one is given a watch, and another a vase, and another a picture, and another a robe. Let this veteran Century, before it dies, hand over to the human race, with an impressiveness that shall last forever, its old family keepsake, the golden keepsake which nearly nineteen hundred years ago was handed down from the black rock of the Mount of Beatitudes: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets."

Another thing that needs to be set in order before the veteran Century quits is a more thorough and all-embracing plan for the world's gardenization. We have been trying to save the world from the pest, and it cannot be done that way. It is got to be saved from the bottom. The Church ought to be only a West Point to drill soldiers for outside battle. What if a military academy should keep its students from age to age in the mess-room and the barracks? No, no! They are wanted at Montezuma, and Chapultepec, and South Mountain, and Missionary Ridge, and the church is no place for a Christian to stay very long. He is wanted at the front. He is needed in the desperate charge of taking the parapets. The last great battle for God is not to be fought on the campus of a college or the lawn of a church. It is to be fought at Missionary Ridge. What is the providential meaning? The greatest of all evangelists since Bible times recently suggested that the evening services in all the churches be turned into the most popular style of evangelistic meetings for outsiders. Surely that is an experiment worth making. If that does not succeed, then it does seem to me all the churches which cannot secure sufficient evening audiences, ought to shut up their buildings at night and go where the people are, and invite them to come to the Gospel banquet.

Let the Christian souls, bountifully fed in the morning, go forth in the afternoon and evening to feed the multitudes of outsiders starving for the bread of which if a man eat he shall never again hunger. Among those clear down the Gospel would make more rapid conquest than among those who know so much and have so much that God cannot teach or help them. In those lower depths splendid fellows in the rough, like the shoe-black, that a reporter saw near New York City Hall. He asked the boy to black his boots. The boy came up to his work provokingly slow, and had just begun when a large boy shoved him aside and began the work, and the reporter approved him as being a bully, and the boy replied: "Oh, that's all right. I am going to do it for 'im. You see he's been sick in the hospital more'n a month; so us boys turn in and give 'im a lift." "Do all the boys help him?" asked the reporter. "Yes, sir; when they ain't got no job themselves and Jim gets one, they turn in and help 'im, for he ain't strong yet, you see." "How much percentage does he give you?" said the reporter. The boy replied, "I don't keep none of it. I ain't no such sneak as that. All the boys give up what they git on his job. I'd like to catch any feller sneaking on a sick boy, I would." The reporter gave him a twenty-five-cent piece, and said, "You keep ten cents for yourself, and give the rest to Jim." "Can't do it, sir; it's his customer. Here, Jim." Did such big souls as that strew all the lower depths of the cities, and get them converted to God, this would be the last full century of the world's sin, and but little work of evangelization would be left for the next century. Before this century expires let there be a combined effort to save the great cities of America and Great Britain, and all Europe, and of all Christendom.

What an awful thing it would be for you, Dying Century! to bequeath to the coming century, as yet innocent and unscarred with a single sin or burdened with a single sorrow, the blasphemy, the lawlessness, the atheism, the profligacy, and the woes of great cities still unevangelized. Nearly all the centuries closed with something tremendous. Why may not this century close in the salvation of America? do not know whether our theological friends, who have studied the subject more than I have, are right or wrong when they say Christ will come in person to set up his kingdom in this world; but though he would be overwhelmed with our unorthodoxy, I would like to see Christ descend from heaven in one of the clouds of this morning, and planting his feet on this earth, which he came centuries ago to save, declare his reign of love, and mercy, and salvation on earth begun. And what more appropriate place—I say it reverentially—for such a divine landing than the capital of a continent never cursed by the tyrannies and superstitions of the old world?

What has this Dying Nineteenth Century to tell us before he goes? We all love to hear septuagenarians, octogenarians, nonagenarians, and centenarians talk. We gather around the arm-chair and listen till it is far on into the night, and never weary of hearing their experiences. But Lord Lyndhurst, at 88 years of age, pouring into the ears of the House of Lords, in a four-hours' address, the experiences of a lifetime, and Apollonius, at 100 years of age, recounting his travels to thrilled listeners, and Charles Macklin, at 107 years of age, absorbing the attention of his hearers, and Ralph Farnham, of our country, at 107 years, telling the Prince of Wales the story of Bunker Hill, can create no such interest as this dying centenarian, if he will only speak.

Tell us, O Nineteenth Century! before you go, in a score of sentences, some of the things you have heard and seen. The veteran turns upon us and says: "I saw Thomas Jefferson riding in unattended from Monticello, only a few steps from where you stand, dismount from his horse and hitch the bridle to a post, and cessors put together. For all you who hear or read this valedictory I have kindled all the domestic firesides by which you ever sat, and roused all the halloos and roundelays and merriments you have ever heard, and unrolled all the glorious sunrises and all the pictured sunsets and starry banners of the midnight heavens that you have ever gazed at.

"But before I go, take this admonition and benediction of a Dying Century. The longest life, like mine, must close: Opportunities gone never come back, as I could prove from nigh a hundred years of observation: The eternity that will soon take me will soon take you: The wicked live not out half their days, as I have seen in ten thousand instances: The only influence for making the world happy is an influence that I, the Nineteenth Century, inherited from the first century of the Christian Era—the Christ of all the centuries. Be not deceived by the fact that I have lived so long, for a century is a large wheel that turns a hundred smaller wheels, which are the years; and each one of those years turns three hundred and sixty-five smaller wheels, which are the days; and each one of the three hundred and sixty-five days turns twenty-four smaller wheels, which are the hours; and each one of those twenty-four hours turns sixty smaller wheels, which are the minutes; and on yonder hill take the oath of the presidential office. I saw yonder Capitol ablaze with war's incendiarism. I saw the puff of the first steam engine in America. I heard the thunders of Waterloo, of Sebastopol, and Sedan, and Gettysburg. I was present at all the coronations of the kings and queens, and emperors and empresses now in the world's palaces. I have seen two billows roll across this continent and from ocean to ocean; a billow of revival joy in 1857, and a billow of blood in 1864. I have seen four generations of the human race march across this world and disappear. I saw their cradles rocked and their graves dug. I have heard the wedding bells and the death knells of near a hundred years. I have clapped my hands for millions of joys and wrung them in millions of agonies. I saw Macready and Edwin Forrest act, and Edward Payson pray. I heard the first chime of Longfellow's rhythms, and before anyone else saw them I read the first line of Bancroft's History, and the first verse of Bryant's 'Thanatopsis,' and the first word of Victor Hugo's almost supernatural romance. I heard the music of all the Grand Marches and the lament of all the Requiems that for nigh ten decades made the cathedral windows shake.

"I have witnessed more moral and spiritual victories than all of my prede-those sixty minutes turn still smaller wheels, which are the seconds. And all of this vast machinery is in perpetual motion, and pushes us on and on toward the great eternity whose doors will, at 12 o'clock of the winter night between the year nineteen hundred, and the year nineteen hundred and one, open before me, the Dying Century. I quote from the three inscriptions over the three doors of the Cathedral of Milan. Over one door, amid a wreath of sculptured roses, I read: 'All that which pleases us is but for a moment.' Over another door, around a sculptured cross, I read: 'All that which troubles us is but for a moment.' But over the central door I read: 'That only is important which is eternal.' O Eternity! Eternity! Eternity!"

My hearers, as the Nineteenth Century was born while the face of this nation was yet wet with tears because of the fatal horseback ride that Washington took, out here at Mt. Vernon, through a December snowstorm, I wish the next century might be born at a time when the face of this nation shall be wet with the tears of the literal or spiritual arrival of the Great Deliverer of Nations, of whom St. John wrote with apocalyptic pen: "And I saw, and behold a white horse: and he that sat on him had a bow: and a crown was given unto him: and he went forth conquering, and to conquer."

Ruth, the Moabitess.

no literature in the world, outside of the pages of the Sacred Book itself, can a story be found at once so touching, so simple, and so beautiful, as that of Ruth the Moabitess. It is related that when our kindly philosopher, Benjamin Franklin, was in France, he heard that a number of the Parisian litterati were wont to gather in a certain saloon and ridicule the old Bible as an illiterate compilation. He heard enough to convince him that they were only imperfectly acquainted with the Book. One evening he attended a meeting, and during a pause in the discussion, he expressed a wish to have the opinion of those eminent critics on an Eastern tale he had fortunately discovered, and which was probably new to most of those present. Might he read it to them? They nodded assent, and Franklin asked a pleasant-voiced friend to do the reading. As she proceeded, they were enraptured, and their exclamations of admiration were loud and frequent. Many declared it an exquisite literary gem—a precious find—and some suggested that it be printed and given to the world. Franklin looked at them calmly. "Gentlemen," said he, a smile breaking out over his sturdy face, "what you have just heard is the story of Ruth, which is contained in that Bible that you so much love to abuse as an illiterate production."

But the whole Christian world knows the entrancing pastoral of Ruth, whose beautiful self-sacrifice, in leaving home and friends to share the meagre fortunes of Naomi, was so richly rewarded. In the color picture on the first page of this issue, the Moabitess is seen in the field of Boaz, whose wife she afterwards became, and through him the ancestress of David and Christ. On the death of her sons, Naomi had decided to return to her native land, and then the filial affection of Ruth found expression in her loving declaration: "Whither thou goest, I will go, and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people will be my people, and thy God my God."

Doubtless the story of her virtues and her tender devotion to her mother-in-law, as well as her preference for Israel as a home, were known in Bethlehem and had possibly reached the ears of Boaz. There was something very tender and noble in his act when he spoke to his young men in behalf of Ruth, who was gathering after his reapers in the barley-field. He was doubtless a large-hearted, generous man, who made his wealth a blessing to all around him. It is a part of the Jewish religion to practice "alms-deeds," and there were many minor benevolences designed for aiding the poor and unfortunate, one being that the corners of the field must not be wholly reaped, nor the gleanings of the harvest or the vineyard too closely gathered. It was in recognition of this sacred custom that Boaz commanded his young men to let Ruth glean; but his heart was touched with pity, also, for he directed that they permit her "to glean even among the sheaves and reproach her not."

That this tender and unusual regard for her welfare by the master of the field did not pass unnoticed by Ruth, can readily be understood.

These acts of kindness were happy omens for the future of the Moabitess. In Oriental lands, the position of a widow is peculiarly insecure. The proper place for a woman, according to the Hebrew idea, is in her own home, with her husband, and such a home is called the menuch (or rest). This was what Naomi meant when she said to her widowed daughters-in-law: "The Lord grant that ye may find rest, each of you, in the house of her husband." Concerning the innocent stratagem employed by Ruth at Naomi's suggestion, to intimate to Boaz the claim she had upon him as the nearest kinsman of Mahlon, it was justified by long-established custom and privilege; but it is evident that Boaz's heart had already gone out to the gleaner, and that he entertained a tender regard for her apart from all questions of relationship. The story is a striking illustration of the divine blessing that attended virtue, piety, filial duty and pure affection in a comparatively rude age.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

WIDE YE THE WAY

Cautions Against Intemperance

International Sunday School Lesson for Dec. 13; Proverbs 23: 15-25. Golden Text, Proverbs 23: 21.

HERE is a tone of affectionate solicitude in the passage selected for the lesson which is very pathetic. All the paragraphs in the book of Proverbs addressed to "my son" have this note.

In an Oriental household the authority of the father was absolute, and there were stern penalties for insubordination and undutifulness; but in these passages the father seems to lay aside his authority and power, preferring to plead and advise. We can imagine an old man, concerned for the welfare of his boy, thus showing him the two paths and pointing out to him the characteristics of each. He wants the lad to take the right path, and assures him that his sympathies are altogether with him. He will rejoice if the boy proves wise; it will gladden his inmost being to see him doing well. Therefore he gives him the benefit of his experience and observation. The boy may surely trust one who has this disinterested concern for his welfare. He warns the boy against envying sinners, which the young are apt to do, thinking that they are enjoying life and having a good time. "Surely there is an end," the old man says. They are traveling along a road that has an awful ending, and they cannot escape it, because the road leads thither and nowhere else. It is safe to expect that termination, for the expectation will not be cut off or diverted. Tipplers and gluttons will come to poverty, and the laziness they induce will leave them no clothing but rags. It is not the highest motive to appeal to, but it is one likely to be effective with a lad who can see around him object lessons of the fact. Then follows another appeal to filial affection. If his ruin, but will be disgraced if he takes the evil way.

by getting

If young people could see the end of a career of dissipation and could be convinced that the road leads there, they would not be so ready to follow it. But the road leads to poverty and shame, so gratifying to the lower nature, and so much more desirable than the road of self-restraint and self-denial, that they are drawn toward it. It will be easy, they think, to stop or turn back, and so avoid the penalty. So thousands have thought, but human nature does not work that way. "A man is holden by the cords of his sin." Indulgence enfeebles the nature, so that the moral forces become weak, while the propensities become strong. Like a fly in the spider's cobweb, who is sure he can fly away from his crawling enemy, but finds that his wings are bound with a strand cast around them, so the self-indulgent youth is incapa

ple of quitting the downward path when he realizes his danger. The desire for intoxicants once developed, becomes a craving almost irresistible, so that the victim is a slave to the power he has created. It is quite safe to conclude that no man willingly takes the downward road our artist has sketched in the illustration. No one willingly goes to the poorhouse, the jail or Potter's field. The latter part is the inevitable result of the downward path when he realizes his danger.

forces to which he has become a debtor. Therefore it is to those who stand at the parting of the ways, that cautions and appeals must be addressed. Only the warning given that the only bait that is set to lure the victim is the one road often seems as safe as the out to him he may take the one that at the outset offers the greater attractions. He has to be taught that both character and reputation suffer by dissipation and association with dissipated people, and that without character he cannot hope to reach those milestones on the road of prosperity that our artist has depicted in the illustration.

Surely there is an end. One of the most thrilling things in literature is Victor Hugo's description of death in a quicksand. A traveler walking along the beach at low tide feels tired. It is heavy walking. The sand seems to cling to his feet as if he were walking on pitch. The soles of his feet stick to it. The man pursues his way, for there is nothing unusual in the appearance of the sand. He is not anxious. Anxious about what? Only he feels some how that the weight of his feet increase with every step he takes. Suddenly his feet sink in two or three inches. He must be on the wrong road. He stops to take his bearings. In that minute his feet have disappeared. The sand has covered them. He draws his feet out, and turns about to retrace his steps. At the next step he sinks in deeper. The sand is up to his ankles. With difficulty he draws out and turns to the left. He sinks up to his knees. Then he realizes with unspeakable terror that he is caught in quicksand. He throws off his load, if he has one. He calls, waves his hat or handkerchief. The sand gains on him more and more. If the beach is deserted, if there is no help, it is all over. He is condemned to that appalling burial, long, infallible, implacable, which seizes one erect, free, in full health, which draws one by the feet, dragging one at every moment a little deeper. He shouts, he howls, he implores. Soon he is waist deep in the sand. He raises his arms, clutches at the beach, presses it with his elbows trying to draw himself out, and only sinks the deeper. The sand reaches the neck. Only the face is visible now. The mouth cries, the sand fills it—silence. The earth is burying a man. That is death in the quicksand, and the man who starts on the downward path is dealt with as remorselessly.

Guide thine heart in the way. It is necessary to look well to the road that we travel because many go the wrong way unintentionally through sheer heedlessness. Pelonbet mentions the following stations on the Black Valley Railroad: Most people get on at Sippington or Medicineville. They intend to remain in that vicinity, but the road being pleasant they generally go farther. The next stop is at Lippington, where the people are friendly to temperance but not to total abstinence, which they consider only fit for milkshops and drunkards. Topersville is the last station before Drunkard's Curve. This latter place has quite a record of fatalities. It is estimated that six hundred thousand persons annually meet their death there. Quarrelton and Riotville are in the neighborhood, and many of the passengers are seen there. Beggars town and Priston are near the end of the route which has its terminus at Demonland.

Despise not thy mother. Col. Higginson relates a story of a convivial supper during the war, which shows how far-reaching may be the influence of mothers. It was in the early part of the war before the disastrous effects of drinking parties had led to their suppression. The party was composed of young officers, most of whom were hard drinkers. Wine and liquor circulated freely, and as they sat late, the fun grew fast and furious. Some of the quieter men wanted to leave, but it was resolved that a man suggesting going away, should as a penalty, be required to sing a song. A young surgeon who was in the party was obliged to leave, and he was called upon to oblige the resolution. He rose, his fresh, rosy face was in contrast to the flushed visages of his companions. "I cannot sing," he said, "and I do not know any stories of the kind you like, so I must propose a toast. I propose, Our Mothers." The shot told. The party became quiet; one looked at another shamefacedly, and the party soon broke up.

The drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty. Homer's story is more terrible. He describes Circe, a sorceress, daughter of Perse, as having potent spell which changed the nature of all who fell under it. She spread a magnificent banquet for Ulysses and his followers, and when the latter had partaken of it they were changed into swine. Wolves and lions were around her palace at Aëda who had once been men, but being at her table had lost their manhood.

Be not among winebibbers. There is danger in association. Sophronius had a fair daughter named Eulalia, and she asked him one day for permission to visit the gay Lucinda. "I cannot allow," said the Greek father. "Then you must think me exceedingly weak," said the girl indignantly. Sophronius picked up a dead coal from the hearth and handed it to his daughter; but she hesitated to accept it. "Take it, my child, it will burn you," Eulalia obeyed and the milky whiteness of her hand was instantly gone. "That comes of handling coals," said the girl, looking with disgust at her blackened hand. "Yes," said Sophronius, solemnly, "for they soil the flesh, even when they do not burn." No one retains purity of heart who spends his time in the company of people who get intoxicated. He is defiled even if he does not sink to their level.

Drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags. A lawyer in Chicago relates that one night from his office he was accosted by a bleary-eyed, face-blotched beggar clad in rags. Looking at him more closely, he asked his name. His suspicion was confirmed. It was an old college friend, the brightest man of his year. "Give me a dollar for old acquaintance sake," whined, Misery, piteously. "What has happened to you?" said his friend. "You have been in trouble. Why did you not let me know?" The tramp eyed him wistfully. "No trouble," he said, "but my own making. I succeeded well enough for some time, but I went into company and drank hard. Not at first, but I could soon drink as much as any of them. It became a habit. After carousing in the small hours, I was not fit for business next day. One good chance after another I let slip through my being unnerfed, until my partners got rid of me, and I sank to this." His friend looked at him pitifully. He said, "You can make a new start out here, and I will help you." "No," said the other, "I have lost energy and hope. Give me enough money to get a meal and a bed. That is all you can do for me." His friend pleaded with him, but to no purpose. He took him to a restaurant and fed him, and found him a decent lodging for the night. The next morning he went to see him, but during the night he had committed suicide. Slain by the liquor that had ruined thousands.

THE MORMONS OF TO-DAY

LATTER-DAY SAINTS.

Genesis of the Movement—Absurd Claims and Blasphemous Doctrines—The Mormon Priesthood—Joseph Smith and Brigham Young.

ANYONE who attempts to know fully the various religious movements, or to keep in mind the numerous religions in the United States, undertakes a difficult task. Observers under other forms of governments, in which church and state are united, and liberty of religious action is restricted, affirm that our separation of church and state, our great freedom in all matters of conscience, encourages the greatest divergence of religious views. Dictionaries of religion give more than fifty types or denominations in the United States. We are accustomed to boast of our government as the best under the sun, and it is not pleasant to know that under its protecting care the most absurd notions are set up as religions, and make their appeal under our constitution for the same rights and courtesies as are accorded to Christianity—false religions, which, if in control of our affairs, would soon undermine and destroy our free institutions. Can it be that we have a State in the Union substantially controlled by those whose leaders impose upon them ideas more heathenish than Christian? Utah is now a State, and Mormons constitute a large body of the people, and Mormonism requires every one of its adherents to render most implicit obedience to its priesthood. In nothing are the people more constantly drilled than in this obedience.

Mormons do not declare before the world that they believe in false gods, or that they are heathen. Their course is deceptive. They do not now call themselves Mormons. They claim to be the only saints on earth. They call themselves the Latter-Day Saints of the Church of Jesus Christ; all others are Gentiles. At last the world is to be redeemed through these Latter-Day Saints. Joseph Smith, their first leader, proclaimed thirteen articles of faith, intended to be so near to Christian beliefs as not to create alarm at first, but to appeal to the discontented element among the Christians. These Latter-Day Saints affirm their belief in our Bible, but they proceed at once to reject its teachings. We believe that "Book of Doctrine and Covenants, Pearl of Great Price and Sayings of Joseph the Seer" as their guides in faith and doctrine. Indeed, for them there is little left of the Godhead, and little foundation on which to build the manhood of man or the womanhood of woman, as we shall see more in detail later.

A careful and impartial study of the teachings of Mormonism leads to the conclusion that it is organized to bring all of its affairs into the control of the priesthood, and the history of its movements confirms this view. Give this priesthood the power of receiving current revelations from the Almighty, which they claim, and the unquestioning obedience from their followers, which they demand, and what is there to hinder the execution of their decrees, however depraved? This was the condition in the period of supreme control of Mormonism in Utah when their

The two leaders under whom the Mormons rose to the height of their self-assertion were Joseph Smith their founder, and Brigham Young his successor. Both are greatly revered among the most abject Mormons. Smith was born in Sharon, Vt., Dec. 23d, 1805, and went with his father's family to Palmyra, N. Y., in 1815. He had the reputation of being an ignorant, idle youth, given to chicken-thieving. Both father and son were very superstitious and believed in witchcraft and divining. In digging a well for a neighbor Chase, a stone of peculiar form and appearance was found. This the son called his "peek-stone" and with it sought to find hidden treasures. He found people could be fooled; considerable digging was done under his direction but he never discovered any treasures. He led the Mormons from Kirkland, O., to Jackson County, Mo., and from there as "commander-in-chief of the armies of the Lord" to Nauvoo, Ill. Then there had been no marked indication of polygamy, which, together with the union of church and state in Utah, so attracted public attention as to leave other obnoxious features of Mormonism comparatively unnoticed. But without the manifestation of these two doctrines, so offensive to American ideas, the other beliefs and characteristics of Mormons were so obnoxious to surrounding communities in Ohio, Missouri, and Illinois that the self-styled saints were not permitted to carry out their purposes without conflict. Smith was arrested and rience brought the people more and more under the control of their leader. When it was found that the location was territory of the United States, Brigham became defiant of governmental authority and attempted the organization of the State of Deseret, and to the day of his death only yielded as he was compelled to the constitution and laws of the United States.

There were not lacking many evidences of bitter disloyalty among his followers. Every year illustrated his marked characteristics. To his devoted friends he was a saint. On the other hand, Judge Goodwin describes him as "the worst of men; intellectually he was not bright, but he was full of animal magnetism; and though his heart was that of a sheep, there was a great deal of wolf in his forehead; possessing a stubbornness which never yielded, and a plausible tongue. His avarice was measureless. He never looked on without coveting his neighbor's fair wife, good horse, or profitable investments." He was full of devices in the execution of his purposes. What a legacy of evil influences he has left behind! How are Americans uplifted by idealizing Washington! How are Latter-Day Saints to be degraded by the memories of Brigham Young! Some of his worst devices were declared to be divine revelations. Again and again his prophecies were unfulfilled and proved false, but his blind followers found for him some excuse. Manifestly there has been a change since his day. He promulgated his plans over his own name. The late manifesto of the presidency has not only the signature of the president, but has a long list of en leader could preach to his "avenging angels" the duty of their taking the life, for the purpose of saving the souls, of those who would not submit to his will. Then their leaders claimed to have revelations assuring them that the day would come when "they would hold the reins of the United States Government. After that they expected to control the continent." Then the will of their leaders was supreme in temporal as well as spiritual affairs, and polygamy was a religious duty, needful to the exaltation of man, and essential to the salvation of woman; yet, in the midst of this "animalism," they had the temerity to claim that nowhere else was the law of chastity for man and woman more universally enforced.

Great effort has been made to disseminate their pernicious doctrines outside of Utah, and the last census reports 1,306 Mormon communicants in California; 1,762 in Colorado; 1,058 in Nebraska; 1,540 in Michigan; 1,336 in Wyoming; 1,106 in Kansas; 5,303 in Iowa; 14,972 in Idaho; 6,500 in Arizona. In Utah, the total communicants in all churches is 128,115, and the number of Mormons there reached 118,125, leaving only 9,990 communicants of all other religions within its limits. It will be seen that in several of the States, in close political contests, they would hold the balance of power, and so control the action of State legislatures, and by determining the selection of United States Senators, make sure of those in the United States Congress who would prevent any legislation Mormon leaders might not desire. Mormonism is still a menace to our free institutions. The plans of Mormon leaders are perfected and their orders issued in secret. All will see how much depends upon their leaders.

when escaping from the jail was killed by an infuriated mob. Brigham Young was able to assert his leadership in spite of all competitors, and rapidly gained complete ascendancy over his followers. He soon saw that the differences between the Mormons and their neighbors were too great for them to live in peace, and began plans to lead them to the valleys of Utah.

CHAPTER I.
THE LOOSE SCREW

IF the mere accumulation of money be a good thing, then Nicholas Lloyd had accomplished something on which he might congratulate himself. He was certainly a rich man. Without being either good, or wise, or great, he had overcome the world; that is, he had broken into its treasure-houses, and helped himself to gold and silver, to houses and lands, and to whatever represents that wealth, which so many men give their lives, and lose their souls, to obtain.

This struggle had left indelible marks on the man, both physically and spiritually; and he was mutilated body and soul, though he knew it not. Indeed, he was rather proud of his cold, unruffled mien; and of that hardness of heart and head, which no game of Wall Street could intoxicate. Thoroughly American, he had the genius of those great financial operations, which move the world; but he saw all love, all merit, all goodness, through the coldness of his own nature. He was without enthusiasm, he had schemes instead of passions, and those who knew him best, found it easy to believe, that he at least, was made out of the dust of the earth.

He stood one morning in June at an open window of his country house. The roses were blowing in the garden, the cows browsing in the wet meadows beyond; the keen salt air of the sea was in his nostrils, the sweet babbling of the linnet in his ears; but he was conscious of none of these things. His thoughts were of dingy dollars; and what heart he had, was full of an angry ache; for his domestic affairs had not prospered to his liking; and the only son, for whom he had planned so much, and so ambitiously, was a perpetual care and disappointment.

He had not seen him for months, and he had resolved to put him out of his mind; and yet, at the beginning of the day, when he needed every faculty fresh for his business, this unfortunate lad would intrude himself among his speculations. So he turned impatiently from the window, and rang the bell to hurry forward his cup of coffee. As he did so, his daughter Alice entered the room.

"I am afraid we are late this morning, father," she said. "Mother is not well; she will not come down; so I will give you your breakfast at once."

"Yes, you are eight minutes late. The time table is beyond a woman's comprehension. I want only a cup of coffee, Alice; my stomach has gone wrong, and refuses to be comforted. I was thinking of Stephen—have you heard of him lately?"

"He came home last night." "In what way?" "We are as happy as a bird." "Without a cent, or a decent garment?"

"I think it very likely." "And I began my life in that condition brought out of nothing. It is incredible!"

"And the clever, prosperous men, make themselves out of nothing?"

"Oh, Steve!" she cried softly; "how nice you do look! I have been waiting breakfast for you. Sit down, dear. It is so good to see you once more."

"I am glad you waited, Alice. I do not mind eating a fancied meal with you; but I did not feel able for father, so early in the day. A dispute at dinner may be borne; but disagreeable words in the morning give me an indigestion—yes, dear, I will, of course, take sweetbreads; and have you that?"

"He was a tall, strong, well-made man."

they would be little missed. Hills, woods, and all the beauties of land and sea, would still remain. Why then should Stephen spend his life in making poor pictures of them? I think he will yet become a very wise and admirable man."

"He may—but it is very impossible." "It is very impossible—but he may," and she smiled confidently into the face of the impossibility.

Lloyd did not answer; the horses were stamping impatiently at the open door, and he, at least, comprehended the time table. With some hurry he went away; and Alice watched the carriage out of sight, and then returned to the breakfast table. Her face was thoughtful, her manner expectant; she was evidently waiting for some person, or event. The situation, however, did not ruffle her; she had the composure of a goddess; a charming young face; eyes with long lashes, and luminous as those of a child; and that kind, simple heart that never grows old.

It was this fresh, faithful heart, that inspired her; genius she did not possess. Little womanly traits made her still more attractive; she was proud of her college; she carried Horace in her pocket, and considered herself to be "strong-minded"; being quite unconscious that she was really the veriest sentimentalist. In clothing herself she had a natural gift, and though her costumes were never easily remembered, they always did credit to her dressmaker.

This morning, as she sat crumbling her bread to her sombre thoughts, no one would have noticed her gown particularly; it was simply all that was proper for the occasion; but few would have been indifferent to the general air of freshness that added charm and lustre to her loveliness. It might have come from her dress, but it seemed to be a part of herself. And yet, for a special and noble purpose, she had that morning taken great pains with her toilet, for her brother—whom she dearly loved—was to be influenced by it.

He came lounging into the room ten minutes after his father's departure; and he had probably been waiting for that event. Alice stood up as he entered; then she went to meet him, putting both her hands in his hands, and lifting her fair face to one tanned by every wind of heaven.

"Oh, Steve!" she cried softly; "how nice you do look! I have been waiting breakfast for you. Sit down, dear. It is so good to see you once more."

"I am glad you waited, Alice. I do not mind eating a fancied meal with you; but I did not feel able for father, so early in the day. A dispute at dinner may be borne; but disagreeable words in the morning give me an indigestion—yes, dear, I will, of course, take sweetbreads; and have you that?"

with wonderful eyes—eyes of heroic form; dark and lustrous, with full lids, and long lashes. No one would have denied his beauty; many would have called him handsome; and his chin fully redeemed his wilful face; for it was of fine mold, and quite unblunted by the animal passions of human nature. And Alice at least knew well what a true, loving heart he had; though it did not stir readily to other hearts; its glow and motion answering best to the mighty voices of Nature—to the winds, the cries and songs of wild creatures, and the murmur and roar of the ocean. Evidently Stephen Lloyd was a soul astray in the luxurious home of the wealthy financier; he ought to have been in a frontier hut, or on a sailing ship far away to the North, with every stitch of canvas set, and the green seas flying over her cross-trees.

Such as he was, however, Alice dearly loved him. He troubled his mother; he angered his father; and disappointed all the hopes that had been centred on him; but Alice loved him. She fought his home battle continually; she would not suffer him to be forgotten; and she did really prevent his falling many degrees lower than he had done. For she sent him money; and money is often salvation. The mammon of unrighteousness has a savor of life, as well as a savor of death.

It was the first topic of their conversation. "I was hard up, Alice, when I got that last hundred dollars," he said. "It made me grossly rich. It gave me a glorious Spring, my dear sister."

"Tell me about it. You were in Denver, I think?"

"Yes; I had just come from my winter quarters in Arizona. I was dead broke; and I wanted to get to New York in time for my summer plans."

"What are they?"

"I will go to sea for a few months—perhaps on one of the big 'liners.' I am a good man before the mast; or I can turn myself into a waiter, and serve tables."

"Oh, Steve! With your education, is there nothing better that you can do. You know father will—"

"Dear Alice, father's plans for me have been discussed to the last letter. I will not get money as he does. I will work for every dollar I put in my pocket—so much labor for so much money."

"Father works his brains; brain work is as real a thing as hand work."

"We need not discuss that question. My brains are not working brains; they won't keep accounts, they won't plot and scheme; they can't teach; they refuse to recognize any monetary symbol—the click of wires, and the roar and babble of Broadway and Wall Street, distracts them. The woods and the sea, and even the Arizonian desert, talk sensibly to me. I can work with my hands, I can stand at the wheel of a ship, I can guide a reaper, I can drive cattle, or do any sensible thing, that a man's brains order him to do, with his two hands. I can't sell things that have no existence. I can't work with intangible figments of thought. I want to see and handle my work. Such as I am, I am. I was made so."

"But even the work you see and handle does not always induce you to labor."

"Generally speaking, little girl, I do as much work as is necessary. Now and then I go into a tight place; or I feel a sense of hurry, and write to you for help; and bless my stars, I always get it." He laid down his knife and fork, and looked at her with a face radiant with affection; and Alice went to his side, and put her arms around his neck, and kissed him.

"This time," he continued, "I was in a hurry. I could have come East with some horses, and got a free passage and a mouthful; but I suddenly got seasick; I mean, sick for the sea; and the thought of its great, free spaces haunted me day and night, and I heard the roar and murmur of the waves wherever I turned. I hear them now. I am going to-day to look for a summer berth, where I can be free of all they can give me."

"Steve, if you love the sea so much, why not go into the navy? A naval officer is very respectable."

"You dear little ignoramus. Have you been as far as Vassar without divining how much naval officers pay for their respectability? What study! What imitations! What obedience! What unceasing attention to details! Thank you, dear, for the compliment; but whatever could I do on a man-of-war? I, who am only a wayfarer, a bird of passage, who would perish if my wings were cut."

"Have some more coffee, Steve, and some rice cakes?"

"Yes, I will. I am going to tell you a strange thing, Alice. I have found some very old friends of father's; indeed, they are related to us—though not very intimately—the families intermarried a generation ago, and there has been a friendship extending backward, through many generations. But these are evil times for loving kindness in any form; everything wears it away."

"Where did you meet these people? Are they nice?"

"I met them in New York. I have been staying a week with them."

"How long since?"

"I left them yesterday—very sorry to do so—but—"

"You have been a week in New York! You never let me know! And you never came to see me! Oh, Steve, how could you?"

"I saw you at Nora Leffert's marriage. You looked as sweet and lovely as a rose. You were the loveliest girl there."

"How could you see me? Surely, you were not there?"

Steve laughed heartily at the question. "I was not there," he answered, "though Nora and I are old friends. I read about the marriage in the newspapers, and I was sure you would be present. I had a great longing to see you, so I strolled up Broadway as far as the church, and I had my reward. It isn't many fellows that can boast of a sister so good, and beautiful, and loving as you are, sweet Alice."

"Steve, I can return the compliment, very truly. It isn't many girls that can boast of a brother so handsome, and so good, and so loving, as you are. Don't contradict me; you are handsome, when you are well dressed; as you are this morning; you are good, as far as you understand what goodness means; and nobody knows better than I do how loving and true you are."

"Don't you think I understand what goodness means?"

"Mother says you do not. If you did, she is sure, you would think of others before yourself. You know her idea is, that until we bury self entirely, we are still subject to evil."

"Who can bury self entirely?" asked Steve, a little crossly. "I think mother expects too much. She measures people by too high a standard. When I saw you at the wedding, John McAslin was with me. He saw you, also."

"I suppose John McAslin is one of the family with whom you staid a week?" he asked.

"Yes. John is the eldest child, and the only son. There are two girls—beauties both of them—if I understand what beauty means; and a father and mother. Now am going to surprise you. The mother ought to have been our mother. Father was engaged to her for four years. She was making her wedding clothes when she heard of his marriage."

"Oh, what a strange, dreadful thing!"

"It is a common tragedy enough. Mercifully, women forgive and forget, and learn to love again. If they did not, this world would be a broken-hearted kind of a place."

"How did you find all this out?"

"I heard them talking of Senstone Valley, and I said I had a schoolmate who came from there, a lad called Lloyd. And Mrs. McAslin's face instantly lighted, and she began to wonder if he was Nicholas Lloyd's son; and to speak of father, of his fine appearance, and his cleverness, and his marriage with the rich Marian Valiante, and of his present great wealth and influence. And I understood the whole story of her love and desertion, though she never said a word about it. It was Flora McAslin, the eldest daughter, who told me that chapter of father's history, and it was Jessie McAslin that said she was right glad her mother did not marry such a selfish, bad man as Nicholas Lloyd; she thought her dear old papa, with his thousand dollars per annum, a great deal the finer gentleman."

"Perhaps Jessie McAslin does not know father well enough to make comparisons; and you have not told me yet how you became acquainted with this critical young lady."

"Don't judge until you know all the facts in the case, Alice; it would not be like you. Jessie McAslin is not critical, she has the kindest heart. I met her brother John in the train just outside of Chicago. We sat together, and we talked together until we reached New York. It was in the morning, and I was a little jaded and hungry, and John asked me, 'to what hotel I was going?' I told him, 'I never went to hotels.' He asked, 'if I was going home,' and I answered, 'I have no home.' Then he put his arm through mine and said, 'Go home with me.'"

"It is your own fault, if you have no home, Steve."

"Perhaps—and perhaps not. That isn't the question, now. I went home with John McAslin."

"In what part of New York is his home?" she asked.

"On the East Side, in some nice little flats near St. Mark's Place. I dare say you never heard of the locality. There was no one present when we entered but Mrs. McAslin. She adores her son, and she made me welcome as his friend. A good breakfast was soon ready for us, and then she sent us to bed. When I woke up I heard pleasant voices and the noise of cups and saucers. John had already risen. I made myself as respectable as possible—I had bought this suit in Chicago—and guided by the sound of the conversation, soon reached the little dining-room. Father and mother, brother and sisters, were eating dinner together, and they made a place for me. A few hearty words and a smile from Jessie—by whose side I found a chair—set me at ease, and I'll vow I never eat a better or a more cheerful meal. Is that enough of the McAslins?"

"No. I wish to hear all about them. How did you spend the evening? What can you say about the family?"

"I will answer your last question; the other is of little importance. The father is a clerk in an importing house; not clever, not ambitious, but fond of his home and family; one of those rare men who are cheerful at six o'clock in the morning, and who have a child's capacity for small, fleeting joys."

"And a little, insignificant-looking man, I suppose?"

"Yes—no—I can't say. I should recognize him if we met, but—"

"You cannot describe him. Then he is certainly a man of no force."

"I should not like to hazard that opinion, Alice. I think a blow in the right place would smite fire from him. The mother is a pleasant, domestic woman. She does not fret herself, or others; she has no fads, no vanity, no littleness of any kind. She has been a beauty. Flora is like her."

"Pray, then, what is Flora like?"

"She has a sweet, calm, innocent face. She is a dressmaker, and is going to marry one of Tiffany's working jewellers. They think it a good match. Flora will not come into any one's life now—but the working jeweller's—she is that kind of a girl. Jessie is different."

"I can see that Jessie is your favorite. How does she differ?"

"Every way. Jessie is small and witchy. She has bright, piercing eyes, and curly brown hair. There is no hesitancy in anything she says or does. Her voice is clear, and has the ring of sincerity. She is a hard-headed, soft-hearted mite, mistress of herself, and very lady-like. That is Jessie McAslin as I saw her. She is her brother's favorite, and she is mine. If I could ever think of a wife, Jessie would be my sweetest dream."

"Why not Jessie, then?"

"Impossible—utterly and finally impossible! I must not talk of her. I must not even think of her."

"Is the brother like Jessie?"

THE GOSPEL ON GIBRALTAR'S ROCK.

A Soul-Winning Campaign among the Soldiers in the Famous Fortress—"The Home on the Hill"—Earnest Workers and many Converts.

REV. WILLIAM E. GEIL.

STRONGER than Antwerp with its eight miles of massive ramparts, mightier in resistance than the great island strong hold of Malta, most terrible in fire and shot belching qualities, and altogether the strongest fortress on the planet, is Gibraltar. The rock is honey-combed with tunnels, galleries full of great guns and ammunition. Provisioned to last half a generation, it is not likely that an old military order which read "On account of the scarcity of flour, soldiers are not to have their hair powdered till further notice," will have to be repeated. Pulpit, political, and patriotic orators have used it to point a moral or adorn a tale. And when nations have plotted the overthrow of British authority, that Rock lying there like a huge Numidian lion with face toward the land and tail toward the sea, has seemed to get higher, and arising has sent out a note of warning that has caused the advisers of empires to throw one knee over the other, lie back in their chairs, and smooth the backs of their heads. A humorous writer has said that "at first sight Gibraltar looked like a handful of mud on a shingle." The batteries are most ingeniously masked. Neither is the religious work demonstrative, but much is being done for the more than 5,000 soldiers. A regiment does not remain long, hence the necessity of doing definite work for them. Then there are the 137,000 seamen who enter the roads each year. When a vessel casts anchor one or more men well supplied with religious literature will go aboard her and talk and pray with the crew, even to the going down into the hold, and reading and praying with the stokers—those coal begrimed men who sweat their lives away heaving fuel into the furnaces.

The Soldiers' Institute is on South Port Street, with its refreshment bar, selling a large mug or cup of cocoa, tea, or coffee for a penny (these with milk and sugar included) and solid foods at the same rate. Reading and game rooms are here provided for the soldiers. Here the Cameron Highlanders branch of the Christian Association meets every Wednesday, led by a soldier, and the books show twenty conversions this year. Superintendent Copeland has a soldiers' Bible Class at 3.30 p.m. each Sunday, followed by tea at 4.30. He visits the barracks, reads and prays with the men. Some of the regiments have prayer-rooms. Every barrack in India has a room set apart for prayer. He takes little bags full of lavender and distributes them. A soldier does the baking for the Institute, and the "busters" (cakes) are made so good that men once coming will enter again, thus giving frequent opportunity to tell them of the Christ. The Institute gives lantern lectures, entertainments, arranges picnics into Spain, and across to Morocco, striving thus to prove untrue the lines cut in a stone sentry box at Gibraltar:

God and the soldier all men adore
In times of trouble, and no more,
For when war is over

"THE HOME ON THE HILL" MISSION, GIBRALTAR.

And all things righted,
God is neglected
And the soldier slighted.

"The Home on the Hill," as one building is kindly spoken of by the troops, is the most remarkably successful mission on the Rock. The word home has especial significance to one who has left home to serve the Queen. It was in July, 1876, that Mrs. Alice Todd Osborne, who opened the first mission of this kind in Glasgow, having been invited by the 79th Highlanders, then stationed at Gibraltar, to come out and be their guest, arrived. She said she found nothing but rock, sea, sky, and sin. One of the first men she met upon arrival was the "King of Delhi," so called because he fought with great bravery under the walls of that capital of the Mogul Empire.

He was an infidel and said he did not care for prayers, for he had a thin pair of boots, and prayed for a thick pair, and asked why he did not get them. She answered, "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you."

The house which is shown in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was purchased in 1887, and has been open every day since. There is a Bible Class at 6.30 and meetings at 8 p.m. every day; the room is packed to the doors. During my call Mrs. Osborne showed me a petition she had just received from Valde Locasa, near Madrid, Spain, signed by sixty-three persons praying for Protestant preaching according to the word of God. "Our work is undenominational," she said, "and we need another sister to come and help us. We covet the prayers of God's people everywhere." In showing me the rooms in the building, she said, "this is where the soldiers meet for worship, and this is the picture," pointing to one on the wall, "of the man who recently came in to sign the pledge. I said to him, 'If you have nothing but that little piece of paper, the devil will have you long before New Year's.' He was told of Jesus Christ, and just last night he prayed 'O Lord! if there is anything between thee and my soul, remove it.'" The converts of this mission, who number hundreds, have quit using tobacco. "It is for the glory of God," they say. "This is the portrait," she said, moving across the end of the room, "of three of Her Majesty's troopers. I met them one night when they were swearing. I stepped up to them and said, 'Do people swear in Heaven?' 'No ma'm, they do not.' 'Are you going to Heaven?' The men, much abashed, said, 'We hope so!' 'Well then, you must get ready, for they don't use such talk as that in Heaven.' They did get ready. This young man," directing my attention to a photo on a table, "was converted, and three months afterward was found dead at his post on the ramparts."

"During the meeting the other night a thunderstorm came on. One dear old woman said to me at the close, 'I was so glad when I heard the thunder, I thought the Lord was coming, and what joy to find myself in the house of God.' That is really marvelous, as the Spanish women are very much frightened when there is thunder, and pray to the Virgin and all the saints. The grace of God has changed that dear woman and made her rejoice."

"I want to tell you a sweet little story of our work beyond the neutral ground," she said. (The neutral strip is about a mile wide, and stretches from sea to sea, between Gibraltar and the Spanish lines. British sentinels pace this side, Spanish soldiers that, and persons crossing must keep moving. The Spanish side is said to be honeycombed with mines connected by wires, so that an attacking army can be annihilated by pressing a button.) "Little Jose Garcia had been attending our school for a year and was beginning to read the New Testament well. He fell ill, and during the ten days of his sickness he often sang the hymn, 'From the night of the Sepulchre the Lord rose again, and the bands of death he shook off by his power.' When very ill he said, 'Mother, I am dying, but I would like you to go to the school, there you will see the Good Shepherd.' 'Child, what do you say?' 'I say there is a Shepherd who came to this world to look for a sheep that he lost, and it went very, very far away, and when he found it he took it with him. We are the lost sheep.' He said no more. The Good Shepherd had taken the sheep."

One of the most enjoyable hours of my Eastward trip was spent at the "Home on the Hill." The Spirit of Christ seemed to endorse all Mrs. Osborne said and did. She is certainly a lady of great spiritual power, and God is wonderfully blessing the work.

Her last words to me were: "We want the prayers of Christian people for the work on the Rock." WILLIAM E. GEIL.

Look Back.

AS our million edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes out, let us remember we are in the last month of the year and make thankful retrospection. Eighteen hundred and ninety-six has been a year of magnificent Christian achievement. America is coming to the front as the greatest Christian nation on earth. It has upheld its material dignity in a way not to be mistaken, but still more nobly have its people—the millions of them, who are working and praying for the betterment of mankind—upheld the banner of the Cross. The Church, too, has a better spirit, and is animated by greater zeal for service. In all parts of our land there are signs of the people, who are called by the name of Christ, becoming more like Christ. Despite many drawbacks, they have kept up their quota of missionaries and teachers, so that to-day the foreign work in many lands is fully as efficient as it was a year ago. We have printed more Bibles this year than last, in a greater number of languages; we have reached larger and wider audiences at home; our cities, our rural districts, our frontiers all now hear the Gospel message proclaimed, and there is hardly a hamlet or settlement on the borders of our vast territory where, either through pulpit or home missionary, or through the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD alone, the Gospel of Jesus Christ is not regularly and effectively preached. Members of our churches seem to be striving to walk in his footsteps and to cultivate more than ever before the love of men and concern for their welfare, which was Christ's prominent characteristic. Like him they are ready to feed the hungry, to sympathize with the sorrowing, to succor the oppressed. The day has gone by when the Church of Christ, acting in the spirit of Cain, asked, "Am I my brother's keeper?" The material comfort of our brethren is no longer a matter of indifference to the man who hears the Christian name. Nor has there been any decrease in concern for his spiritual welfare. The Christian people of America have reached out the hand of fellowship to the persecuted Christians of Armenia? We are strong in the faith, and we are lected classes at home, too; we are giving a grander uplift to down-trodden fathers, mothers, and children than ever before. Every year shows that we are developing in the grace of helpfulness, and as our hearts open, our purses are not closed. To enumerate all the good that has been accomplished in this year now closing, would be to fill pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and this should be the best incentive to still greater and more consecrated activity in the year about to dawn.

Cultivate Sympathy.

LET us never restrain our sympathies or dam them back. Pity and compassion for the woes of the world clarify the human heart and take off the sharp edges of our disposition and make us grateful in the contrast. The unfortunate were born of the same eternal Father, rocked in the same cradle of the world, and at the same moment on the same morning to hear the same resurrectionary blast that wakes the dead. Cultivate your sympathies. The sixteen hundred millions of the race are all united by chords of kinship, and those chords after fastening us all together reach up to the heart of God, so that we are all bound together, all on earth one, God and the human family one. When a workman with a loaded hod on his shoulder slips from the ladder and falls to the basement, bend over him, lift him very tenderly; he is your brother. When in the midnight tempest the sailor slips from the ratlines and has his life dashed out on the deck, listen to that awful thud; it is your brother. When you hear a demented woman from the corridors of Bloomingdale Asylum, remember it is your sister. When her ruin is worse than that, and body, mind, and soul have been tossed off the declivities of a decent life and she hangs, with mangled fingers, over the boiling billows of hell, do not laugh, do not caricature, do not make heartless remarks; that is your sister. "Oh, no, no," you say: "that is impossible; you compromise my dignity by saying she is my sister." Yes, she is. You belong to the Lord's family and she belongs to it, and God is her Father, and he is your Father, and does not that make her your sister? God is not ashamed to acknowledge this, and you are not better than God. Yea, if you scoff at her you are worse than she, for God has a heaven all ready for her as soon as she repents, but for one who has no compassion for lost manhood or lost womanhood, from Bible lid to Bible lid there is no promise. Feeling as you now do, hard and uncommiserate, you will not come within 500,000 miles of heaven. May the blessing of those who are ready to perish come upon us. In this day of accidents we are not only to sympathize with the victims, but to do it wisely for our own safety. Let us not make ourselves ridiculous by wandering about, timid and nervous, expecting every minute that something will happen, but let us take every reasonable precaution. On a railroad trip I was very tired and I got on the locomotive with the engineer on the Illinois Central, and if there is anything that will wake a man up, that is it. The fireman and the engineer were very communicative, and I asked all about the machinery, and after awhile I said: "What is that bright, shining instrument?" That is a Westinghouse air brake," I said: "What is the use of it?" "Well," he said, "when I see an obstacle on the track, or I see that a bridge has fallen, or I see the headlight of a locomotive coming around the curve, I can stop the train. I can stop it as by an almost omnipotent reverse the train halts, the brakes falling on the wheels of all the cars all the way back." What a splendid arrangement. Then I thought, we are all on an express train. We are going to the great city, the city of the future, the city of the millennium. Shall we wildly crash into them and perish? No, there is an overmastering power willing to take charge of the long train of life's events, and with instantaneous spring holds us back from destruction. What we want is not only a power stop when it is safest to stop. A thousand times between now and when we reach our destination we will want an instantaneous and omnipotent brake.

Our Million Edition.

ONE million copies have been printed of this edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, each copy consisting of twenty-eight pages. Nearly 4,000 reams of paper, aggregating over 350,000 pounds, were required for its production. The total expense involved exceeds $40,000, of which about $4,000 was expended for postage.

The magnificent frontispiece was especially engraved for us, and printed in colors by the Photo Colortype Company, of Chicago, Ill. It is generally conceded to be a masterpiece of color typography. The colored premium insert is the workmanship of The Werner Company, of Akron, O., the largest printing establishment in the United States. The body of the paper was printed by D. Appleton & Company, the well-known publishers. The binding of this mammoth edition, a most stupendous undertaking, was done by The Knoepke Bindery, New York.

Although THE CHRISTIAN HERALD owns one of the most complete and extensive printing establishments and binderies in the United States, and all its machinery is of the most improved kind, and of the latest pattern, its facilities are limited to the production of 300,000 copies per week. As the regular weekly issue, with the colored frontispiece, severely taxes its capacity, we were compelled to seek extraordinary facilities elsewhere for the production of this phenomenally large edition of one million copies.

The prayers of all the readers of this special edition are requested for the blessing of God upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, its subscribers, its proprietor, and those whose sermons, articles or labors for Christ are printed in its columns.

Higher Riches.

I HAVE been amused to hear people when they start in life say at what point in life they will be contented with worldly possessions. One man says: "I want to get $20,000 and I will be satisfied." Another, "I want to get fifty or a hundred thousand or a million, and then I will be satisfied. Then I will say to my soul: 'Now just look at that block of storehouses. Just look at those government securities. Just look at those bonds and mortgages. Just look what lucrative investments you have. Now, my soul, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry.' Thou fool! If you are not happy now with the smaller possessions, you will never be with the larger possessions. If with decent and comely apparel you are not grateful to God, you would be ungrateful if you had a prince's wardrobe crowded till the hinges burst.

If you are not content with an income to support comfortably your household, you would not be contented though your income rolled in on you fifty or a hundred thousand a year. It is not what we get, it is what we are that makes us happy or miserable. If that is not so, how do you account for the fact that many of those who fare sumptuously every day are wretched and dissatisfied, and overbearing, and foreboding, and cranky, and uncompromising; with a countenance on which wrath always lowers and a lip which scorn curls; while many a time in the summer evening you see a laboring man going home in his shirt-sleeves, with a pail on his arm and a pickaxe over his shoulder, his face bright with smiles and his heart with hope, and the night of his toil bright with flaming colors? It is an illustration of the fact that it is not outward condition that makes a man happy. The heart right, all is right. The heart wrong, all is wrong.

BRIEF NOTES.

In order to give a special opportunity to the readers of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we have decided to make the following offer: Dr. Talmage's great book, From Manger to Throne, which contains, besides a Life of our Saviour, a complete description of Dr. Talmage's trip to and through Palestine and Syria, including the famous Baptism of an American in the Jordan, and over 200 other beautiful illustrations, richly bound in silk-finish cloth, will be delivered in any part of the United States for 75 cents. All charges prepaid. Not more than one copy will be sent to any one family.

There are many churches, especially in small towns and villages, that would be glad of an opportunity to get a number of copies of "Gospel Hymns" at a greatly reduced price. For the benefit of such churches, we would state that we have on hand a number of copies of Gospel Hymns, Nos. 1 to 6 Consolidated, Music Edition, that have been injured almost imperceptibly in packing. Others they are in perfect condition. Those who desire to obtain copies, will do well to write quickly to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as we are now closing out the entire lot.

There are now seventy-five Congregational Churches in the Territory of Oklahoma. Five years ago, there were but two in the entire Territory.

At a recent meeting of Temperance Veterans in London, forty-one were present who were over eighty years of age, and it was stated by the secretary that there were over two hundred octogenarians in the Society.

Evangelist J. H. Elliott has been holding a series of successful evangelistic meetings at Hamilton, Ont. On one Sunday during the services seventy young people from one Sunday School made profession of faith.

Mr. Charles N. Crittenton has been holding evangelistic meetings at Phoenix, Arizona. A correspondent in that city writes that the people are contributing to start a Florence mission there to perpetuate his work.

The Reformed Dutch Church has undertaken a mission among the Bohemians in New York. The Rev. Mr. Molnar, a Bohemian, a recent graduate of McCormick Seminary, has been commissioned to conduct it.

A missionary in South Africa writes that out of thirty ships which in one year arrived at the port nearest his station, to trade with the natives, twenty-five brought rum and gunpowder to barter with the people for their native products.

The official year book of the Protestant Church in France gives the total number of Protestants in the country as 639,825. The total population at the recent census was 38,218,000. Of the Protestants 540,483 belong to the Reformed Church and 77,553 are Lutherans.

The New York Bible Society during the twelve months ended Sept. 30 distributed among the immigrants who arrived at the port of New York 60,550 Bibles and Bible portions in the respective languages of the immigrants. It also placed in the hands of foreign sailors 7,687 Bibles and Testaments.

The Bible or parts of the Bible available for Evangelistic use have now been published in 381 different languages or dialects. Fifty-two of these have been added during the past five years. It is believed that at the beginning of this century the Bible had not been translated into more than thirty-eight languages.

Pastors, Sunday Schools, Church Societies, and others who desire to hold meetings in behalf of Armenia, can obtain from the Armenian Relief Committee, 63 Bible House, New York, pamphlets and other publications on the Armenian question that will prove helpful to speakers, and which may be used to advantage for general circulation.

The number of stations in heathen lands occupied by Protestant missionaries, according to a calculation made by the Missionary Herald, now reaches 5,055 with 17,813 out-stations. Of these 903 stations and 4,911 out-stations are occupied by American missionaries. There are 37 missionary societies in this country, which have sent out in all 3,512 missionaries, of whom 2,043 were women.

A Commission on the Liquor Traffic appointed by the Canadian government sent queries to ministers of all denominations. To the question, "From your experience and observation as a clergyman do you consider the use of intoxicating liquors hurtful morally or socially?" 2,123 replied in the affirmative, and 272 in the negative.

Mr. G. B. Lane, a Presbyterian Sunday School missionary in Wisconsin, writing to a denominational journal, says: "I have in three months traveled 1,300 miles, visited twenty Sunday Schools and 250 families, delivered sixty addresses given away 2,200 pages of tracts, 100 books, twenty Bibles and fifteen Testaments. This is a normal three months' work."

A careful collection of Church statistics shows that since the census of 1890 there has been a general gain in all denominations in this country. The number of churches, ministers and communicants. The gain in the number of churches is: Methodists of all branches, 7,319; Baptists, 1,678; Disciples, 1,522; Presbyterians, 874; Protestant Episcopal, 795; Congregationalists, 532.

Prof. Sayce states that while exploring in Asia Minor, searching for new uniform inscriptions, he hit on a definite memorial of Nimrod. He identifies him with Nuzi Murda, and finds that he was the contemporary in Babylon of the Assyrian King whose son restored Nineveh about fifty years before the Exodus. This curious discovery is regarded here as by far the most valuable confirmation of the Mosaic record yet afforded from this field of investigation.

It would be difficult indeed to find a prettier or more attractive and suitable souvenir of the Holy Land than a beautiful slab of Olive Wood from the Mount of Olives. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received from the East a number of these slabs, of genuine Olive Wood, cut on the sacred Mount, and finely polished in Jerusalem by Bethlehem wood workers. They are both useful and ornamental, and are very highly prized. Each slab has on it in English and Hebrew characters, the inscription, "Jerusalem, City of Peace." We will send these slabs, all charges prepaid, to any address, at the nominal price of twenty-five cents each.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

In the White House.

NEVER is the historic edifice, whose picture appears on this page, so much an object of interest to our people as in the year when the vote of the nation has designated the citizen who shall occupy it for the ensuing four years. It becomes the Mecca of the office-seeker, the centre of the hopes of the people who have worked to secure the election of its occupant, and the abode of the man for whom all patriotic Christians, whatsoever their political affiliation, beseech the blessing of the King of kings, the Giver of every good and perfect gift. Even those who have been his most inveterate opponents, cannot but hope and pray that the man whom the people have chosen to be the Executive of the nation, may be endowed with the wisdom he will need in his high office, and will be enabled so to conduct the affairs of this great nation, that it may maintain its exalted character among the peoples of the earth. Once more the people have spoken, and in March next, the doors of the White House will be opened to admit a new President. It is a humble residence for the chief of a nation of over sixty million persons. It stands in its own grounds, fronting on Pennsylvania avenue and Lafayette square. Surrounding it are the State, Treasury, War and Navy buildings, in which the business of the nation is conducted. It is of sandstone, painted white, has two stories and basement, and is of the Grecian order of architecture. A portico of Ionic columns, added in Jackson's administration, gives dignity to the otherwise severely plain edifice. The interior, like the exterior, is a model of stately simplicity. The great doors in the centre open upon a spacious corridor, which leads to an inner corridor opening on the East Room, the finest apartment of the mansion. Opening from this room are the suite of apartments known respectively as the Green, the Blue and the Red rooms, so called from the prevailing color of the furnishings. The state lining-room, opening on the inner corridor, completes the official quarters of the mansion. It appears to have received its name of the "White House" in the time of Madison, the fourth President, who so spoke of it in a letter which had a national interest. Since that time the name of the "White House" has been the key-note of the ambition of our most famous men, the concrete symbol of all the power and official dignity of the head of the nation. Remembering all that the White House symbolizes to our nation, the Christian patriot may well use concerning it the benediction of the Psalmist:

Peace be within thy walls and prosperity within thy palaces. For my brethren and companions' sakes, I will now say, Peace be within thee. (Ps. 122: 7.)

Hint to Builders.

A common mistake on the part of builders is pointed out in the Operative Builder. It says that in the selection of a kind of stone for building purposes it is well to pay attention to other qualities beside hardness. It is not always the stone that offers the greatest resistance to crushing, but is the most durable. Stone which is porous in any degree will not wear so long, however hard it is, as a stone which has a close and firm texture, as the rain or the moisture of the atmosphere penetrates it, and when the frost comes, it reaches deeper into the stone and disintegration is apt to take place. For a similar reason a plain smooth surface to the stone is better than a rough one, as the protuberances, however small, afford a convenient resting place for moisture and dust, which often contains pungent acids. The most durable buildings are those built of stone of fine close texture with a smooth vertical face. The hint may be useful to other kinds of builders. The living stones which are being built into the temple of Christ should be impervious to worldly influences. He who endures best is he who, like his Master, does not fear when temptation approaches, because it can find nothing to take hold of in him.

The prince of this world cometh; but he hath nothing in me. (John 14:30.)

Unreliable Thermometers.

An incident of a country storekeeper's failure to appreciate the special purpose of his goods is related by Mr. Chauncey M. Depew. He says that while staying in the country, he went to the village store to buy a thermometer. The storekeeper produced six for his customer's inspection. He noticed that no two of them agreed as to the temperature, and between the highest and the lowest there was a difference of ten degrees. He called the store-keeper's attention to the difference and said that he should not know from them whether he ought to light a fire in the room, or open the window. The storekeeper had no solution to offer, but suggested that his customer take them all over to his place and try them, and keep the one that suited him best. Probably Mr. Depew would have accepted the suggestion if he had wanted the thermometer for an ornament. As, however, he needed it to register the temperature with absolute accuracy, these varying instruments were of no use to him. The store-keeper's idea, however, is not an uncommon one in spiritual matters. People go in the greatest numbers to hear the preacher whose sermons suit them best, rather than to hear him who is concerned to preach absolute truth without fear or favor.

THE WHITE HOUSE AND GROUNDS, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Who say to the prophets, prophesy not unto us right things, speak unto us smooth things. (Isa. 30:10.)

An Order for a Sarcophagus.

An aged farmer in Kentucky has given an order to a stonemason which astonished him. The old gentleman is very wealthy, but has not been remarkable for eccentricity. This order, however, did appear eccentric, for it was for a regular sarcophagus. He wanted it made of Kentucky limestone, a quarry of which was on his own estate. He was very precise as to the measurements, and had a drawing of the design for outside ornament. The order was taken, and is being executed. When complete the coffin will weigh fifteen hundred pounds. His reason for adopting this now novel mode of sepulture is that the country around his home is overrun with polecats, minks and groundhogs, and he believes that the only way to keep them from devouring his body is to have it enclosed in a stone coffin. It may be hoped that he has not neglected to secure the safety of his soul, which is of infinitely greater importance, and it, too, may become the prey of a voracious and implacable enemy.

Be vigilant, because your adversary, the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour (1. Peter 5: 8).

Funeral Services by Phonograph.

An undertaker in Brooklyn, N. Y., furnished a mechanical substitute for an absent clergyman at a funeral some time since. He had a phonograph and a series of cylinders containing a full burial service including, beside the prayers and passages of Scripture, some suitable hymns which had been sung into the receiver by a choir. It was decided to make use of this arrangement. The party assembled in the undertaker's parlor. The coffin was placed in front of the phonograph and over it projected the large trumpet of the instrument which was wreathed with flowers. The service went through without a hitch and every word was distinctly audible through the room. If a blind person had been present, he might have noticed nothing unusual in the service but have supposed that a clergyman and choir were conducting it. At first sight a service so mechanical appears heathenish, like the "Prayer-wheels" of Thibet, but when we consider how often could not write. If the gentleman would write it for him he would feel deeply grateful. Without hesitation Mr. Fuller acquiesced, and, taking up a pen, wrote probably the most unique letter ever penned by his hand. It would be a treasure to the autograph collector, but its value to the girl who received it would consist in its being a message from her lover. If it told her what she wanted to know she would care very little by whom it was written. If Christians had the same feeling about their Heavenly Father's message there would be less acrimony in the disputes about the authorship of the books of the Bible.

For no prophecy ever came by the will of man: but men spake from God, being moved by the Holy Ghost. (11. Peter 1: 21 R. V.)

Personating an Apostle.

A crafty swindler has succeeded in defrauding a poor widow in Hungary. She lives at a small village named Bezdon, where every one knows his neighbor's business. Her husband had been an industrious, thrifty man, and he left her all his savings, amounting to about four hundred dollars. A few days after his death, the widow received a mysterious visitor. He came in the dead of night, as the bearer of a communication from her late husband. In fact, he said, he was the Apostle Peter, who had the keys of heaven. Her husband had presented himself there, but because of his sins had been refused admittance. Nothing less than the sacrifice of all his savings would purge him of his sin, and he trusted that his widow would consent to the sacrifice.

The poor woman was too much agitated by the appearance of her visitor, who had a long beard, and wore a loose flowing robe, to exercise her ordinary good sense. She was also much distressed by the report of her dead husband's condition, and she finally handed to her visitor the four hundred dollars, which was all she had in the world. The impostor was clear of the town before the police were informed of the fraud. It is a pity that the woman was not better instructed, but her ignorance is not without parallel. She is not the only one who believes that the doors of heaven may be opened by a gift of money, in spite of the warning of the Apostle:

Though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, but have not love, it profiteth me nothing. (1. Cor. 13: 3 R. V.)

Music in Niagara.

A famous organist who visited Niagara lately sends to a musical journal an analysis of its mighty roar. He declares that the sound of the great cataract is majestic harmony. Listening to it for the first time, he thought he detected a musical note. Anxious to put it to the proof, he went to Goat Island, where he could get its full diapason. Thence he went to Luna Island, and finally to the Island of the Three Sisters. At each place the predominant note was clearly recognizable. It was the chord of G of the thirty-two-foot pipe of the organ, only four octaves lower. He tested it theoretically and practically. He found that the seventh note, the interval of the tenth, was of a power and clearness entirely out of proportion to the harmonies, as usually heard in the organ. "Were the tone of Niagara a mere noise," he says, "this seventh note would be either weak, or confused, or absent altogether. The beat is just once per second." The way in which he determined the pitch, was to catch the harmonic notes above D and G, that were definite in pitch, and then, counting the number of vibrations of the lower two notes, find their distance below. He is quite certain that the musical tone of the Falls is clear, definite, and unapproachable in its majestic perfection, a complete series of notes all uniting in grand and noble unison. How many people have visited the Falls without hearing in their mighty roar any hint of music! But the trained ear perceives it, and is filled with admiration of its majesty. Perhaps if our ears were attuned to the heavenly harmonies, we might hear melody in other parts of the universe where now we think there is discord or silence, and so the Psalmist's suggestion may be a fact:

Make a joyful noise unto the Lord all the earth... let the floods clap their hands. (Ps. 98: 4.)

the funeral service is conducted in Latin, which is usually unintelligible to the persons present, the phonograph does not seem so bad a substitute for the living voice. The people could at least understand the words and might derive spiritual benefit from them, which, as the Apostle says, is the main consideration:

Even things without life giving a voice, if they give not a distinction in the sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped? (1. Cor. 14:7 R. V.)

The Chief Justice's Love Letter.

An amusing incident in connection with the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court is reported in the Washington Post. It states that Mr. Fuller, having occasion to consult his physician, walked around to his residence. A man who has recently been engaged by the physician opened the door to him. He said that his employer was out, but had left word that he would soon return. He evidently had no idea that the visitor was the highest judicial authority in the United States, but he seemed to have confidence in him, for he invited him into the physician's library to wait until he returned. The Chief Justice accepted, and seated himself in his old friend's chair. He had barely done so when the serving man came in, and in an embarrassed way asked if the gentleman would do him a favor while he waited. He had a sweetheart, he said, and was very anxious to send her a letter, but unhappily he

HOME TALKS WITH

MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A BEAUTIFUL OLD AGE.

IT HAPPENED the other evening to be in company with a group of women whose ages varied from youth to several years beyond fourscore. One thing which struck me forcibly was, that the brightest, freshest and most interesting woman in the room was the lovely old grandmother. Her fine sweet face lighted up as she talked: it was full of the strength and courage of a soul which has met manifold trials, and overcome them, which has tasted the bitter cups of life, and accepted them, saying at each experience, "My Father, this is from thy hand, thy will, not mine, be done." She had a rare appreciation of fun, and her laugh was as quick and eager as that of a girl. As for her looks, I wish you could have seen how straight and tall she is, for all the world like a pine tree, and her brow had not many wrinkles, while every line written there was a line of beauty.

I spoke of this later to my niece, Jessamyn. "Oh!" said she, "there's no need to have wrinkles in these days. You rub cold cream or vaseline into your skin when you go to bed at night, and in the morning when you wash your face, you are very careful about the way you use your towel. You push it upward so as to keep the wrinkles from forming, and you gently obliterate the crow's-feet from around your eyes, and you are very particular about the corners of your mouth."

The young lady who gave me this bit of valuable information is on the borderland of twenty, with cheeks like a blush-rose, starry eyes, and the beauty that steals one's heart. She has no need to consider her towel and its methods, nor to worry herself about wrinkles, but I was greatly amused at her wisdom, and particularly entertained at the thought of my queenly old grandmother stopping in the evening of her days to have a hand-to-hand fight with her life-long friend, Father Time.

In the first place, this sweet elderly woman has always had to work pretty hard. She spent a good many years on a farm, and we all know what that means, especially when the farm is in a part of the country where help in the household is not to be had for love or money. Then, her people had not money to spare. Economy had to be practiced, and the wife and mother cheerfully set the example, and laid down the law for the rest. Also, and secondly, as the minister says in his sermon, she had the tender and imperative cares of maternity faster and longer than it is the present fashion to have them, for she bore and reared ten sons and daughters. I think there is no more charming sight in the wide world than one sees in her home now at Thanksgiving or Christmas, when the children and the children's children come back to the mother, seven sons and three daughters, bringing their beautiful families to still to hold a crowd, yet not seem crowded.

No, the dear lady did not bother with cold cream, or towels rubbing upward instead of downward. She was too busy. But, on the other hand, she said her prayers at night, and meant every word of them, and then fell asleep as a tired child does, needing no lullaby. When she had worries she did not screw up her countenance, and when she was the chief mourner at a funeral; she told the Lord the story, and did her best, and the worries straightened themselves. In all crises, expected their Lord from the heavens for their aid. They even put up with the old creed, and you may find it there in the old testament.

The blessed doctrine is still taught with their fathers. My beautiful old woman learned the secret of immortal life, and the certainty of eternal life, in the fathering confidence in the Almighty. In the old testament, the patriarchs were left their wives and children while they went four days' journey south to their annual conference, an attack was recently made by a large force of 1,500 rebels, led by a famous brigand called Ranitesimisarak. Fortunately there were three Frenchmen at this station and thirty native militia. These defended the place for three days against overwhelming odds, being all gathered together in the Mission House. Imagine the agony of the situation, seventeen ladies, nine children, two aged missionaries shut up for three days and two nights, while this fighting was going forward, with the certainty of unimaginable atrocities if the enemy should succeed. The ammunition was nearly expended when help arrived; the rebels were beaten off with the loss to all of over 300 of their number, and the defenders were saved! Thank God for such a deliverance.

Is this a good deal of talk about an old lady? Well, whatever we are now, we are all going to be old ladies if our lives are spared, and the kind we shall be depends on the way we go about the making. A fussy, cross, contrary old lady can be the most disagreeable of companions. I could tell you stories, if I liked, about that sort, for I've met them now and then on the road, and I know how grumpy and queer they can be. Why, at this moment, I think of one who made it her chief business in life to interrupt the young people of her family in the evening between nine and ten, stepping in at the parlor door, with a reproving expression on her severe old face, and saying, "It's quite time, Ellen, that your friends excused you. The clock shows that you ought to be in bed." Which, I humbly submit, was most exasperating and quite unpardonable, though it had to be endured.

The best achievement for any of us, older or younger, is to learn tranquility. The period is full of perturbation. There is little rest in our hurrying, striving times. As we fly toward the end of the century the pace is tremendous and exhausting. But, my friends, let us possess our souls in such calmness as is possible to those who dwell in a fortified place. When you take into account that most of our frictions are about petty and pitiful things, that our fault-finding and quarrels at home leave only a hurt and wounded spot to slowly heal, and that never without a scar, that most of our tempests are like the famous one in a teapot, it is hardly worth our while to be worn out to so little end and profit.

"Her Face Lighted up as She Talked."

We may better be amiable so that around about us there is always an atmosphere of sunshine. We may as well, day by day, exercise, as occasion affords opportunity, the homely virtue of patience. Let us cultivate repose of manner and quietness of mind. You and I can get through any amount of work if only we do not suffer ourselves to be agitated, and vexed, and hurried. There is no secret of beauty equal to a heart which stays ever in the bosom of infinite peace.

How to Make Home a Paradise.

FIRST of all, secure Margaret E. Sangster's magnificent Book, "Home-Life Made Beautiful." Next read it carefully—you will find it a treasure—and finally follow the simple suggestions it contains.

all plainly stated and easily carried out and the transformation that will take place in your home will be a source of constant surprise and never-failing joy. Mrs. Sangster writes so sweetly, so lovingly, and so tenderly, yet, withal, so wisely and so well, that no one who reads this charming Book can help deriving immediate and lasting advantage. There is no authoress in this country more popular, more beloved, and more respected than is Mrs. Sangster, the talented Editor of Harper's Bazar. In this magnificent Volume, she discourses on topics of the utmost importance to every wife and mother, and wise are they who secure this prize.

Much of the bright sunshine and joy of life are missed by those who do not know where to look for them. They look ever where except in the right direction, and consequently miss them; whereas if they on knew the secret of directing their gaze, the proper quarter they would have no trouble in finding what they so much wish. Like the youth in the fable, who sought everywhere abroad for Happiness, and after a vain search, on returning to his own home, and resuming his simple task was surprised and delighted to find Happiness at his side, radiant and smiling, the good people who read Mrs. Sangster's book will speedily learn the secret of finding and keeping Happiness in their own homes, however humble these may be. They need not search the world over for that which is at their own doors and beneath their own roof-trees, if they on knew. This rare book shows how a may find it.

From among the many subjects which she handles with infinite skill in this volume, we can, in this limited space mention but a very few, which will, however, indicate the scope and the practical utility of this matchless work: "What to Marry," "Domestic Friction," "The Family Check Book," "The Children's Business," "Young People and The Lovers," "Settling on a Professor," "Famous Men in Their Home Lives," "The Wives of Great Men," "Backward Children," "The Growing Girl," "How Start Your Sons in Business," and many others equal in attractiveness.

Stundist Sufferings.

PEOPLE who are advocating the interference of Russia in Armenia and are hoping that the Armenians may find liberty and the right to worship God according to their conscience, appear to have forgotten how intolerant the Russian government has proved itself to be toward its own subjects who dissent from the Greek Church. Professor Godet has done a timely service by describing the persecution of the Stundists in an article in the Missionary Review, which shows how much these devoted people have had to bear, and how faithful they have been under cruel persecution. Some of the cases cited by Professor Godet are as follows:

"Ivan Solovey, of the province of Kiev, an intelligent young man full of ardor, was accused of having spread heretical doctrines, and received an order to quit the province in a fortnight. He was the father of five children, and had a flourishing farm, which he was obliged to sell at a ruinous price. He departed for the province of Kherson, but he had hardly settled there when he received another command to move. He borrowed money to buy grain;

but usurers took all he possessed in payment. An old horse, which he still retained, was the only mode of conveyance for his whole family. After traveling about a month they reached the province of Bessarabia; but two children had died en route. He had just settled near Kischeneff when a new order arrived for him to depart. A third child had died in the mean time. The family pressed on toward Taurida, where they hoped to find friends who would help them. But the police informed him that he must once more take to the road, and they sent him to Caucasasia, where he finally arrived, a broken-down, persecuted man, with a sick wife and but two remaining children.

Another case is that of a distinguished preacher of Kiev, Ivan Lisotski, who was compelled to leave his home, having been robbed of all that he had. Two of his children succumbed to the hardships of the journey. For ten years he was driven from province to province without abatement; nevertheless, from his exile beyond the Caucasus he encouraged his brethren in Russia by his letters. We might also cite the case of Golovchenko, pastor of the province of Ekaterinoslav, who was condemned to four years' imprisonment on account of preaching Stundist doctrines. At the expiration of his term the priest of his village opposed his return, and he was banished for life to Siberia, by order of the local government. In the mean time his wife and children, whom he passionately loved, died miserably from starvation.

The Christian Herald for 1897.

IN once more extending our annual greeting to our world-wide circle of friends, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cordially invites them to accompany it into fresh fields of literary and artistic enjoyment, and new avenues of Christian usefulness. As a band of brothers and sisters, they will be associated in a multitude of good works, will visit and explore new scenes in many lands, and will be brought into pleasant and profitable acquaintance with the grandest men and women of our day and generation.

While all the standard features that have made THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a universal favorite will be retained, there are many new and delightful surprises in store for our readers during the coming year. Of course, Dr. Talmage, our Editor-in-Chief, will continue to consider, editorially, the leading events of the day, and his sermons, carefully revised by himself, will appear regularly as heretofore.

Pastor Thomas Spurgeon, who has succeeded his eminent father as pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle in London, and who preaches to the greatest audiences on the other side of the Atlantic, is now on our staff of regular contributors. Mr. Spurgeon has that wonderful pithy, humorous and cheerful good sense, and that marvelous power of condensing a sermon into an epigram, that made his much-lamented father's sermons such delightful reading.

Amelia E. Barr, America's greatest authoress, has written, exclusively for our columns, the most remarkable and fascinating Serial Story that has ever come from her gifted and prolific pen. It is entitled "The King's Highway," and is so charming and dramatic, that it cannot fail to afford exceptional pleasure to all our readers. Mrs. Barr will also contribute a series of unique articles, dealing with questions closely allied to our home and social lives.

Hon. Selah Merrill, for eight years United States Consul in Jerusalem, who has made life in Palestine the subject of closest observation and study, has engaged to write a series of articles on "The Modern Jew In His Ancestral Home." He will describe the street life of the Holy City, the amusements of its people, their festivals, their newly-founded colonies, and many other attractive and picturesque phases of their social life. The illustrations are absolutely unique, being from photographs taken by Dr. Merrill with his own camera. These wonderfully graphic articles afford a truer conception of Jewish home life than can be had from any other source.

Margaret E. Sangster, widely and favorably known to all lovers of sweet poetry and helpful prose, and who charmingly combines the practical with the sympathetic, will conduct a series of "Home Talks With Mothers and Daughters," which will, undoubtedly, contribute to a happier, healthier and more beautiful home life wherever THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is read.

Ira D. Sankey, whose name is a household word wherever good music is appreciated, and whose inspiring songs are sung in every land and in every tongue, will continue to supply each week some original or selected musical contribution specially adapted to the requirements of the Home Circle.

Another gratifying addition to our staff is the Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage, the gifted son of our beloved Editor, who has inherited, in no small measure, the genius of his illustrious father. A careful student, and a talented, pleasant and ready writer, his contributions will be read with a peculiar interest by the countless thousands who, for many years, have been accustomed to associate the family name with the highest type of pulpit eloquence.

Gen. John Eaton of Washington, D. C., contributes a series of articles on "Mormonism of the Present Day," a revelation to our readers, while U. S. Commissioner in Utah for had exception-obtaining acclamation, and mask from this ous iniquity, er dead nor shows that its meating the litical life of that its propaganda is rich and powerful, and that its aim is treason and national debasement. These articles, splendidly illustrated, should be read by every one who values national purity, and the permanent well-being of our Republican institutions.

The whole world knows and loves Fanny Crosby, the blind hymn-writer, whose life has been one long, labor, under the auspices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, both as teacher and physician. In her ministrations she will doubtless aid many poor Armenian fugitives, who, by crossing the mountains, have escaped the fate of their massacred friends. Dr. Yoseph's letters, which she will write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be illustrated with photographs, and will be particularly interesting, as they will deal with a remote section of the world, little known to travelers or to Christian missionaries, and full of glorious Gospel-opportunities.

Rev. Louis Albert Banks, D.D., the eminent and eloquent Methodist divine, will arouse the spirit of emulation by a series of wonderfully attractive anecdotal articles, on "Heroism of Character," in which interesting and instructive episodes in the lives of the distinguished and noble men and women of our own day will be related for the first time. Dr. Banks is a Master of anecdotal literature, and his contributions dealing with actual events in the experiences of living people, will charm and inspire all who read them. These "Living Stories" will find a warm welcome from all our readers, who cannot fail to feel the spell of this fascinating writer. His ardent sympathy with struggling humanity and his strenuous desire to help them has led him to study the lives of those who have achieved success in all walks of life and his mind is consequently stored with anecdotes, the brightest and best of which he will now recount for the delectation of our army of readers.

Besides those already mentioned, a host of other brilliant writers in all parts of the world will contribute to our pages. There is hardly a country on the round globe that has not added at least one personality to this phalanx of literary talent, thus giving infinite variety to every issue of the paper. Among the contributors are Dr. Grace Kimball, the Missionary Heroine of Van; Hon. Sheldon Jackson, the Alaska Missionary and Explorer; Ex-U.S. Senator Henry W. Blair, of New Hampshire; Rev. C. H. Mead, Rev. Dr. R. S. McArthur, Rev. Dr. Hawthorne, of Atlanta, Ga.; Mrs. Baxter, of London; Heli Chatelain, the African Liberator; Rev. A. S. Gumbart, of Boston, the writer of

Delightful Sermons for the Young, and Missionary Correspondents in Central Africa, Arabia, Mesopotamia, China, India, Japan, Korea, Asia Minor, and the Islands of the Pacific.

The International Sunday School Lessons, in which the topic of the week is interestingly discussed and beautifully illustrated; the Mail-Bag, through which all our readers may ask and receive advice and information on any topic; the Bible and the Newspaper (full of live illustrations for preachers and Sunday School Teachers), the Family and Home Circle, with its pleasant prattle and friendly counsel in behalf of the younger generation and the "old folks" as well; Advance Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic, and the multitude of other features which in the past have endeared THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to its hundreds of thousands of readers will all be continued, including its magnificent front pages printed in many bright and beautiful colors, and a thousand and one superb artistic attractions besides those mentioned above.

"THE HOME OF THE BIBLE."

By Marion Harland.

IN producing this incomparable Book, Marion Harland has made the whole Christian world her Debtor. No such living and breathing Panorama of Modern Life in Palestine, has ever been unrolled before and re-read with ever-increasing pleasure, and to be treasured by our children's children afterward.

Marion Harland is Chaperone, Cicerone, and Dragoman in one, and to read her wonderful narrative in "The Home of the Bible," is to derive all the enjoyment of a Personally-conducted Tour in Palestine, without incurring any of the Discomforts incident to actual travel. We seem to see the sacred places, and to breathe the delicate odor of the incense; we walk and converse with the Venerable Rabbis of Jerusalem and the learned men of all the Oriental religions; we camp with our guide on the margin of the Jordan, by Galilee and the Dead Sea; we cull bouquets of wild-flowers on the fields of Boaz, and roses on Sharon's Plain; we greet the shy Marys and Marthas in their homes, and break bread at their tables, and we courageously become the guest of the Bedouins of the Plains and the dark-eyed, warlike Druses of Carmel and Lebanon. We talk softly with the bare-footed and sun-browned children of the city "where Jesus was brought up," and our eyes grow tender as we look upon them at their play. We are privileged guests at festival, betrothal, and wedding, and our pity is awakened for the Child-Women of the East. We whirl across Esdraelon and past the Hauran by rail, and we loiter in the glittering bazars of world-old Damascus. On our return, we linger awhile on Calvary, and muse on Olivet, as we listen to the soothing songs of the shepherds in the fields below.

No other writer has Lifted the Veil from the inner life of Palestine as Marion Harland has done in this Splendid Volume of 446 Pages, with its multitude of exquisite Photographic Illustrations, taken expressly for this work. Apart, however, from its inestimable literary and artistic worth, "The Home of the Bible" will be inexpressibly dear to all who love to read of that Land where the Patriarchs and Prophets dwelt and where "the Son of God Walked Blessedness of the godly.

4 Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak: I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.

5 I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear: but now mine eye seeth thee.

6 Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.

7 ¶ And it was so, that after the LORD had spoken these words unto Job, the LORD said to Eliphaz the Temanite, My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends: for ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath.

8 Therefore take unto you now seven bullocks and seven rams, and go to my servant Job, and offer up for yourselves a burnt offering; and my servant Job shall pray for you: for him will I accept: lest I deal with you after your folly, in that ye have not spoken of me the thing which is right, like my servant Job.

9 ¶ So Eliphaz the Temanite and Bildad the Shuhite and Zophar the Naamathite went, and did according as the LORD commanded them: the LORD also accepted Job.

10 And the LORD turned the captivity of Job, when he prayed for his friends:

also the LORD gave Job twice as much as he had before.

11 Then came there unto him all his brethren, and all his sisters, and all they that had been of his acquaintance before, and did eat bread with him in his house: and they bemoaned him, and comforted him over all the evil that the LORD had brought upon him: every man also gave him a piece of money, and every one an earring of gold.

12 So the LORD blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning: for he had fourteen thousand sheep, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she asses.

13 He had also seven sons and three daughters.

PSALM 1.

Happiness of the godly, misery of the wicked.

BLESSED is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful.

2 But his delight is in the law of the LORD; and in his law doth he meditate day and night.

3 And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.

4 The ungodly are not so: but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away.

5 Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous.

6 For the LORD knoweth the way of the righteous: but the way of the ungodly shall perish.

4 He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the LORD shall have them in derision.

5 Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure.

6 Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion.

7 I will declare the decree: the LORD hath said unto me, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee.

8 Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.

9 Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel.

10 Be wise now therefore, O ye kings: be instructed, ye judges of the earth.

11 Serve the LORD with fear, and rejoice with trembling.

12 Kiss of the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.

Our Superb 1897 Library---Just Out.

TEN Charming Books, Each a Literary Gem, and All Beautiful Specimens of Artistic Book-making, With Attractive BOOK-CASE, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for One Year—52 Times—all for Only $3.

EVER has THE CHRISTIAN HERALD been privileged to offer a more useful, a more interesting, a more attractive or a more satisfactory premium, in every respect, than our 1897 Library.

Specially prepared for lovers of pure, wholesome and elevating literature, these ten delightful volumes, (ten splendid Christmas gifts,) aggregating 3,200 pages of large type, and bound in rich olive vellum cloth, with red and gilt titles, combine to make a premium surpassing in intrinsic value and general superiority, all the wonderful premium inducements of the past. This exceptionally fine collection of choice books commends itself at sight, and its possession will contribute to make many a home cheerier, happier and brighter. We unhesitatingly, and without any mental reservation whatever, cordially recommend this Home Library to the favorable consideration of our numerous readers, and we are confident that wherever it is received it will rapidly make sincere friends for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Many people, after having mailed a letter containing money, become prematurely impatient for a response, and feel considerable disappointment in not receiving their premium at an unduly early date. The trouble generally is that they do not make a sufficient time-allocation for their letters to arrive in New York and the goods to reach their hands.

And now to guard against miscalculations that may result in disappointment, we append, for the information of all our friends, at the foot of this article, a table indicating the time which must of necessity elapse between the mailing of a letter and the delivery of the premium to the subscriber, either by express or mail.

Last year over 25,000 orders were received after our first supply was exhausted. This year we have again a large supply of the Home Library, and we are anxious to have it requested so to do, we will, at our own expense, telegraph to subscribers should it be impossible to fill their orders from stock immediately, which will enable them to make other provision elsewhere. At once, we will return the money in every instance of such compulsory disappointment at once.

If for any reason, our 1897 Library should fail to give entire satisfaction, we will, on its return, and without asking for any explanation, gladly, cheerfully, and promptly refund the full amount involved.

We recommend a careful perusal of the following notices of the ten books which comprise THE CHRISTIAN HERALD 1897 Library, all contained in a handsome book-case, securely packed and delivered to any address in the United States or Canada, all charges prepaid, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one whole year (52 times) for only $3.

1. The Wedding Ring.

By REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.

Marriage is a subject universally interesting and tremendously important. The wise counsel which Dr. Talmage in his captivating volume, "The Wedding Ring," offers to young folks and their parents, his advice on "How to Choose a Husband" and "How to Choose a Wife," and his able talks on "The Relations of Wife to Husband and Husband to Wife," will help his many readers to act wisely and judiciously in matters that may decide the destiny of loved ones for time and for eternity. His two chapters on "Clandestine Marriages" and "Woman Enthroned" should be read by every member of the gentler sex.

2. The Secret of a Happy Home.

By MARION HARLAND.

"The Secret of a Happy Home" is not yet generally in possession of the people. Many homes, in which all the conditions for happiness exist in generous measure, are yet unhappy, and the book which Marion Harland here sends forth into the world is calculated to transform many an abode of comparative misery into an Eden of felicity.

Get this precious volume, and read it aloud in the family circle. It offers suggestions and hints which will help each member to contribute a proportionate share toward making home what it should be, a veritable haven of bliss.

3. Notable 19th Century Events.

By JOHN CLARK RIDPATH, D.D.

The nineteenth century is the most remarkable of all that this old world has ever seen. Never was history made faster, never did progress achieve greater strides, and never were enterprises and inventions so numerous and so successful. Of the events of this century, which have shaped the world of to-day, and which every citizen should know, are told in a manner so captivating that we read on until the eyes tire and we are compelled to lay it aside for awhile, only to take it up again for another draught on its inexhaustible treasury. Dr. Henry Mann, who has contributed this grand volume to our Library, has, through it, done excellent service to his country.

"Notable Events of the 19th Century," Dr. John Clark Ridpath, whose name is a synonym for good authorship and erudition, has very cleverly selected and very ably handled those particular events in the political, military, naval, scientific, and religious world that have exerted the mightiest influences during the present century. A marvelous subject and a marvelous book.

4. How to Succeed.

By ORISON S. MARDEN, M.D.

Everybody in this world is eager to achieve success. Countless thousands who are plodding on day after day, making little or no progress, could turn their industry to mighty advantage did they but enjoy the benefit of proper and intelligent guidance. In his grandly inspiring book, "How to Succeed," Dr. O. S. Marden, the famous author of "Pushing to the Front," and "Architects of Fate," supplies just what is needed in that direction, and no one can read this excellent volume without deriving infinite advantage. We keep well within the limits of fact when we claim for this book that it is the best one of its kind ever published.

5. Holiday Stories for the Young.

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Young people will read stories, and it is right that they should; but too much care cannot be exercised in making proper selection. A bad story has often blighted a life that might have been beautiful, and a good story has not infrequently given a tendency in the right direction that has held for time and eternity. In "Holiday Stories for the Young," Margaret E. Sangster has made a contribution to literature for young people which clearly demonstrates the fact that good stories can be made much more attractive than vile ones, and that purity does not necessarily go hand in hand with insipidity. This fascinating collection will speedily commend itself to our young friends, who will find in it a mine of delightful entertainment.

6. The Land we Live In.

By HENRY MANN.

"The Land we Live In." God bless it, and preserve it! No better land in all the world! How we love it! What a privilege to dwell in it! How interesting its history and the story of its growth and its marvelous development! Here is a volume that tells us all about it. It reads like a fairy-tale. Things we never knew, but which every American should know, are told in a manner so captivating that we read on until the eyes tire and we are compelled to lay it aside for awhile, only to take it up again for another draught on its inexhaustible treasury. Dr. Henry Mann, who has contributed this grand volume to our Library, has, through it, done excellent service to his country.

7. Winter Evening Tales.

By AMELIA E. BARR.

Amelia E. Barr's name is a household word wherever pure literature is treasured. Her volume of "Winter Evening Tales" is brimful of entrancement. From beginning to end, it captivates and charms. Mrs. Barr is an admirable writer of capital stories, and she is a master-hand at dressing them up in a simply irresistible and inimitable manner. The book-shelf this winter will afford few, if any, volumes that will be read with greater interest or more genuine satisfaction.

8. Recitations for the Social Circle.

By JAMES CLARENCE HARVEY.

In "Recitations for the Social Circle," James Clarence Harvey, the well-known poet and author, has succeeded in presenting a collection of charming prose and poetry which agreeably combines all the elements of delightful entertainment. We here find hundreds of literary gems, humorous, pathetic, sober, witty, and patriotic; all pure, all elevating, with not a questionable word in the whole collection. Old and young will find amusement and entertainment in this handy little volume, which does infinite credit to its talented compiler.

9. The Fairy-Land of Science.

By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY.

We are very prone to go through the world with our eyes shut. Half the beauties are missed because we do not suspect their existence, and are too blind to see them. Read "The Fairy-land of Science," and learn why we lost much that we might have enjoyed. Do not think it dry or tedious, for it reads like a romance, and once read, the eyes are opened and things now tame and uninteresting are suddenly and permanently invested with wonderful interest and attractiveness. One hour spent with this delightful volume will reveal a multitude of nearby wonders hitherto hidden from view.

10. Thoughts of Many Minds.

By LOUIS KLOPSCH, Ph.D.

"Many Thoughts of Many Minds" is a volume which will prove exceedingly helpful to many people. It contains quotations, from standard authors of recognized ability, on nearly every subject that engages the human mind, and these 2500 extracts from the choicest literature of all ages and tongues, topically arranged, constitute a treasury of thought which, we are sure, will be acceptable and serviceable to all into whose hands this volume may chance to fall.

Which of the Two shall it be?

MANY of our friends will be delighted to learn that we are enabled to supply a limited number of the very excellent Library which we offered last year, and for which more than 25,000 belated orders were received after the original stock had been exhausted. The ten superior volumes which constituted Library No. 1 gave universal satisfaction, and the kind words of those who received them last year induced a continuous and persistent demand. The present stock closes out Library No. 1, and when that is exhausted no more orders for our 1896 Library can be filled. Our readers, no doubt, understand that these ten books are entirely different from those offered on pages 910 and 911 of this issue. As it may be a difficult thing at this late date to recall the titles and authors of the books constituting our 1896 Library, we herewith submit the entire list for the last time, and we sincerely trust that this final call may be heeded by all intending purchasers in ample season to prevent disappointment:

1. Around the Tea Table.
By T. DEWITT TALMAGE, D.D., LL.D.
2. Book of Golden Deeds.
By CHARLOTTE M. YONGE.
3. Readings and Recitations.
By B. J. FERNIE, Ph.D.
4. The Golden Treasury.
By C. H. VON BOGATZKY.
5. A Budget of Christmas Tales.
By CHAS. DICKENS and others.
6. How to Get On in the World.
By MAJOR A. R. CALHOUN.
7. Capital Stories.
By NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE and others.
8. The Citizens' Handbook.
By HENRY MANN.
9. The Children's Portion.
By ROBERT W. SHOPPELL.
10. Entertainment and Etiquette.
By G. H. SANDISON, A.M., Ph.D.

These ten delightful books are charmingly written, pure, elevated in tone, and very handsomely bound in rich red silk cloth, with artistic gilt designs, and packed in an attractive Book-case, lined with imported marbled material, and covered with the same rich silk cloth as is used on the books. The price of the 1896 (No. 1) Library is the same as for the 1897 (No. 2) Library, namely: The whole ten Volumes in an attractive Book-case, as per illustration. All Charges Prepaid to any address in the United States or Canada, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for One Year—52 Times—together for only $3.

This Library aggregates 3,200 pages of large type matter, and every volume has an illustrated title page. The whole set weighs over six pounds.

For BOTH the 1896 and 1897 Libraries, altogether twenty beautiful volumes, All Charges Prepaid, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for One Year—52 Times—together for only $5.

THE MODERN JEW

IN HIS ANCESTRAL HOME

BY HON. SELAH MERRILL D.D., LL.D.

THE PECULIAR PEOPLE.

Characteristics of the Jerusalem Jew — What Brought Him There — How He Keeps the Sabbath—Solemn Curse of an Undutiful Son—The Jewish Colonies.

IT is well known that some worthy topics plead in vain for public recognition; they do not arrest the attention of a busy world; but the Jewish question is of another kind, altogether, and interest in it is always vital and absorbing. It is at once very ancient and very modern; it pertains to all countries; it touches governments, literature, art, finance, and especially religion. No other member of the human family appeals to us as does the Jew. In Jerusalem, Berlin, London, and New York; in Africa, Central Asia, and Russia, he is named with feelings of disgust, he is made the butt of ridicule, he is gazed at as an inexplicable phenomenon, or he is almost worshipped by ardent admirers.

What a multitude of scholars and thinkers are devoting their earnest energies to a study of Jewish life in its manifold aspects! Our libraries are full of books showing the achievements of the Jewish race, trying to explain the mystery or the miracle of their continued existence, or endeavoring to persuade the whole world that before this people there is a golden future.

The phase of the Jewish question which it is proposed now to discuss is one of special interest confined to our own time and to a particular country, which is Palestine.

In several of its cities there are Jewish settlements, by far the largest of which is that at Jerusalem. Besides these there are in different parts of the country a few Jewish colonies—curious and interesting objects on the sacred landscape—of which derers: they look as if they had suffered oppression and hardships of many kinds. Contrasted with Englishmen, Russians, Germans, or the French they seem to have little ambition and little life. Being from different countries they speak different languages. Their political ideas are those of the respective lands where they were born. Still they are without political power. They seem to have come from the obscure and humblest classes, a mass of humanity for which the great world has little use or place.

We may not be able to discern the real motives which have brought these thousands of Israel to the Holy Land, still no believer in Providence can say that they have come without aim or purpose. The hope that they would be benefited in material things must be put down as one of the principal motives prompting these Jews to migrate to Palestine. Real friends of the Jews believe that on to this motive there may, in due time, be grafted a desire for betterment in spiritual things.

In studying the modern Jew in his ancestral home, it would not be fair to judge him by ancient standards. He represents no nation, is inspired by no living issues in the political, social, literary, or religious world.

Many dead centuries lie between him and his golden past. He is alone in the midst of ruins and graves. He is without power and his lot is a hard one, for to him are appointed, not wealth, position, honors, but hardships, struggles, ostracism, ignorance, and poverty. It may be the day is not unwelcome to him, nor is the day itself irksome. Friday afternoon is spent in preparation for it, so that labor is reduced to the smallest amount and confined strictly to what is absolutely necessary. The day is one of rest, literally "Sabbath" for man and beast. The members of his household indulge in some conversation, but there is almost no reading, for his house is practically destitute of books. Walking, riding, or visiting for pleasure is quite unknown. The morning synagogue service is attended regularly, but in starting, arriving, or on the way to or from the place of worship his conduct is quiet, unostentatious, and dignified.

A POLISH JEWISH FAMILY.
(Going to Worship in Jerusalem.)

SPANISH JEWS GOING TO SYNAGOGUE.

To attribute his manner of observing the Sabbath to an intense desire to honor God, and to obey his laws, would be to supply motives which it is certain, in many cases, do not exist; but whether prompted by a devout spirit, or whether it is largely due to education and habit, his veneration for the day is, to an observer, simply admirable. It is a public recognition of the fact that God has claims upon his creatures. What has been described will be thought, by some persons, too strict a method of observing the Sabbath, and they assert that the day should be a holiday and not regarded as holy time. Such a theory I cannot discuss, for I am picturing the modern Jew and his quiet, restful Sabbath in Jerusalem today. In the case of the New England fathers, something made them great and sturdy in their moral character, and there are people still living who are old-fashioned enough to assign as the reason their method of keeping the Sabbath, which certainly closely resembles the Jewish method. No one supposes, however, that observing the Sabbath according to strict conscientious, perhaps austere rules, will alone produce the highest types of character.

The modern Jew in his ancestral home, maintains the style of family life for which, in all ages, his race has been peculiar. The father is the head of the household, and remains so till his death. The children are taught obedience, and, in general, there is no absence of filial consideration and deference. The wishes and pleasure of the parents are paramount to all other claims. The father instructs his children by conversation rather than by lessons, although it cannot be denied that sons receive by far a larger share of such paternal instruction than the daughters. Cases occur, it could hardly be otherwise, where the sons become wayward and bring reproach upon the family. In my official experience, I have known a father become so outraged at the conduct of his son as to pronounce upon him a curse and no amount of persuasion would induce him afterwards to withdraw his terrible words. We know from Bible history much about the ideal Jewish family life, and modern Jerusalem can furnish many examples which approach those delightful pictures of ancient times. Taking only those Jews who come within the limit of our present subject, it can be said that the fifth commandment is more fully carried out by them, both in its spirit and letter, than any of the others. No one conversant with all the facts would claim that this style of family life is perfect, still it is attractive from many points of view, and forms another hopeful factor in the problem of purifying and up-lifting this once honored race. This will be more fully developed in further letters.

SELAH MERRILL.

CALVARY HILL—"THE CENTRE OF THE WORLD'S HOPE."

we propose to speak at length in a subsequent article. These Jews are from more than a dozen different countries of Europe, from America, from Persia and Central Asia, from India, from Southern Arabia, and from Africa. They have not come like the armies of Joshua for the purpose of invasion and conquest. They are not a military people, they are not the wealthy of the earth, they are not learned nor strong. For the most part they are simple people, poorly clad, with very plain features, with no prepossessing physical characteristics, without education, wealth, or power. Indeed they seem like wan-possible that he has become hardened by ages of suffering so that this contrast does not affect him so keenly as it otherwise would. If this is true it is a mercy. Still it would be passing strange if a sense of his condition did not at times almost overwhelm him with depression and sadness.

The modern Jew in his ancestral home maintains his reverence for the Sabbath. His dress and manner on that day indicate a marked change in the routine of his ordinary daily life. His store or shop is closed, and all work has ceased. There is a quiet about his home which is noticeable and imperative. The approach of

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

Dwellers in Old Granada.

The Present People of the Ancient Moorish Capital Picturesque Suburbs.

IN the Spain of to-day there is comparatively little left of the pomp and splendor of that period during which the armies of old Castile by land and fleets by sea were among the strongest and most victorious of any of the great nations. Notwithstanding national pride, Spain is now very poor, and her people are feeling the burdens of a country which has exhausted much of its resources. Its working classes are agriculturists, laborers, miners, artisans, shepherds, and sailors, these constituting two-thirds of the population: merchants and tradesmen form about one-seventh, while another seventh includes officials, soldiers, nobility, and beggars. A very large proportion of the nobility is quite poor, including hidalgos; and, strange to say, beggars are nearly as numerous as hidalgos.

Our photographic illustrations on this page present two very interesting rural scenes in Granada, one of the oldest cities of Southern Spain. The city proper (that part of it which encloses the famed Alhambra) is surrounded by high and ruinous walls, whose strong towers are now in decay. One of the landmarks of the ancient capital is King Charles' Well (shown in the picture), and concerning it there is a somewhat romantic tradition, which the Spanish people relate to travelers. Here the Andalusian maids come with their old-fashioned earthenware pitchers to draw water and the horses drink at its trough in the heat of the day. These young Spanish peasant women, with their stuff gowns and loose white bodices, recall the women of Holland and the Netherlands, only they are far more slender than their fair-skinned and sunny-haired northern sisters. Another characteristic figure is the Granada milkman, who in that part of Alfonso's realm makes his rounds upon a mule with his milk-cans dangling in mat panniers at either side—certainly a substantial load for the poor beast to carry, if the cans are ever full.

Granada's streets are narrow, crooked, and uneven, and the houses, though substantial, are very gloomy and heavy in appearance. Some of the public squares are pleasant and quite spacious, and there are enough national attractions in the outskirts to make it well worth while for the artist or traveler to explore. There is a mediæval air about everything in Granada that brings back memories of Boabdil, of Ferdinand and Isabella, and of the glories of the Alhambra.

The Pretty Cottages of Holland.

Dutch architecture has a special charm. The roads are cheery-red roofed, or surly thatched cottages with their slouched roofs pulled down over the eaves. In the doorways and yards the busy Dutch house everything within reach, including the they hang in rows on nails outside the door. Almost every little house has flowers in the window and in the garden, where that puts the high light in the costliest and most homelike picture in the world. Stock black and white cows stand out in the men of Holland look odd in their caps and baggy trousers. The women wear kirtles, gathered into belts at the waist, with three-cornered ties at the neck, and caps. All wear wooden shoes. The young maidens are out in their Sunday clothes—colored and figured silk bodices of red, white sleeves, and the plain linen band over the forehead. One bride looks radiant in her yellow hair, banded to her eyebrows and curled above them, to give a strangeness never even conceived by a Dutch painter of the grotesque. Her cheeks are lilies and roses.

A Leaf Social.

One of the prettiest of home entertainments this fall—though yet but little known—is the Leaf Social. It is sometimes used as a means of raising money for a benevolent purpose. Leaves are cut from green cambric to resemble those of different forest trees and garden plants. One is given by the doorkeeper to each lady on entering the room, and its mate is put into a large box. When the company arrives the leaves in the box are shaken and sold to the gentlemen, who pay ten cents, each of whom draws a leaf from the box without being allowed to see it until he has it in his possession. This entitles him to refreshment (cake, coffee, lemonade, or ices) for himself and lady. He knows her by the leaf she wears pinned to her dress, which must resemble exactly that purchased by him, even to the color of the thread used in veining. Much amusement is found in the attempt to match the leaves, and the stiffness so noticeable at many socials is entirely overcome. The table is decorated with leaves, and at each plate is a leaf cut from white paper, on which the one who sits at that place must write a rhyme or sentence containing the name of the leaf and sign his name to it. All who fail to write the rhyme are compelled to pay a small fine. A lady gathers up the leaves before the guests leave the table and reads the rhymes aloud without mentioning the names signed; then a vote is taken to decide upon the two best rhymes, and the authors of them each receive a beautiful house plant, or some such gift.

Maternal Love.

There is probably no stronger and more lasting passion in human nature than the love of a mother for her child. A striking illustration of the power of a mother's love was afforded recently. A woman was wheeling her child in a baby carriage when a fractious horse knocked the vehicle aside. The horse continued to plunge, but although she herself was much injured, the mother crawled on her hands and knees to her child to protect it. She had scarcely covered the infant with her arms when the horse trampled on her. The brave mother had several ribs broken, and her right lung injured, while her face was cut and bruised.

The child, which would certainly have been killed, escaped with only a shaking. Its life was undoubtedly saved though its mother's heroism inspired by love.

The Patter of Little Feet.

The old adage, that a girl is worth a thousand dollars and a boy worth fifteen hundred, is a depreciation of values. I warrant that the man who invented the theory was a bachelor, or he would not have set down the youngsters so far below cost. When the poorest child is born, a star of joy points down to the manger. We are tired of hearing of the duty that children owe to their parents. Let some one write a disquisition on what parents owe to their children. What, though they do upset things, and chase the cats, and eat themselves into colic with green apples, and empty the castor of sweet-oil into the grave, and bedaub their hands with tar? Grown people have the privilege of larger difficulties, and will you not let the children have a few smaller predicaments? How can we ever pay them for the prattle that drives our cares away, and the shower of soft flaxen curls on our hot cheek, and the flowers they have strewn in our way?

KING CHARLES' WELL, GRANADA, SPAIN.

A well-regulated home is a millennium on a small scale—the lion and leopard nature by infantile stroke subdued—and “a little child shall lead them.” Blessed the pillow of the trundle-bed on which rests the young head that never ached! Blessed the day whose morning is awakened by the patter of little feet! Blessed the heart from which all the soreness is drawn out by the soft hand of a babe!

What One Child Did.

This beautiful incident is vouched for by an old Sunday School superintendent. He had asked his pupils to bring, each of them, a new scholar to Sunday School. One went to his father and said: “Father, will you go to Sunday School with me?” “I can't read, my son,” replied the father. “Our teacher will teach you,” answered the boy, with feeling in his tones. “Well, I'll go,” said the father. He went, learned to read, sought and found the Saviour, and at length became a colporteur. Years passed on, and that man had established 400 Sunday schools, into which 35,000 children were gathered. Thus we see what trying did. This boy's efforts were like a tiny rill, which soon swells into a brook, and at length becomes a river. His effort saved his father, who, being saved, led 35,000 children into Sunday School.

“WHERE ARE THE CHILDREN?”

ONE asks, “Pray, where are the children?” The rosy-cheeked girls and boys, With their simple ways and their old-time plays, And their jubilant laughter and noise. And Echo says, Where are the children? The girls so gentle and shy, The boys so manly and fearless; Will nobody make reply? O, the dear old-fashioned children, Who made the dim woods ring, Who trampled the daisied meadows, Or soared in the breathless swing— Who sauntered along at school-time, Lovers in childhood's guise,— The boy with his brown cheeks blushing, The girl with her downcast eyes. He carried her books and basket, He helped her over the stream; Often in years of manhood, Did he think of that first, sweet dream. Now there is plenty of mincing, And frolic in small degree; But the charming old-time children, Alas! Shall we ever see?

—E. V. S.

Two Homes.

HERE are a man and wife; they agree in nothing, but they agree they will have a home, writes Rev. Dr. Talmage. They will have a splendid house, and they think that if they have a house they will have a home. Architects make the plan, and the mechanics execute it; the house to cost one hundred thousand dollars. It is done. The carpets are spread, lights are hoisted, curtains are hung, cards of invitation sent out. The horses in gold-plated harness prance at the gate; guests come in and take their places; the flute sounds; the dancers go up and down; and with one grand whirl the wealth and the fashion and the mirth of the great town wheel amidst the pictured walls. Ha! this is happiness. Happiness, indeed! Let us build on the centre of the parlor floor a throne to Happiness; let all the guests when they come in bring their flowers and pearls and diamonds, and throw them on this pyramid, and let it be a throne; and then let Happiness, the Queen, mount the throne. But the guests depart, the flutes are breathless, the last clash of the impatient hoofs is heard in the distance, and the twain of the household come back to see the Queen of Happiness on the throne amid the parlor floor. But, alas! as they come back the flowers have faded, the sweet odors have become the smell of a charnel-house, and instead of the Queen of Happiness there sits the gaunt form of Anguish, with bitten lip and sunken eye, and ashes in her hair.

That very night a clerk with a salary of a thousand dollars a year—only one thousand—goes to his home, set up three months ago, just after the marriage-day. Love meets him at the door; love sits with him at the table; love talks over the work of the day; love takes down the Bible, and reads of him who came our souls to save; and they kneel, and while they are kneeling—right in that plain room, on that plain carpet—the angels of God build a throne, not out of flowers that perish and fade away, but out of garlands of heaven, wreath on top of wreath, amaranth on amaranth, until the throne is done. Then the harps of God sounded, and suddenly there appeared one who mounted the throne, with eyes so bright and brow so fair that the twain knew it was Christian love. And they knelt at the throne, and, putting one hand on each head, she blessed them, and said: “Happiness is with me!” And they sang songs of love, and walked on pavements of love, and lived together in mansions of love, and rejoiced forever in the truth that God is love.

Solomon's Life and Works.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning December 13. 1. Kings 3: 5-15.

It is significant that of all the Bible characters, Solomon is the one about whose ultimate salvation there has been most discussion. That a man with everything in his favor, unlimited wealth, divinely-given wisdom, undisturbed peace, and autocratic power, should have so ed that to this day men doubt whether his soul was saved or not, is a lesson in itself of no slight significance. The first and most conspicuous lesson from his life, therefore, is that the true good of life is not to be found in wealth, or power, or even in wisdom. With all these, a man may make a miserable end. With all his advantages Solomon was surpassed in his achievements by less favored men. Even his magnificence, in which he seemed to be incomparable, furnished our Lord with a derogatory comparison: Solomon all his glory was not arrayed so beautifully as the lily of the field. The ancient tradition of his death is a most suggestive picture. The story goes that in his old age he went into the Temple, and robed and crowned, stood between the pillars, leaning on his staff, his long white hair and beard flowing over his robe of Tyrian purple. There, as he faced the Holy of Holies, he died. He remained standing, but the people saw that he was dead. None, however, dare approach him, because, of the dreaded magic sign of the Pentacle, which was on his ring and on his staff. The priests went about their duties and the people streamed to and fro, awed by that strange spectacle of the dead old man leaning on his staff. At last a little brown mouse ran out and gnawed at the leather on the bottom of the staff. Flat on his face in the dust fell the once mighty king, who had been the wonder and admiration of his age, overturned by a mouse.

Solomon was a conspicuous example of defect in human nature of which all are more or less conscious. Men need something at God's hand beside knowledge. One knew what was right and what was wrong better than Solomon. His proverbs show that he had almost superhuman perception, yet he failed. The best creed of the most irreproachable orthodoxy is not sufficient to keep a man from sin. Solomon craved knowledge and wisdom from God, and he received both, but he lacked the moral force to govern his life according to his belief. The man who had written so much against sinful love, sporting a shameful harem; the man who had offered that wonderful prayer, building altars to Moloch and Astarte, is a spectacle full of warning to all who are resting in their knowledge or their wisdom in their orthodoxy.

Solomon's career is an impressive warning against evil associations. There could be no question that his marriage with Pharaoh's daughter was a brilliant match from a worldly standpoint, yet it was the beginning of the wise king's decline. That business had a Hebrew king with an Egyptian wife? She led him astray to the fascinations of Egyptian polytheism. When Christian people are anxious to get into worldly society and are eager to have their children make the acquaintance of ungodly, wealthy, and aristocratic people, in order that they may rise in the social scale, they are acting on the principle that destroyed Solomon. There is no advantage so desirable that it can compensate a man for the risk of his soul. The pitiful failure of the early hopes of Solomon's character does not diminish, it rather increases the value of his writings. None know so well the power of temptation, about which Solomon writes, "he who has fallen before it. As one of our biographers says, 'He who is bruised every limb is qualified to speak of the strength of his foe.'" He warns others by his own experience. He quaffed the cup of pleasure and felt the disgust of satiety; he exhausted all knowledge and found it weariness to the flesh; he amassed riches and knew not who would gather them. He sought a happiness that had its bitterness in it, with all the facilities to search that earth could give, and his solemn conviction at the close of his career is that it is to be found only in fearing God and keeping his commandments.

O. TO BE LIFTED.

O. TO be lifted, lifted,
Above this life of sin;
O, to be lifted, lifted,
Till the dear Christ takes me in;
Into the shining Heaven,
Up through the gates of gold,
Into the holy Presence,
With the martyr saints of old.
O, to be lifted, lifted,
Into the perfect rest,
O, to be lifted, lifted,
When the dear God thinks it best;
Out of the valley of sorrows,
Up to the mountains of calm;
O, to be lifted, lifted,
To the heavenly harp, and psalm.
O, to be lifted, lifted,
Beyond the stains of earth,
Into a glad, new being,
Into the heavenly birth.
Where all the faith and hoping
Will end in glorious sight;
O, to be lifted, lifted,
To the morning, out of the night.

THE BLESSED TASK.

SAID, "Sweet Master, hear me pray;
For love of thee the boon I ask
Give me to do for thee each day
Some simple, lowly, blessed task."
And listening long, with hope elate,
I only heard him whisper, "Wait."

So praying still and waiting on,
And pondering what the waiting meant,
This knowledge sweet at last I won,—
And oh, the depth of my content!—
My blessed task for every day
Is humbly, gladly to obey.
And though I daily, hourly fail
To bring my task to him complete,
And must with constant tears bewail
My failures at my Master's feet;
No other service would I ask
Than this my blessed, blessed task.

—HARRIET McEWEN KIMBALL.

THE AGED PILGRIM.

THY mercy heard my infant prayer;
Thy love, with kind, paternal care,
Sustained my childish days;
Thy goodness watched my ripening youth,
And formed my heart to love thy truth,
And filled my lips with praise.
And now, in age and grief, thy name
Doth still my languid heart inflame,
And bow my faltering knee.
Oh, yet this bosom feels the fire;
This trembling hand and drooping lyre
Have yet a strain for thee!
Yes; broken, tuneless, still, O Lord,
This voice, transported, shall record
Thy goodness, tried so long;
Till, sinking slow, with calm decay,
Its feeble murmurs melt away
Into a seraph's song.

Will He Come Again?

Reasons for Expecting that Jesus will Come again to the World in Person to Reign and Restore all things to Pristine Purity.

BY PROF. J. B. INFREE.

ONE of the most remarkable facts about Christianity as it is preached in our churches is that the second coming of Christ is so seldom mentioned in the pulpit. The Christian may attend church regularly Sunday after Sunday and year after year without hearing a preacher give any intimation that he is expecting Christ to return to the world. The question is therefore worth an investigation whether there is any ground for expecting him. There are many reasons for such a hope, among which the following are weighty:

Christ promised to return. "I will come again and receive you unto myself," he said to his disciples. "So shall the coming of the Son of man be," were the words with which he concluded several of his parables. "In such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh," was his warning to his followers as he foresaw a time like the present when the fact that he would come would be ignored. And, lest people of later times might think that it was some spiritual event, concerning only his contemporaries, he said: "What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch." Throughout his ministry Jesus referred repeatedly to the time when he would come again and would have a very different reception from that accorded to him at his first coming. Any reader who will be at the trouble to read the Gospels and mark the passages in which Jesus referred to his coming again will be surprised to find how many there are. His words were not understood at the time, and to this day men ignore them, but it is very obvious that the expectation cheered the Lord in many a dark and gloomy hour.

Angels declared that he would come again. When the disciples stood on the hill over against Bethany and watched him ascend into the clouds, and wondered as they looked, two angels spoke to them. Their announcement was redundant and emphatic as if to preclude any possibility of doubt from the minds of the amazed men as to their meaning. "This same Jesus, who is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."

The Apostles declared that he would come again. Peter, John, and Paul make the statement repeatedly, and in many forms, and with explicitness, which leaves no shadow of doubt that they fully and firmly believed that Jesus would return. Peter especially, foreseeing a time like the present, said that there would come in the last days scoffers, who would ask, "Where is the promise of his coming?" For since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation," and cautions his readers against being thrown off their guard by a delay which would surely be temporary only.

The prophets predicted his return. Their descriptions of his glory and the extent of his dominion were not realized at his first coming. Their prophecies would be stultified if Christ did not return. It was as a King ruling the world in righteousness that they saw him when they wrote, and it was of him in that character that they had their ecstatic visions. Little do they say of his humiliation and suffering compared to their words about his exaltation.

What witnesses are these? Can there be any testimony equal to theirs? Can we doubt that he will come? Surely the belief in such a fact must have a momentous influence on the Christian's life. No expectation can compare with it. What a world this will be when the Being whom we love and worship reigns supreme over the whole earth, and all nations render allegiance to him. There will be an end of sorrow, and poverty, and injustice, and oppression, and war, and sin. Under his beneficent sway men will love each other, and even the lower creation will cease to destroy each other. Competition that now wears out the lives of men will cease, and every man seek his neighbor's good. It is for this we teach our children to pray in his words: "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth." "Even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

The World's Worst Foe.

rong Drink the Bitterest Enemy of Christian Civilization—Senator Blair's Startling Arraignment of the Odious Traffic.

ND still the world staggers on under the drink curse, too drunken apparently to comprehend what is the matter.

The statistics of its damnation are so vast that like the mathematics of astronomy they impress nobody. They tell us that it is more than twenty billions of miles to the nearest fixed star. Surely then the ars won't hurt us any as long as they are there, and it is of no use to try to bicycle over a route on which light has been travelling ten thousand years at the rate of nearly two hundred thousand miles a second and has not got here yet. Some things are so big that they are of no consequence.

It has been proved scores of times that our own country destroys $1,500,000,000—fteen hundred millions of dollars worth of property in alcoholic beverages every year, and a vastly greater productive power in the poisoning of the physical system, while the injury to mental and moral health, in fact the mental and moral death, are incalculable, because nobody has yet been able to fix the cash value of soul.

But let us figure a little on the cash cost of the poisonous beverages and other poisons that artificial human appetite consumes yearly. That cost is not easy to compute, because the consumer is the man who applies the poisonous drug to his own person, and this is generally a retail process in which the cost is represented by the purchase of the single drink or cigar.

The average wage of the Asiatic may fairly be estimated at not more than one-fifth that of the American. The great mass of the population of that immense continent live in China and India, four hundred millions in the former, three hundred millions in the latter, and there are about one hundred millions besides. When we read of the wholesale devastation which alcohol and opium are working in India and China, no one will consider an exaggeration to say that the consumption of drugs to satisfy unnatural appetite is not less than one-eighth that of our own people, or more than five dollars for each inhabitant. That gives a total of our thousand millions yearly. This would make a total for Europe, Asia, and the United States of fifteen thousand four hundred millions cost of this form of destruction of property in a year.

Now, this is enough, and must satisfy the devil that he has us. Surely he will not ask more of one poor accursed world. He is too tender-hearted for that. I have never heard or read anything about him which leads me to think that he is bad enough to require more than this of any of his subjects, either in or out of the one country.

So let us throw in the consumption of Africa, Oceania, Canada, Mexico, Central and of all South America, with diversities of the sea, also the odd four hundred millions above named, leaving just fifteen thousand millions of dollars. This is way below the real figures, but it is enough. Satan will be satisfied; so, too, apparently, are we. This is an average of ten dollars apiece for each one of the fifteen hundred millions of people in the world, provided there are so many.

The total actual property, real and personal, in the United States was $65,000,000,000 in 1890, now little more, and certainly not $75,000,000,000, six per cent. interest upon which would be $4,500,000,000; we therefore destroy more than three times that amount, or more than eighteen per cent. upon the value of all the property in the country every year in compliance with the demands of unnatural appetite. Great and permanent industries exist for the sole purpose of destroying the people. They do constantly destroy more than the war did annually while it lasted. It would be cheaper both in money and in life to suppress the rum traffic alone and substitute for it perpetual civil war on the same scale as that of the rebellion.

Education and religion combined do not cost one-third what is paid out in money to support the rum traffic. All taxation, both state and national, for schools and all other purposes, is far less than the $1,500,000,000 paid out for rum, and little more than one-third the grand total of $3,000,000,000, which we spend in this everlasting suicide.

I keep back the statistics of pauperism, idiocy, insanity, disease and crime, which are the direct result of the use of intoxicating drugs, because they are inconceivable in their dreadful immensity.

A year ago I delivered an address at Ocean Grove upon "The Future of the Temperance Reform." THE CHRISTIAN HERALD kindly published and circulated this address, which I gave to the cause, at cost. In that address I tried to map out a plan of action for man in his mortal conflict with alcohol and other poisons. I am glad to know that your labor has not been in vain and that the Christian Church, especially, is more and more arousing itself to the work of removing the chief obstacle in the pathway of mankind to a better state.

When Christianity becomes so interblended with the greatest evils on earth that they are the strongest where she is supreme, the human soul turns into an interrogation point.

There ought to be a Council of War. Washington, D.C. HENRY W. BLAIR.

Prayers that were Answered.

Three Remarkable Instances Related by the Superintendent of the Bowery Mission.

I AM very much surprised at the great crowd of men who gather in the Bowery Mission every night. It is one of the sights of New York to see between three and four hundred men, singing the songs of Zion, and paying rapt attention to the Word of God. The testimonies of the converts are very instructive, and never a night passes without seeing some mother's boy coming home to Jesus, or some husband saved, to be soon afterward restored to wife and family.

An incident occurred on the second night of my superintendency. A man, about sixty years of age, who had worked for a prominent publishing house for years, had become separated from his home and family because of his drinking habits. He came into the Mission, came forward when the invitation was given, and gave his heart to Jesus. In his testimony, he requested us to pray for his wife's forgiveness. In less than two weeks, to use his own words, he "ran right against his wife and daughter," and they, seeing the change, gladly gave him the kiss of forgiveness, and invited him to come home again.

One of the most remarkable things about the work in the Bowery Mission is the number of young men who come to the Mercy Seat seeking Jesus. Some of them are under twenty, and most of them are strangers in this great city, coming from all parts of the country. One bright-faced boy at Mrs. Bird's meeting one night cried bitterly when I spoke to him of his mother, who, he told me, was a good Christian woman, the Secretary of a Christian Alliance Society. He knew she was praying for him, and it made me happy when I heard him say, "I have given my heart to Jesus to-night." His mother's prayers were indeed answered.

Another remarkable answer to a mother's prayers occurred two weeks ago. A fine-looking man, about thirty years old, who had made a record for himself as a lawyer—a member of one of the best families in the land—came into the Mission at the close of the service. Mr. Merhson spoke to him, and he answered very quickly, saying he was going to buy poison and end his life that night. "Here is my card," he said. "Look in the papers to-morrow, and you will see I have kept my word." And he ran out, but came back an hour later, having been unsuccessful in his attempt to buy the poison. He promised he would not drink any more for twenty-four hours, and he kept his word. On the following night he gave his heart to the Saviour, and became "a new creature" in Christ Jesus. His sister, living in this city, received a letter from their mother that very day, saying she was almost discouraged and about to "give up praying for her lost boy." But God had heard the mother's cry, and delivered her son from the power of the evil one. The chorus of a song we sing here is singing in my heart now while I write this:

Oh, it is wonderful, very, very wonderful,
All his grace, so rich and free;
Oh, it is wonderful, very, very wonderful,
All his love and grace to me.

An Agnostic's Daughter.

How an Invitation to Church from a Young Disciple Led to a Conversion.

AMONG the congregation at the Church of the Strangers in New York a few Sundays ago was a young lady apparently about eighteen years old, who paid close attention to the service. For some unknown cause which a preacher is often conscious of, but cannot explain, Dr. Asa Blackburn, the earnest young pastor of the church, felt that this one hearer among the hundreds before him, was waiting for some special message. On the following Sunday she was in the church again and listening with just as much avidity. Again Dr. Blackburn preached the plain, simple Gospel. He announced that he would be in his vestry on a certain day to meet any who might wish to converse with him about their souls!

One of the first visitors who came was the girl he had noticed in church. "Oh, sir," she said, "I do so want to be a Christian." Dr. Blackburn talked with her, and found that she had been reading the New Testament, and the Holy Spirit had applied the truth to her heart. But her father and brother were agnostics, and they were irritated by the girl's distress. They had done their utmost to oppose her. One day they found her on her knees and lifted her to her feet and assailed her with scorn and ridicule. They wanted her to go to the theatre, to go into society, anywhere to cheer her and "drive away superstitious ideas." But she would not yield. "I want to become a Christian, sir," she said, "and I want you to help me." No words sweeter than those ever fall on the true pastor's ear. Dr. Blackburn talked with her awhile, telling her how gladly Jesus received such seekers, and how pleased he was when souls for whom he died were anxious to have the eternal life he won for them. Then kneeling down with the seeker, he presented her case to the Lord and thanked him for the assurances he had given of receiving just such souls. Joy and peace were in her face when they rose. "Do you believe Christ is able to save you and keep you true to him?" the minister asked. "I do," said the girl solemnly. "Then he will," said the minister. When she was received into the church recently, she was one of the happiest of the converts and she said that her father and her brother had ceased to persecute her.

An interesting fact about her conversion came out in conversation with Dr. Blackburn subsequently. She said that her first visit to the church was due to the invitation of a poor girl whom she casually met. This chance acquaintance had herself only recently been converted, and her first timid effort to do something for Christ was to approach this young lady and tell her how happy she was and beg her to come to church. The invitation was accepted, with the result above narrated.

Armenia's Relief Work.

Up to the present time $51,000 has been contributed by the Christian Herald to readers for Armenian relief. Seventeen distributing stations were opened in Armenia, viz.: At Van, Erzerum, Erzinjan, Aintab, Sivas, Arabkir, Oorfa, Malatia, Palu, Marash, Gurun, Hadjin, Cesarea, the missionaries of the American Board at these points acting as relief agents. A relief station was also established at Urmiah in Persia for aiding such refugees as had succeeded in escaping across the Kurd-infested mountains from Armenia. Not a dollar of the fund was lost in transit, thousands were saved from death by cold and hunger, and the enduring love and gratitude of the Armenian nation were won for Christian America. The sum of $1,000 per week is now being cabled from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund to Armenia, through the American Board, for maintaining the relief work in the field. In addition $1,000 was cabled to Miss Frances E. Willard, of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, to Marseilles lately, to assist her in helping the swarm of refugees who had fled from the Turkish slayers and contrived to reach that port in safety. Much work remains to be done both in Armenia, this winter, where there is still great suffering, and among the exiles here, and all contributions for that purpose will be welcomed and duly acknowledged in these columns.

A-head of Pearline?

Never! Not a bit of it! That is out of the question. Probably no one of the many washing-powder that have been made to imitate Pearline would claim to excel in any way. All they ask is to be considered "the same as" or "as good as" Pearline. But they're not even that. Pearline is to day, just as it has been from the first, the best thing in the world for every kind of washing and cleaning

A Young Pastor's Experiences.

BY REV. F. DE WITT TALMAGE.

JUST three years ago, I entered the Gospel ministry. They have been three long years of sorrow and work; of struggle and joy. These three first years are the hardest a minister ever goes through; so, when the other day, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD wrote to me, asking that I should relate some of my experiences as a young clergyman, I complied, believing I might be able to set forth some facts not generally known or understood regarding that most misrepresented profession in all the world—the Christian ministry.

When I was fresh from the Theological Seminary, and had just been called to my church in Pittsburg, I remember distinctly the sensation I experienced when, as pastor, I presided over the first meeting of the United Boards of the Church. I was never so embarrassed in all my life. Among those officers there were a judge, a physician, and some of the leading merchants of the city: there were gray-haired men who felt more of Christ in the tip end of their little finger than I in my whole body. Yet, I commenced to preach, and week after week, what a mass of mistakes I made! And what a lot of mistakes every young man makes. Yet the more consecrated, and the nearer the members of my congregation had been living to Jesus Christ, the more gentle they were in their dealings with me.

A congregation, with all its separate individualities and its different ramifications, may be likened to a factory with its multitude of wheels, each apparently revolving independent of the others, but all joined by common bands and performing one common task. And as in a factory there are wheels within wheels, so in a church one is apt to find cliques within cliques. It takes all classes to make up a congregation; and some people who seem to be cold, and formal, and distant, would be found to be kind and warm-hearted Christian people, if the minister could only enter into their lives.

When I began to preach, in my first pastorate, there were a few officious folks who poured into my ears a small stream of gossip. "Now you will find," they murmured softly, "that we will all stand right by you, with the exception, possibly, of one or two men"; and then they wagged their heads knowingly and warned me against this person and that person. One man, they assured me, would not only not join the church himself but would even keep his own children out. This sort of solicitude is apt to lead a young preacher into a quagmire unless he is discreet as well as conscientious. To-day I can say that, without exception, those very men against whom I had been warned are among the dearest of my friends.

One of the first experiences a young pastor ordinarily has to encounter is the fixed and apparently ineradicable impression, which prevails largely in most congregations, that in order to be rich in "grace" the preacher must be poor in pocket. This kind of qualification is liable to operate as an effective barrier in other ways. When it is announced that some amiable Christian girl, of good family, is going to marry a minister or a missionary her well-to-do, fashionable relatives throw up their hands in horror and exclaim: "What! A minister; a poor minister? Going to be picked to death by criticism, and come up to old age with nothing but a lot of dried-up sermons and a wagon-load of half-starved babies? Oh, don't marry a minister!"

Although I have been brought up in a large city and surrounded by all that wealth and refinement could give, I have to-day no higher ambition for my two little daughters than, first, that they become good Christian women; and secondly, that perhaps in God's good providence they each may marry some godly, consecrated clergyman, even though they may have to live upon a very small salary and have hard work to make ends meet, way back in the country in some village parsonage.

Fortunately there has been a bright side to my chapter of experiences. Although the Gospel ministry may be widely misrepresented and depreciated, it is nevertheless true that there is a great, appreciative, warm-hearted, generous Christian public, who are kind to the minister. His youth and inexperience are not drawbacks in their eyes. With them, any earnest young man, who has been consecrated to the Lord's work, is deserving of cordial welcome and warm support. And he receives both in rich abundance. How different is his experience in this respect from that of many in secular professions. The young lawyer, just admitted to the Bar, must struggle long and arduously for patronage; the budding physician, with brand new diploma, finds it a difficult task to persuade men to become the subjects of his callow experiments. And so in other professions, whose disciples must plod along as best they can, waiting for recognition. But our young ministers are treated after a different fashion by our churches all over this land, and there is no lack of cordial welcome and recognition to him who comes before them with the living words of the Gospel bursting from his lips. The message from heart to heart, from soul to soul overleaps all the barriers imposed by conventional usage, and the young servant of the Master finds friends everywhere.

It has often occurred to me, in the course of these three years' experience in the pulpit, that the character of the congregation and their attitude toward the preacher must be decided very largely by the sort of pastor they have as their spiritual guide. Let me illustrate my idea: One day, as an old farmer sat in the front of his house, there drove up a traveler who said, "Stranger, I am going to settle in a new country, and as I journeyed along I heard that the town just over the hill was a fine place in which to live. What kind of people will my new next-door neighbors be?" "Well, friend," asked the old farmer, "what kind of neighbors did thee leave in the place from whence thee came?" "Oh," said the man, "they were the meanest, most contemptible, most thievish set; every robber of them was sticking his fingers in your pocket." "Well," said the old farmer, "friend, thee will find them so in the next place." The following day, along the same road, drove a fat, happy, cheerful, contented-looking man, and asked the old farmer the same question. "What kind of neighbors did I leave?" said the man. "Oh, they were the most sympathetic, the most charitable, the most kind. In the ten long years they never spoke to me even one cross word, but my daughter died, and somehow, I couldn't live in the old home any longer, the place seemed so lonesome." "Well," said the old farmer, "friend, thee will find thy neighbors the same in the next town." Simply substitute pastor for traveler and church for town and the application is obvious. According as we treat the world, and employ our opportunities to advantage, so will the world appear to our eyes. With the faithful minister life seems always bright and congregations invariably kind, their aspect being the reflex of the joy in his own heart, that comes from helping others. Christian service alone brings true happiness.

In this review of my own brief experience in the Christian ministry, I would not only make mention of what Christ and Christians will do for us, but also the happiness which comes from our doing for others. One who leads a selfish life can never understand this, yet the law of spiritual development, as well as of every other development, is that the more we give out the more we take in. And the chief happiness of all, and that which yields returns that stretch out toward eternity, is in giving out in the largest measure, "without money and without price," the glorious Gospel for the salvation of the world.

Oh, young men, you who are going to follow Jesus as his under-shepherds, I congratulate you. You will never regret it.

When Mr. Beecher Sold Slaves in Plymouth Pulpit

The most marvelous scene ever witnessed in a church, when men and women almost lost themselves in hysterical excitement, and threw watches, rings and jewels on the platform and in the collection baskets. Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher describes the great event in the Christmas Ladies' Home Journal, while De Thulstrup shows the actual scene in a realistic picture.

Wet Medicine vs. Dry Air.

Liquid remedies intended for use in the air passages should be avoided. The mucous membrane is too delicate for such treatment; besides, air is the only thing nature intended should enter the breathing organs. Did you ever get a drop of liquid in the windpipe? Nature instantly rebelled and threw it out. This proves that no liquids can enter the bronchial track, and that vapors, sprays, douches and atomizers are positively dangerous.

Common Colds vs. Hyomei.

In using BOOTH'S HYOMEI POCKET INHALER you breathe the AIR impregnated with the aromatic, healing principle of "HYOMEI," and you break up a common cold overnight. This is the famous Australian "Dry-Air" treatment of Asthma, Catarrh, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the nose, throat and lungs. It "CURES BY INHALATION."

Port Ewen, N. Y., Sept. 3, 1896.
I find Hyomei a preventative of colds, to which I am especially subject, and which are very stubborn. I have not had one since using Hyomei, which is an inexpressible relief, for they interfered sadly with my preaching.
(Rev.) B. C. LIPPINCOTT.

Will you please put Hyomei on sale in Los Angeles, Cal.? We cannot keep house without the remedy.
A. J. COMPTON, M. D.

I cannot say enough in praise of Booth's Hyomei Pocket Inhaler. I never have a cold now and I always had one before I used it. I had lost my voice so that I could not sing at all; but now I sing as well as I ever did.
Miss M. C. LANTAI.

Ohio Soldiers and Sailors Home, Erie County, Ohio, Sept. 1, 1896.
Soon after I commenced to use the Inhaler and Hyomei, my voice regained its natural tone; soreness in my throat very soon disappeared, and my hearing was improved to a degree that with gladness I discarded ear drums, and was never so happy as when I could again hear the conversation of my friends without the aid of artificial appliances.
L. E. STEWART, Sergeant, U. S. A.

Your Pocket Inhaler has shown itself a real treasure in my home, and I am stopping at this place.
Rev. C. W. MAGGART.

Hyomei is a purely vegetable preparation, and destroys the germs which cause disease in the respiratory organs. The air, charged with Hyomei, is inhaled at the mouth, and, after premeating the minutest air-cells, is exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief. It is highly recommended by physicians, clergymen, public speakers, and thousands who have been helped and cured.

Pocket Inhaler Outfit, Complete by Mail, $1.00. (to any part of the United States, for foreign countries, add $1.00 postage; outfit consists of pocket inhaler, made of deodorized hard rubber, a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper, and full directions for using. If you are still skeptical, send your address; my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei cures. Are you open to conviction? Extra bottles of Hyomei inhalant by mail, or at druggists, 50 cents. Hyomei Balm, for all skin diseases, by mail, 25 cents. Your druggist has Hyomei or can get it for you if you insist. Don't accept a substitute.

Out of a Spanish Prison.

A THRILLING story of deliverance from death is told by Rev. Alberto Diaz, the devoted preacher, whose labors in his native Cuba have been the means of establishing Baptist churches in many parts of the island. It was not to be expected that in the general anarchy, so prominent a Protestant would escape the persecution of the Spanish authorities. Diaz, however, went quietly on with his work, giving no offense, but ministering to all who sought spiritual consolation at his hands. Many members of his churches were in the patriot army, fighting for the liberation of their country from the intolerable yoke of Spain. At last the blow fell. Gen. Weyler sent a troop to Diaz's house the night last summer and, arousing the minister from his sleep, carried him off to a dungeon in Morro Castle. For two weeks he was held close prisoner, and then he learned that he was to be summarily executed. There was no reason to hope for rescue. Diaz could see the preparations being made for his execution. The day before that set for the foul deed, the devoted preacher spent in prayer. He commended his soul to God and retired to rest, expecting that it would be his last night on earth. He was not distressed, and was sleeping peacefully. Shortly before midnight he was awakened by some one passing his hand. It was a soldier, who, having converted him to the preaching of the gospel, was a member of his church. The strong man was weeping bitterly. He knew if he could do anything for his beloved pastor.

Diaz wrote a vigorous telegram to the Secretary of State Olney, declaring his American citizenship and claiming the protection of the United States Government. "Let that telegram sent for me," he said, "the weeping soldier. The man succeeded in smuggling the paper on board an American ship. In some way Weyler learned of the telegram, and at once ordered an investigation. As soon as he had satisfied himself that the telegram had really been dispatched, he sent a telegram to Washington, "Diaz released," and that same day which was to have witnessed his death, Diaz was set free and was on board an American steamer, with his family, on the way to the land of liberty. He God who sent his angel into the prison to deliver the Apostle Peter, must have sent a soldier to the Cuban dungeon, where his servant was confined awaiting execution, to save him from death.

Have You Asthma or Hay-Fever?

Medical science at last reports a positive cure for Asthma and Hay-fever in the wonderful Kola Plant, a new botanical discovery found on the Congo River, West Africa. Its cures are really marvelous. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., writes that it cured him of Asthma of fifty years' standing. Hon. L. G. Clute, of Greeley, Iowa, testifies that three years he had to sleep propped up in a chair in Hay-fever season, being unable to lie down at night or day. The Kola Plant cured him at once. To make the matter sure, these and hundreds of others are sworn to before a notary public. So great is their faith in its wonderful curative powers, the Kola Importing Co., of 1164 Broadway, New York, make it known, is sending out large cases of the Kola compound free to all readers of CHRISTIAN HERALD who are sufferers from Asthma and Hay-Fever. All they ask in return is that when cured they will tell their neighbors about it, and send their name and address on a postal card, and they will send you a large case by mail free. It costs you nothing, and you should surely try it.

their flight. Herschel died a Christian. Have you any doubt about what Herschel is doing? Isaac Newton died a Christian. Have you any doubt about what Isaac Newton is doing? Joseph Henry died a Christian. Have you any doubt about what Joseph Henry is doing? They were in discussion. all these astronomers of earth, about what the aurora borealis was, and none of them could guess. They know now: they have been out there to see for themselves.

What are our departed Christian chemists doing? Following out their own science, following out and following out for ever. Since they died they have solved ten thousand questions which puzzled the earthly laboratory. They stand on the other side of the thin wall of electricity, the thin wall that seems to divide the physical from the spiritual world, the thin wall of electricity: so thin the wall that ever and anon it seems to be almost broken through—broken through from one side by telephonic and telegraphic apparatus, broken through from the other side by strange influences which men in their ignorance call spiritualistic manifestations. All that matter cleared up. They laughing at us as older brothers will laugh at inexperienced brothers, as they see us with contracted brow experimenting and experimenting, only wishing they could show us the way to open all the mysteries.

But what are the men of the law, who in this world found their chief joy in the legal profession—what are they doing now? Studying law in a universe where everything is controlled by law from the flight of humming-bird to flight of world—law, not dry and hard and drudging, but righteous and magnificent law, before which man and cherub, and seraph, and archangel, and God himself bow. The chain of law long enough to wind around the immensities, and infinity, and eternity. Chain of law. What a place to study law, where all the links of the chain are in the hand!

What are our departed Christian friends who in this world had their joy in the healing art doing now? Busy at their old business. No sickness in heaven, but plenty of sickness on earth, plenty of wounds in the different parts of God's dominion to be healed and to be medicated. Those glorified souls coming down, not in lazy doctor's gig, but with lightning locomotion. You cannot understand why that patient got well after all the skilful doctors had said he must die. Perhaps Abercrombie touched him—Abercrombie, who, after many years doctoring the bodies and the souls of people in Scotland, went up to God in 1844. Perhaps Abercrombie touched him. Those who had their joy in healing the sickness and the woes of earth, gone up to heaven, are come forth again for benignant medicament.

But what are our friends who found their chief joy in conversation and in sociality doing now? In brighter conversation there and in grander sociality. What a place to visit in where your next door neighbors are kings and queens? You yourselves kingly and queenly.

Oh! what a place to visit in! If eternity were one minute shorter, it would not be long enough for such sociality. Think of our friends who in this world were passionately fond of flowers, turned into paradise. Think of our friends who were very fond of raising superb fruit turned into the orchard where each tree has twelve kinds of fruit at once, and bearing the fruit all the year round! What are our departed Christian friends doing in heaven, those who on earth found their chief joy in the Gospel ministry? They are visiting their old congregations. Most of those old ministers have got their people around them already. When I get to heaven—as by the grace of God I am destined to go to that place—I will come and see you all. Yes, I will come to all the people to whom I have administered in the Gospel, and to the millions of souls to whom, through the kindness of the printing-press, I am permitted to preach every week in this land and in the uttermost parts of the earth. I will visit them all. I give them fair notice. Our departed friends of the ministry are now engaged in that delectable entertainment and undertaking.

But what are our departed Christian friends who in all departments of usefulness were busy, finding their chief joy in doing good—what are they doing now? Going right on with the work. The tombstone not the terminus but the starting-post. What are our departed Christian friends who found their chief joy in studying God, doing now? Studying God yet. No need of revelation now, for unblanched they are face to face. Now they can handle the omnipotent thunderbolts, just as a child handles the sword of a father come back from victorious battle. They have no sin; no fear, consequently. Studying Christ, not through a revelation save the revelation of the scars—that deep lettering which brings it all up quick enough. Studying the Christ of the Bethlehem caravansary; the Christ of the awful massacre with its hemorrhage of head, and hand, and foot, and side: the Christ of the shattered mausoleum: Christ the Sacrifice, the Star, the Son, the Man, the God, the God-man, the man-God. But hark! the bell of the cathedral rings—the cathedral bell of heaven. What is the matter now? There is going to be a great meeting in the temple. Worshippers all coming through the aisles. Make room for the Conqueror, Christ standing in the temple. All heaven gathering around him. Those who loved the beautiful, come to look at the Rose of Sharon. Those who loved music, come to listen to his voice. Those who were mathematicians, come to

Cologne's Strange Legend

How the Story of the Slaughter of Ursula and her 11,000 Companions Arose—Walls Inlaid with Bones of Women and Beasts.

EARLY fifteen hundred years ago, according to the ancient legends, an event occurred in the city of Cologne that will never be forgotten. One of the legends states that, at that time, when Europe was part Christian, part pagan, the hand of Ursula, the daughter of Theonotus, a king of Britain, was asked in marriage by Holofernes, a heathen prince. The beautiful princess consented on condition that Holofernes become a Christian and allow her three years in which to make a pilgrimage before the marriage. This being agreed to, Ursula departed, accompanied by 11,000 maids. On returning they disembarked at Cologne, where they were attacked by the Hunnish legions of Attila, the heathen king. Attila's warriors put all to the sword. A variant of the same tradition declares that Maximus, a usurper in Gaul, had demanded of king Dionotus of Cornwall, the hand of his daughter, Ursula, for himself, and seventy thousand Cornish maidens as wives for his warriors, and that the fleet bearing the women was driven ashore, the survivors of the wreck being murdered by Picts and Huns. Still another version gives the number of the victims at eleven while a fourth states that only two women perished. Many authors have written concerning this ven-

Like sheep they huddled, a multitudinous flock covering that great, green field, reaching from Cologne's North Gate to the Rhine. Like wild beasts the barbarian Huns dashed in and beat them down. And night, dropping upon a crimson field, gathered up the souls of eleven thousand women and wrapped up their dead bodies in blackness.

"To-day I looked upon their dry bones. In the treasure chamber of the church which stands on the field of their martyrdom, a chamber walled around with cross-bones panelled in peculiar designs, where innumerable skulls grinned at me in ghastly rows, where skeleton limbs protruded from many an ancient and jeweled casket. I stood with bared head amid the greswome relics.

"In the year 450 A. D., Ursula, of royal blood, a virgin and a Christian, was driven out of Britain by infidel Anglo-Saxons, who were stealing the country, murdering the men and distributing the women as slaves. With Ursula, thousands fled, mostly women; and straightway, because of her nobility of birth and her superior intelligence, because of her piety and virtue, Ursula was for all those refugees a model and by all acknowledged as their leader. And it came to pass that Ursula chose as her special companions all virgins whose fathers and brothers had perished in the Anglo-Saxon wars.

"To the continent fled the refugees, pushing on to the Rhine and finally reaching Cologne, then a Christian city enjoying peace. . . . But not long was Ursula to enjoy peace. A fate more dreadful than that from which she had fled awaited her. This time the enemy was the pagan Huns. Down the Rhine they swooped, sacking towns, slaying the men and sparing the women for dishonor.

"Through the city swarmed the Huns. And now were massacred the men of Cologne and the older women. And while the streets were brooks of blood, the younger women and maidens were carried to a field outside the North Gate, there to await distribution among the soldiers. All day and all night did the captive company increase till the dawn showed a huddling multitude covering all that great field reaching from Cologne's North Gate to the Rhine.

"Here were all the maidens from Britain, and all Cologne's maidens, and all the maidens from many a town on the Rhine, to the number of eleven thousand. They were there to submit to slavery and dishonor or die.

"In their midst was the royal Ursula, their leader, the personification of quiet resignation and constancy. The Huns surrounded the field and the apportionment of slaves began. But, inspired by the ardent encouragement and example of Ursula, her eleven thousand followers victoriously resisted the designs of the barbarians, despite savage threats. Then one by one were they slaughtered, struck down by arrows, clubs, and swords. And as night descended blackly, Ursula fell—fell, where the church of her name now stands, as her enduring monument."

GILSON WILLETS.

Such an event as that related in the Ursula legend, had it really happened, could hardly have failed to be recorded in history. It is supposed that the statement that eleven thousand perished arose through the error of some old-time translator, who confounded the name of Undecimilla, one of Ursula's attendants, with the number undecim millia (eleven thousand), and that the blunder so made has been perpetuated through many centuries.

count the years of his reign. Those who were explorers, come to discover the height and the depth and the length and breadth of his love. Those who had the military spirit on earth sanctified, and the military spirit in heaven, come to look at the Captain of their salvation. The astronomers come to look at the Morning Star. The men of the law come to look at him who is the judge of quick and dead. The men who healed the sick come to look at him who was wounded for our transgressions. All different and different forever in many respects, yet all alike in admiration for Christ, in worship for Christ, and all alike in joining in the doxology: "Unto him who washed us from our sins in his own blood, and made us kings and priests unto God: to him be glory in the Church throughout all ages, world without end." Amen.

To show you that your departed friends are more alive than they ever were, to make you homesick for heaven, to give you an enlarged view of the glories that are yet to be revealed, I have preached this sermon.

erable legend, and no two agree, save on one point, viz.: that whatever the extent of the calamity, the Huns were the culprits and Attila, the great chief who humbled Rome, was the principal aggressor.

Although the legend, like many other similar stories of bygone ages, can in no sense be accepted as history, it has grown into a very substantial belief among the people of Cologne. St. Ursula's Church in that city is known as the "Church of the Eleven Thousand Virgins." It is a very old edifice, and is said to have been built on the scene of the slaughter and in commemoration of that event. A somewhat ghastly reminder of the story is found in the choir and so-called "Treasure Chamber" of the church, parts of whose walls and ceilings are covered with bones. But faith in this demonstration is rudely shaken by the assertion, by a no less distinguished authority than Professor Owen, the famous naturalist, that many of the bones were not human remains but belonged to the lower animals.

A contributor sends us this latest version of the famous legend which, besides being the most interesting, is probably the version favored by the people of Cologne themselves. It was written after a visit to the church:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Birth of Christ.

Sunday School Lesson for December 20.
Matt. 2: 1-12. Golden Text, Luke 2: 10.
By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. No wonder heaven was moved; no wonder, when the single angel messenger had told his marvelous "Good tidings of great joy which should be to all people" in the ears of the watching shepherds, that "suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and singing, 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men in whom he is well pleased'" (Luke 2: 13, 14).

The angels understood their God. The command had gone forth, as he brought the first begotten into the world. "And let all the angels of God worship him. The angels knew his origin, and from the opened heaven adored him whom man could see only as a feeble, helpless babe, in the arms of a humble mother, in the stable of Bethlehem. What contrasts marked his birth. While the Father called on all the angels to worship him, he said as he came into the world: 'Lo I come to do thy will O God.'" (Heb. 10: 5, 7). He humbles himself, the Father glorifies him. The angels sang of good tidings of great joy, while Herod the king was troubled and all Jerusalem with him. Sages from a far country came to inquire where this "Desire of all nations" was born, while the very scribes of the Scriptures, which foretold his birth, were so indifferent that while they could indicate his whereabouts to others, they would not move one step in the same direction as the wise men to seek the new born Saviour! Did he know which awaited him, and yet come? Did he know the utter degradation and ruin of our human nature, and yet take upon him the likeness of sinful flesh? He whom God has appointed Heir of all things, by whom he made the worlds, he who was the brightness of his glory and the express Image of his Person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, to be born into our human nature of a human woman. What a contrast! What can compute the inconceivable greatness of such love? The view of the Lord upon his throne brought down the inspired Isaiah to the dust, but how much more shall the infinite Love of him whose word created, and whose word upholds all things, bring you and me to his feet, when he says to us, I am not ashamed to call you brethren.

The incarnation of our holy Lord which we can only stand before with bowed, reverent hearts and unquestioning lips. How could he, in whom was life, give up the ghost and die? Again we can only say, It is so, for it is written. But still more inexplicable is the question, How could he, the Holy One, who knew no sin, and in whose lips when on earth was found no guile, who so shrank from the approach of sin that for forty days and forty nights he

It is so, for God hath said it. How could he who "tainteth not, neither is weary," yet in our human nature "being wearied with his journey," sit on the well? How could he, in whom was life, give up the ghost and die? Again we can only say, It is so, for it is written. But still more inexplicable is the question, How could he, the Holy One, who knew no sin, and in whose lips when on earth was found no guile, who so shrank from the approach of sin that for forty days and forty nights he

There is but one solution and it defies all definition, for it "passeth knowledge."

And yet it is only the few who see anything in it beyond a certain doctrine which they are expected to assent to, a something quite outside of themselves except to give an occasion for the observance of Christmas day, and a theme for some of the appropriate hymns for that season! It is but a repetition in this day of the reception which Jesus met with when he first came into this world. Herod was reigning over Judea, when there came wise men from the east (their country is not named) to Jerusalem with the startling inquiry, "Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him." Unwelcome and unpopular question, and yet the wise men claimed to have a revelation. Students of the stars, they had read on the heavens the advent of him whom they and unreality. The sycophants of Herod's court would not have relished nor understood the worship of the wise men. The splendor, lavish display, and even the tyrannical power of Herod's court appealed to their senses; they could be somebody, could play a part in relation with this man of the world, but how utterly absurd would it have been in their eyes, to bow down in adoration before a helpless babe, and offer their rich gifts to him, when he lay simply in a manger, with everything to betoken poverty and simplicity around him!

The wise men saw with eyes opened by the Spirit of God. In the very poverty of the infant King they saw a glory and a dignity of self surrender to which the nature which he wore had been hitherto a stranger.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the use of Sunday School Teachers.

ONE subject alone can appropriately occupy our attention at this season. Before the dawn of another Sunday, all Christendom will have celebrated the anniversary of our Lord's birth.

Whether it really took place on the day on which we celebrate it, cannot now be proved, but the probabilities are in its favor. Dr. Samuel J. Andrews, who has made an exhaustive study of the chronology of our Lord's life, after a careful examination of all the data accessible, is in-sought, and no pretext of Herod's could construe their coming into a political object.

The shepherds had borne their testimony to Bethlehem, and the wise men, causing the convocations of chief priests and scribes, had been a testimony to Jerusalem, but neither Jerusalem nor Bethlehem sought after him who was God's greatest gift to man. If the wise men had not been sure of their communication from the upper world, they would have turned back with the conviction that since Jerusalem, the very centre of the worship of God, was so indifferent, they must themselves be deceived. But they had found confirmation in the written Word of God, and rested upon it, and so they went their way, and the star which shone no more upon them while they made their inquiries in Jerusalem, resumed its place as their guide, and "went before them till it came and stood over where the young child was." Those who will be independent of earthly fellowship, will not be without divine guidance. The reappearance of the star, which had been so long absent, was a great joy. They could afford to be unpopular, misjudged, counted as fanatics, unbroken. O, how we learn, more and more in this world, that our path, as we walk by faith, which makes God and himself a solitary one; shut up to God. Solitude becomes ever a greater necessity that we may learn from him what is true and what is false in this world of sham and only plausible ground for doubt—that of the improbability of shepherds being in the fields at night at that time of the year—is removed by the statements of Dr. Chaplin and others, who have kept records for a number of years of the temperature in Palestine in various months, and who say that, as a rule, December is a mild, dry month between the early and the latter rains, and that there is nothing improbable in the statement of shepherds being in the fields all night at that time. The celebration this year is notable, for if Christ was born in the year B. C. 5, as is generally believed, this is the nineteen hundredth anniversary of his birth. In the question of the year, as in the day of his birth, there is some uncertainty, but it cannot have been later than the year B. C. 5, as the king who ordered the slaughter of the infants died in April B. C. 4. Nor can it have occurred much earlier, as the census, which involved Mary's journey to Bethlehem, was ordered by Augustus in B. C. 8. The matter of years and days, however, is of infinitely less importance than the fact. The new era in chronology inaugurated by Christ's birth, is insignificant compared with the new era it inaugurated in religion and morals. Looking back over the past nineteen centuries, we can see how the forces which had their origin in Christ's life, have been permeating the world, growing in power and influence with each succeeding generation. We see how each generation, as it came to understand him better, has shown more kindness, more sympathy, more compassion, more helpfulness. The new commandment, "that ye love one another," which he added to the original ten, has been operating as a law and has manifested itself in charities, hospitals, and benevolences of all kinds. All that is noblest in human life to-day can be traced to him. Thus, when we celebrate his birth, we celebrate the most momentous event in the world's history. That he was God manifest in the flesh, it is easier to believe, than that he was only a humble Galilean Peasant. The story of his birth, as it is told in this Gospel of Matthew, is as simple as it is beautiful. It shows that even then in his squalid surroundings, he was hailed as a King. Wise men from the East, probably from Chaldea or Persia, came to tender their homage. Who they were and how many there were of them, we are not told, and the traditions in circulation about them are worthless. They must have been astrologers, as no others would have detected the presence of a new star, or a meteor, as the light probably was. Following the heavenly light they found the object of their search, and offered their gifts. Herod with his priests and scribes had more precise knowledge, but they had no desire to worship and though they sought him, they could not find him. So it has been ever since. When men seek him to offer reverence and worship they find him still, and are blessed.

When Jesus was born. This was the beginning of his earthly life. As we learn from the first chapter of the Gospel of John, he had been living long before he took human shape. An early missionary incident illustrates this fact: Deplorable accounts of the miseries of the slaves on the plantations of the West Indies reached the Moravians. Two of their number were deeply moved. The thought that men were living in awful misery, starved, beaten and overworked, with no hope of heaven to support and cheer them, distressed the hearts of these two Moravian Christians. They resolved to carry the Gospel to the people who were in so urgent need of it. They actually gave up their liberty and permitted themselves to be sold as slaves, in order that they might live among the slaves and tell them of Christ. The change in their lives from freedom and comfort to bondage and squalor, was such a change as Christ made when he left heaven to become a man.

We have seen his star. The early astronomers were astrologists and believed that remarkable or unusual appearances in the heavens portended some unusual events in the world. Our astronomers have calculated that about the time of Christ's birth the planets Jupiter and Saturn would be in conjunction. The spectacle would be a most brilliant one and would naturally excite the wonder of the astrologers. It occurs at intervals of about eight hundred years. In 1604 Kepler saw it. Five months later Kepler was astonished to see a new star of extraordinary splendor suddenly burst into view in the constellation of the Serpent. It shone with marvelous brilliance for about six months; then its white light turned to yellow; its lustre waned and at the end of two years it disappeared. By some it has been thought that this star at a former appearance may have been the one followed by the wise men; but the fact of its going before them and standing over Bethlehem negatives that theory. It must have been a meteor, miraculously produced and guided, but the Magi may have been led by the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn to follow the meteor.

When they saw the star they rejoiced. A preacher tells a significant dream that he had at the beginning of his Christian life. He thought he was in a deep pit, at the bottom of which was a quicksand in which he was sinking. Looking up, he saw a beautiful star. As he gazed on it he felt himself drawn toward it. As his feet were released from the quicksand he made an attempt to climb, but looking for foothold in the side of the pit, he sank back. Again he looked to the star and felt himself drawn upward. He tried to cling with his hands, but again he fell. The moment he took his gaze off the star he ceased to rise. He needed no repetition of the experience. The next time he felt himself rising, he kept his eyes fixed on the star, and was drawn quite out of the pit and set on firm ground. Those who keep their eyes fixed on Christ have the same experience.

AMONG THE "MOUNTAIN WHITES."

Record of a Journey Through the Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina Hills—"Roughing it" Among a Strange, Uncouth and only Half-civilized People.

BY E. P. BANCROFT, N. Y. Secy. Am. S. S. Union.

THE people known as the Mountain Whites inhabit the mountainous region of South-eastern Kentucky, Eastern Tennessee and the Western part of Virginia and North Carolina. They are nearly all natives of our own country. Some of them are the descendants of the early Scotch-Irish settlers in Virginia, and the Carolinas. They were gradually driven to these mountain fastnesses by the Slave Power which continually increased its acreage tilled by slave-labor, and practically forced these small settlers to leave their holdings in the valleys and ascend the mountains.

They are to a considerable extent isolated from churches; at least those of a better class. There are "Hard Shell Baptist" churches scattered among them, but the ministry is for the most part poorly educated. Some of them cannot even read. They naturally do not encourage Bible-reading or Bible study. They do not approve of Sunday Schools. The mountaineers themselves unfortunately are also illiterate; but owing to a recent compulsory educational law in one or two of the States, the children now growing up will have better advantages.

I have recently visited this section in company with three of the missionaries of the American Sunday School Union, who have been working among them, one for fifteen years, and the other two for thirty years. I found these mountaineers living chiefly in one-story cabins of two rooms, a kitchen and sleeping-room, in some cases destitute of windows, the only light being from the two doors, front and rear. Sometimes a small shed outside is used for cooking purposes. The floors are bare of carpets. The chimney is frequently made of flat pieces of wood, lath-shaped, and joined with plaster. It is usually run up outside the cabin, like chimneys at the seashore. Owing to the inflammable material, they sometimes take fire. There are several beds in the one sleeping-room, according to the size of the family. They retire early, soon after 8 p.m., by the light of the single "tallow dip." They marry young, girls often at sixteen or sooner. Large families are the rule.

They live almost entirely on what they ing at the season when the streams are swollen. The timber previously hauled to the river bank is then fastened together in convenient shape and lengths to be handled, and is then poled down to the junction of the streams, or to some place where the railroad has reached out after it. The hardy mountaineer often stands all night long steering his flat craft, watching for the turns in the river, and keeping a sharp lookout for the rocks. On dark, rainy nights it is not an easy or pleasant task. I rode in the cars one day through a fine woodland country, where there were few inhabitants, to a place where there were several saw mills. Here the railroad abruptly terminated. It was evidently extended to this point to strike the lumber trade. The passenger traffic could not possibly pay the expenses.

In the dry season the creeks run low and the banks are used for roads. They are then easily forded, but prolonged rain will sometimes shut the traveler in for a time. The roads among these people are hardly worthy of the name. They are scarcely more than bridle-paths. They are rough, full of stones, roots of trees, and rocks, and are often steep and winding. We broke one of our wagon tires going over these hills, even while walking to lighten the load. Ten hours were lost in this way, as they have only rude appliances for repairs. The natives seldom use wheeled vehicles of any kind. When they do, it is apt to be an ox team, with rough wagon and rope reins. They prefer riding the horse or mule, and carry produce in this way to the little country store for miles, in a large meal sack. Poultry is strung together and transported in the same manner. The entire family also rides, equestrian style, when going to the Sunday School at the little rude church perhaps miles away, or to the neighboring farm over the hill, sometimes two persons astride the same animal. They are fearless riders. The mule costs less than the horse, is tougher, more sure-footed, and does better at the plough on the steep hillsides, but he is occasionally a "kicker."

The gun, the dog, and "pigs in clover," are always in evidence around the doorway. The cow is essential, but further away. The father or sons often "run" their own bullets, and it is well if they are used to bring down a squirrel "treed" by the dog, rather than shoot at a neighbor, the outcome of some recent feud or an old one awaiting settlement. On some farms they raise their own cotton and wool, spin the yarn and weave the cloth for domestic use. The spinning-wheel and the hand-loom are suggestive of early New England colonial life. This work is done in the winter months. Several times during my trip I saw women and girls on the way to the woods after the ginseng root not easily found, but valuable commercially.

There are farms where they dig their own coal, going only a little below the surface for their winter's supply. Wood is used for cooking purposes. They have very little money, depending chiefly on the farm for support. They make molasses from sorghum. Corn, grated or ground and freshly baked, furnishes the staple diet, with pork and sometimes chicken. The women impressed me as hard-working and faithful, with a marked tendency to wan, thin faces, and premature old age, the result of too early marrying and excessive toil in the household. They have little to relieve the monotony of routine life, hemmed in as they are from the great world outside. Inability to read, or very little at best, only shuts them in still more. The husband is called "my old man," regardless of age.

Three causes tend specially to their moral degradation: 1. Their isolation. They are far removed from such Gospel privileges as the church, with its educated and consecrated pastor, the Sunday School and weekly prayer-meeting, and the religious press; also the day school, except to a limited degree. They see but little of the secular press or current healthful literature, and at present it would be of use only here and there among those who can read.

2. Their comparative poverty, with their large, growing families huddled together

The Gospel of Christ coming into these spiritually darkened homes never fails to illuminate and bless them. The Bible is the one book they need to guide them in present duty, give comfort in sorrow, and open to them the life hereafter. As a class of people they are very suggestive of the lost sheep, which is the theme of the famous hymn, "Ninety and Nine:" "On the mountains, wild and bare Away from the tender Shepherd's care."

The Sunday School missionary seeks them out in the name of Christ, "Although the road be rough and steep."

The American Sunday School Union from its start in Philadelphia 72 years ago to the present time has furnished every missionary it has sent out, not only with Bibles, but with lesson helps, good library books, Sunday School papers, etc. This literature is so well adapted to the mixed frontier settlements that the denominational missionaries not infrequently send to our men for a supply, finding that they cannot use their own to advantage. Such a request came while I was South. The missionary who received it said it had occurred several times. He sent the supply. When starting schools in these "Mountain Districts" as well as further South (and to some extent in the West) the spelling book is essential as part of the equipment. Our Society has always published this book. There are other books of a substantial character, some of them reference books essential to Bible study, which are given to schools under certain conditions, or furnished at nominal rates through special gifts from friends of the Union, which have materially reduced the cost of publication. The Union has had continued manifestations of Divine blessing during its long experience in Sunday School work. It has been generously sustained by the Christian public up to the late financial pressure, but funds are now needed to continue the missionaries in the field, not only all through the South, but in the great Northwest as well.

Wanderers Reclaimed.

Mr. D. Talmage Mershon, assistant superintendent at the Bowery Mission, relates the following interesting incidents of the work there: "I received a letter from a man whom I had helped and who had deserted his family at Princeton, N. J. He was bound for England. We kept him here in the mission till nearly two o'clock, and then got him to write home to his family, and confess his sin. Since that I have received a letter from him which I have before me, post-marked 'Princeton, N. J.,' and saying that he was at home and had been freely forgiven. Last night I was in our office till two o'clock with another man—an engineer—who came forward at our Gospel meeting two nights ago. Almost every night I am kept here till one or two o'clock, talking and trying to help the fallen. I might tell you of many, many instances where boys have been helped, and some, I feel confident, have been fully saved."

THE LOOSE SCREW.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

O one is like Jessie," said Steve to his sister. "John has her pluck and fibre; and one feels that he is made of superfine blood and iron, and betters it with a noble spirit. But Jessie is fair, and John is dark. Jessie is small, and John is tall. Jessie is more piquant than beautiful; John is handsome as the morning and cheerful as light. I was once complaining of my fate. I said, 'I had been born under evil stars,' and John answered, 'No matter what stars we are born under, Steve, they all tell us to look up. For if we did not come into this world to better ourselves, we might as well have stayed where we were.' I tell you, Alice, those words went into my heart. I shall never complain of my stars again. John ought to be a preacher."

"What is he?" Alice asked.

"A student of law—a writer of essays—a newspaper scribbler—a man fighting the world with his pen, until his tongue is armed for the conflict. But when the law has furnished him with weapons, he will be a grand pleader. I would be willing to get into a net of circumstantial evidence, just to watch John pull it all to pieces."

"I think he must be the most interesting of this wonderful family. I should like to see John McAslin."

"I would not have you to run into such danger, Alice."

She laughed uneasily, being embarrassed by the boldness of her own desire. So she put an end to the conversation, by rising from the table. "Mother does not like you to smoke, Steve. She says smoking is the first vice, drinking the second. I did not say a word last night of your arrival," Alice continued, "for had she known you were in the house, it would have been impossible for her to have slept."

"Poor little mother! I wish she had a better son! Does she go out much now?"

"Less and less."

"I am sorry. I think she makes a mistake. One should not go through the world with closed eyes."

"But if angels lead you, what then? And mother finds it best to shut her eyes to so much."

"I know; I saw father in the park a few days ago. He was with a very gay party. I won't tell you who composed it. Money flies in such company; and father counts his money so carefully. It is a wonder to me!"

"And you are a wonder to him. And so it is—few of us understand those whom we ought most of all to know."

They were going hand in hand up the wide, polished stairway, and they spoke in very low tones. As Stephen drew near to his mother, a marked change came over him. The kindly bravado of his manner to Alice disappeared; and the white feather of personal shame was very evidently tinging his love and longing with a certain reluctance. He hesitated at the closed door; if Alice had not been at his side, he would have retreated. She watched him enter; then she turned backward, for she knew that these two souls needed no interpreter. Indeed, he was barely within the room, ere she heard the sweet, half-veiled tones of welcome—tones like a caress.

"Oh, Steve! Steve! Oh, my boy! My dear boy!"

CHAPTER II.

MATRIMONIAL PLANS.

What passed between the mother and son, remained secret. Steve came downstairs with humid eyes, and an air of gloom that was almost sullen. This air, however, was only the veil he assumed in order to hide his unusual mood; for his mother had a wonderful influence over him; though it was no more practical than her own piety. For Marian Lloyd was a mystic in the largest sense of the word. She dwelt with this Spirit of the Cloud; in a constant sense of a spiritual world, which surrounded and might at any moment claim her.

Really, her soul was naturally full of mystic flashes, native and sweet, and far beyond her own endeavor; and, therefore, as soon as she realized the falseness of earthly love, and the vanity of earthly desires, she had turned wholly to things in visible—to the Father of Spirits, with whom there is no variableness; to pleasures immortal, and beyond the touch of disappointment. And yet her intense realization of that great spiritual force—which any man or woman may lay hold of by faith, and make their own—came not by any intellectual process of theology; it was the power and fervor of the indwelling soul, burning within, and developing that sixth sense, by which we see "things invisible."

Still, a life is beautiful and fit, just in proportion as it fits its duties and environments. Marian Lloyd did not perceive that the finest materials for religious happiness and spiritual growth were at her fireside; among her family affections, and her home duties. She desired to obtain a condition "above the meanness of fear, and the selfishness of hope;" but she forgot that she was lawfully bound to those who might be powerfully influenced for good, by her fears and hopes; she forgot that the heart has two great powers—the power of prayer, and the power of loving; and that the more homely one, gives glory to the higher—makes for it wings; and teaches it those singing, shining, omnipotent words that reach the ear of the Ineffable One.

Something of this condition of affairs was divined by Steve; though he had far too large a reverence for his mother, to voice plainly his opinion. He went into the quiet garden, and paced up and down the graveled walks, and communed with his own heart in a way that was far from bringing him stillness, or peace. In fact, he was glad when he saw Alice coming towards him. Her white dress fell in soft folds to her feet; she had a white parasol over her uncovered head; and he said to himself—"she is straight, and white, and pure as a lily. No one but John is worthy of her."

"So you have had your talk with mother?" she inquired.

"Yes—a solemnly-sweet talk."

"She looks very frail. I wish she would go out more."

"If she would only go about the house more. If we could see her at table—if, indeed, she could only make up her mind to serve us, as well as pray for us. It might be better. I don't think mother understands the power of those indirect influences, that distil from a holy, loving life. They seem intangible, but they may be more than effort."

"I cannot bear to think of mother ruffling her calm soul with the frets of the house—father's tempers and unkindness—my little vanities and social annoyances—and the never-ceasing worry, and unreasonableness of the servants."

"I don't know about that, Alice. I remember reading of a man who received as a precious gift, a block of sandal wood. He was a fine carver, and he resolved to make out of it a lovely image of a saint. And he worked, and worked, until the block was all cut away; and his ideal as far from being realized as when he began. But one night a servant brought in a block of oak wood for the fire; and on this homely wood he began to try again; and as he did so, his dream grew in beauty, and his knife in skill; and he made from the common wood that grew at his door, an image lovely and wonderful; though he had cut the priceless, exotic sandal wood away in vain endeavor. The same is a parable, Alice, if you can read it. I am going away again in an hour or two."

"Will you not wait and see father?"

"For what good end? Father does not care to see me, unless I am ready to say, 'your will, sir, and not mine.' I am not ready to say that. I must have liberty."

"Is liberty, then, so great a good? Women have to do without it."

"Life and liberty are both gifts of God; liberty is the greatest of the two. The fetters of women are small, uneasy things; they chiefly affect the body; the fetters of business, arms, government, which bind men, rust into the soul. I am going to the sea for a few weeks."

"Are you still sick for the sea, then?"

"You can't tell how much so. Even here in the green peace of the trees, I hear the waves purring softly with little treble sounds, against the sides of the ship. This turf seems firm to your little feet; but it is like the pulsing floor of the sea to me; and my heart leaps, and I could laugh outright, as I think of wave after wave, rolling in to rent rapture."

"I AM GOING TO THE SEA," SAID STEVE.

"When will you go to sea?"

"Next Saturday."

"You may not get work by Saturday. Have you money? A desire like yours is a very sickness—I have some money left."

"I have a friend—a sailor. I can go to sea whenever I want to go."

"It is only Thursday. Where will you stay until Saturday?"

"With John McAslin."

"Then you will see Jessie, also?"

"Yes, I shall see her. Alice, I wish you could see her. She teaches music. Can't you take some lessons? You don't play as well as she does."

"Steve, why can't you learn to say pleasant, flattering things? I don't play as well as this Jessie McAslin. Is that the way to coax me? You dear old stupid, you?"

"Will you take some lessons, Alice?"

"I will think about it."

"Do. It will please me so much."

"Send me her professional card. I suppose she has one."

"Will you really, dear?"

"I will do any right, reasonable thing to please you, Steve. You know that."

She looked at him as she spoke, and to her he seemed very good and desirable. The rough, restless life he had led for nearly three years, had not left traces that repelled her. It was the hand of Nature that had tanned and marked him; but as yet, the vices of humanity had not signed themselves on his open face. Doubtless, he had met them in his strange experiences; perhaps he had entertained them as passing guests; but they had not become his familiars. She sent him away with kisses and good wishes; and she was not jealous of Jessie McAslin, though she knew he was longing to see her. Alice loved her brother unselfishly; she had already divined that Steve might be won by a large, noble nature that controlled his own, to lead a more useful life; and if Jessie could thus save and bless him, she was glad to hope in such a salvation.

After Steve's departure, she sat all afternoon making plans to bring about an acquaintance with this girl. She was sure that Steve already loved her; and she would not believe that there was any invincible reason for regarding the marriage as hopeless. Her own faith in her brother was perennial; she had the conviction that if Steve was surrounded by the proper circumstances, he would be a man after any good woman's heart. A home would be an anchor to the restless spirit, and its obligations would sweetly compel to industry, of some laudable kind.

As she sat in the summer sunshine, stitching gold and silver threads into a square of pink satin, she planned for Steve all kinds of domestic happiness. He must have a farm; he must have animals dependent on his care; he must be near the woods; and not far away from the sea. He must have a home not too fine for daily use, and yet fine enough to keep him bond to conventional decencies. He must have the right kind of a wife above all things; and she felt certain that Jessie was the right kind. Steve said "she was hard-headed and soft-hearted," and Alice considered this an excellent combination for her reckless, affectionate brother. Her want of fortune was also an advantage; money would have given her special rights and privileges, which would have irritated, and made Steve rebellious; it was a necessity that he should have a wife who would repose absolute confidence and reliance on his love and exertion.

As for social equality, there could be no question on that matter. Steve laughed at all such distinctions. He declared that he had found gentlemen and ladies in all classes, and that the accident of birth, or education, or wealth, or station had little to do with their existence.

With the unselfishness that was so large a part of her nature she began at once the work which she fondly hoped was to regenerate her brother. "I must give up my three months at Newport," she said with a sweet decision. "I must tell father, that I wish to stay at home to practice my music. The expense will be so much less, and I am sure there will be no objection."

Contrary to her expectation, there was a serious objection. That very day, Mr. Lloyd had begun to plan for his daughter's future; a thing which had hitherto never troubled his speculations. He came home full of unusual hopes; and looked at Alice with a critical regard, that gradually became a settled approval. "I had no idea she was so beautiful," he said to himself as he dressed for dinner. Coming down-stairs he stepped slowly and with enforced dignity; holding his head up to his thoughts, which were of titles and coronets and courts.

Mrs. Lloyd had been an uncertain factor in Alice's plans; she was unable to say, how her mother would regard them; and she hoped to strengthen her own opinions with her father's approval, before it was necessary to explain her change of purpose.

Superintendent Wyburn of the Bowery Mission acknowledges the receipt from Mr. D. Scott Stark, Plains, Luzerne Co., Pa., of a barrel of fruit for the Bowery Mission's Thanksgiving Dinner, also of apples and reading matter from Mrs. S. E. Perine, Allendale, N. J., one dozen jars of jelly from Mrs. R. F. Woodworth, Cheshambury, Conn., and a barrel of chickens, apples, butter and baked provisions from Mr. H. Herrington, Camp Brook Offerings for the Christmas dinner, including turkeys, chickens, lamb, corn, apples, and cranberries. These gifts, together with apples and oranges, would be gratefully received at the Mission, 145 Bowery, Superintendent Wyburn, and will promptly acknowledge.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Coaling a Steamer.

ONE of the most interesting spectacles at the docks in New York, where the great ocean steamboats are moored during their brief sojourns on this side the Atlantic, is the transfer of the coal from the barges to the hold of the steamers. On this page is a picture of the coaling of La Touraine, of the French line, which has just sailed from New York for Havre. During the time she is at her dock here, the coal is being poured into her hold continuously. She requires over eighteen hundred tons to feed her engines on the voyage to France. It is brought to her side in huge barges. A derrick operated by an engine lowers huge iron pails to the barges, which are promptly filled and hoisted by the derrick to the platform extending from La Touraine's hull, where men stand waiting to receive them and empty them through the chutes into the hold. Every day of the voyage, the ravenous engines which drive the floating palace over the waters, must have their meal of one hundred and eighty tons of coal. All that is left of this immense quantity of fuel, which would suffice to keep a block of buildings warm for months, is the track of ashes at the bottom of the sea between America and Europe. La Touraine is by no means the most extravagant consumer of her class. Some of her sisters of the Cunard and White Star lines use 300 tons of coals a day during their voyages and consequently have to take on board at least two thousand tons before they start on their journey. The ingenuity of naval engineers has long been directed to the discovery of some fuel that would be less cumbersome as well as less costly than coal. Hitherto, however, coal holds its supremacy and the highest achievement so far made, is through the triple and quadruple expansion engines, by which the consumption of coal has been reduced, while the speed has been increased. By the use of the compound engine, one and a half pounds of coal now produces one horse power, whereas with the old-fashioned engines, four pounds of coal were required for every horse power developed. By this means, vessels like the City of Paris and the Majestic attain a maximum speed per hour of over twenty-one knots, equivalent to twenty-five land miles. But this is a small economy, and it is a serious question how long our supply of coal will last, if it is used much longer at the present rate. The demand for speed in travel will increase rather than diminish and for this increased power is indispensable. The problem of producing it at the smallest outlay is therefore one of the most urgent problems now exercising the ingenuity of inventors. Moral philosophers have grappled with a similar problem in human progress, but none have ever found a source of power which would make a man strong to overcome evil and make progress in spiritual development. It is now, as it was from the beginning, from God alone that such power comes.

He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength. (Isa. 40: 29)

Silent Pianos.

A pianoforte manufacturer in Boston, Mass., describes a strange experience he has had in one district of the city. He received requests from citizens to examine their pianos which had become useless. The trouble in all cases was much alike. When the keys were struck, the hammers struck the strings several times in a helpless fashion, marring the music. He knew that such an effect must be due to some defect in the tapes which hold the hammers in place. He was puzzled by discovering in the first piano he attempted to set right that the tapes had wholly disappeared. He could not understand what had become of them until he took the piano to pieces. Then he found that a family of mice had settled in the piano and had used the tapes to make their nest. A bunch of tapes chewed into pulp, as large as a cocoa-nut, was at the bottom of the instrument, forming a comfortable bed for a number of young mice. The same thing had happened to other pianos. In that district of the city, the mice have either simultaneously discovered this use for piano-tapes, or have in some way communicated the fact to each other. Evidently piano-owners there and elsewhere will do well to guard against the little pests, by preventing their getting access to the interior of their instruments. Similar vigilance is needed in the Church, and the family, and the individual life, to maintain usefulness. If evil thoughts and what are called, little sins, once gain entrance and remain they soon reduce to widow placed a value on his love which was therefore to be regarded as collateral. The daughter's counsel accepted this view of the case, and asked the jury to show by their verdict how much such collateral was worth. They set aside the deed of transfer and gave the property to the widow's daughter, thereby indicating that they estimated the man's love as worthless. As it was clearly a mercenary attachment on his part, the decision was right, but it would not be just to regard love as worthless in every case. There are people to whom the love of others is their most precious possession, and with the Christian who has a clear appreciation of his privileges, the love of his Lord is so precious that he would sacrifice his all, and even life itself, rather than lose it.

I am persuaded that neither death nor life nor principalities nor powers . . . shall be able to separate us from the love of God. (Rom. 8: 38)

Dynamite Instead of Bulbs.

A florist on Long Island has been the victim of a blunder which might have involved disastrous consequences to him and his neighbors. He ordered some rare bulbs recently from a commission agent of Cologne in Germany. About the time when he expected the bulbs to arrive, an express company delivered a case at his silence the testimony that should be given for Jesus. The Christian's life is like the vineyard described in Solomon's Song liable to be spoiled by small enemies.

Take us the foxes, the little foxes that spoil the vineyard: for they have made our vineyard waste, they have made our pleasant field barren. (Song 2: 15)

The Value of Love.

A jury in Georgia has been required to assess the money value of affection. It appears that some years ago, a wealthy planter died, leaving his estate to his widow, who was a lady of great beauty. She made the acquaintance of a man who urged her to marry him. She did not wish to marry so soon after her husband's death, but pledged herself to him if he would wait a certain time. Finding that he was in need of money, and that he was willing to wait for the marriage, if his need were supplied, the widow transferred a portion of her estate to him for a nominal sum, "in consideration of the love he bore her." She died, however, before the date set for the marriage, and her daughter applied to the courts to have the deed of transfer cancelled. The man could not claim that the money purported to have been paid, represented the value of the property, but he claimed that the store which had just arrived by a German steamer. It bore the card of the commission agent, and the florist naturally supposed it contained the bulbs he had ordered. But on opening it, he took out two hundred and fifty small tin cases full of dynamite. There was enough of the explosive to blow up the whole town, and it seems little short of a miracle that it did not explode. The florist used an axe to force the lid off the case, and did it so carelessly that the edge of the axe had penetrated the inner zinc case in which the dynamite was packed. Had the axe penetrated a quarter of an inch farther, the whole case would have exploded, and widespread disaster must have resulted to many families. An inquiry will of course be made as to the cause of the mistake, but it is supposed that the Cologne agent had the package of dynamite and the package of bulbs in his store at the same time, and in dispatching them, transposed the address labels, with the result that the man who wanted the dynamite, received the bulbs, and the man who had ordered the bulbs received the dynamite. The mistake was inexcusable. People who deal in materials so destructive, ought to take sure precautions which would render such a blunder impossible. But heedlessness is far too common in all walks of life. The mischief that is done by people who do not intend to do harm is quite as great as the mischief that is intentional. The wise king uttered a caution that should never be forgotten, when he wrote: As a mad man who casteth firebrands, arrows and death, so is the man that deceiveth his neighbor. (Prov. 26: 18)

A Tombstone's Warning.

A remarkable monument has been erected in a cemetery at Atchison, Kan. The Kansas City Times describes it as a tall marble shaft, graceful as a church spire, and white as the driven snow. The sculptor has chiselled around it a gigantic snake, whose coils rise one above another from base to summit. The head of the snake is drawn back as if about to strike and its fangs protrude from its open mouth. The shaft rests on a polished granite base bearing below the inscription of the name of the man who is buried beneath it, the significant words: "At last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." The man whose grave is thus marked was prominent in politics and in society and a leader in all local enterprises, a man of brilliant talents and enormous wealth. No man in his State was more popular than he, none more welcome at public and private festivities. His advice was sought in political circles and his judgment in business matters was sound and unerring. A happy home circle and a host of friends should have made his life a singularly delightful one. But he began to drink to excess, at rare intervals and then more frequently. Gradually he became a confirmed drunkard and his constitution being frail he speedily succumbed. At his funeral there was a gathering more numerous and distinguished than had ever been seen in the city. Deputations wearing rich regalia were there from societies of which he had been a member, from his clubs and civic associations. He was buried with pomp and with expressions of general sorrow, but his widow who had been a sad witness of his fall could find no monument for him so appropriate as the beautiful shaft in the coils of a serpent. It is a warning not only to those who are liable to fall by the same enemy, but to those who like this man's friends contribute to the fall of others by ill-advised hospitality:

Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that putteth the bottle to him and maketh him drunken. (Hab. 2: 15)

A Canine Witness.

A dog's evidence decided a case in the Yorkville Police Court of New York a few days ago. A policeman brought two men into court who had been fighting on the street. It seems that one of the men was out for a walk and was leading his dog by a chain, when the other man saw him and claimed the dog. They disputed about its ownership until words became inadequate to express their feelings and they resorted to blows. In court each man told his story. The man who had possession of the animal told how he had purchased it of a respectable dealer and proved that he had kept it for a long time. The dealer could not remember among the many dogs sold how this particular dog came into his possession. The claimant of the animal declared that he had reared it from puppy-hood, and that it had been stolen from him. He admitted that there were many other dogs like his, but he was sure that this dog was his and that he could not be mistaken. Cross-examination on both sides failed to break down the evidence of either party and the case seemed to be in doubt. The justice listened patiently until the argument closed and then ordered the dog who was in court to be set free. Its present owner and the claimant were on opposite sides of the court and the justice told them both to call it. The dog hesitated a moment and then bounded to the feet of the man who claimed him, licked his hands and showed every sign of recognition that he could. The justice promptly awarded the dog to him on the dog's own evidence. It would be well if it were always possible to decide by the same method whether a man belongs to Christ or the world. Sometimes people who bear Christ's name do not respond to his voice, but go to the world when it beckons them. The prophet said it was so in his time:

They say, I am a Jew, but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider. (Isa. 1: 3)

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

A. B. D. I now attend a Methodist Church and they want me to join the Epworth League. Should I be doing wrong to comply when it is my intention at a future time to join a Presbyterian Church and be a member of the Christian Church?

You would probably find the duties conflicting if you belonged to both at the same time. The one would be a preparation for the other if you transfer your allegiance afterwards. The same qualities which would make you a useful member of the Epworth League would fit you to fulfil the duties of a Christian Endeavorer. The objects of the two Societies and the methods are practically identical.

Jessie L., Kansas City, Mo. Who was the author of "Oh, the old trundle-bed?"

There are several "trundle-bed" poems, but the one you refer to is probably that written by James Whitcomb Riley, the first verse of which is:

O the old trundle-bed where I slept when a boy!
What canopy king might not covet the joy?
The glory and peace of that slumber of mine,
Like a long gracious rest in the bosom divine:
The quaint, homely couch, hidden close from the light,
But daintily drawn from its hiding at night,
O a nest of delight from the foot to the head,
Was the queer little, dear little, old trundle-bed!

A. S. Manton, Burlington, Ia. In a recent issue of your paper, reference is made to a thought-measuring machine. Is such a machine in actual existence, and if so, where?

An Italian physiologist, Prof. Mosso, is the inventor. The machine consists of a set of extremely sensitive balances which measure the quantity and velocity of the blood in the brain, and indicate the varying exertions called forth by different mental activities. Thus it only measures intensity of mental energy, but in no sense does it measure thought either as to its quality or intellectual force.

L. L., Smithtown Branch, N. Y. Do you not think it would be right to commence every pronoun standing for God with a capital letter?

It is reverential, but not customary. The usage is to capitalize the name and attributes of the Deity, but not the pronouns. Thus, "the Omniscient, the All-Seeing, the Merciful."

For the benefit of several readers who have written us inquiring as to the comparative numerical strength of the leading religions of the world, we print the following: Protestant Christians, 200,000,000; Roman Catholic Christians, 105,000,000; Greek Catholic Christians, 105,000,000; total Christians, 500,000,000; Jews, 8,000,000; Mohammedans, 180,000,000; heathen, 812,000,000; total non-Christian, 1,000,000,000. The total population of the earth is estimated at 1,500,000,000, distributed as follows: Asia, 854,000,000; Australia, 4,730,000; America, 133,670,000; total, 1,500,000,000.

Reader Custer, O. Is there room in the mission field for one having a talent for music and desiring to use it?

Yes, if the talent is marked and the desire to work for Christ is genuine, there should be little difficulty in finding an opening. Write to Rev. Mr. Torrey, Bible Institute, Chicago.

On the nakedness of the human body, it is limited to a certain extent by the laws of nature, and should be limited to a certain extent by the laws of nature.

Human methods of correction should be substituted for the use of the whip.

Reader, Hillsdale, Penn. 1. On what question, and when, did the first Thanksgiving-day originate? 2. Is Thanksgiving-day a legal holiday? 3. Do you consider it right to keep Thanksgiving-day as a "feast-day," as so many of our people indulge in nowadays?

1. The first celebration was in 1621, when the Pilgrim Fathers observed the day. 2. Yes. 3. Yes; it is a festival, not a fast; a day of praise and rejoicings for the blessings of the year.

H. E. J., Haverhill, Mass. Is it wrong for a white person and a colored person to marry?

The union of opposite races—or miscegenation in a majority of cases leads to bitter regrets. In certain communities it is forbidden by law. Society recognizes the inadvisability of such unions and has stamped them as improper and unbecoming. On all grounds it is inexpedient as it is a violation of well recognized social law and custom.

Reader. Can you direct me in collecting material, constructing and learning to deliver lectures, and as to books of illustrative anecdote required?

It is impracticable to give such directions in a few words; there are so many requisites. Elocutionary ability, thorough acquaintance with your subject, the use of proper apparatus (if illustrated lectures are intended), the selection of suitable topics and a certain degree of literary skill in the construction of your addresses are all indispensable.

Coodie, North Morning Sun, Ia. Will you give me some information about Blarney Castle?

It is a somewhat noted and romantic looking ancient building in the little village of Blarney, about five miles from Cork, Ireland. It is chiefly known on account of a stone on the walls of the castle, which is said to confer, upon a person who kisses it, the gift of persuasive eloquence. Many visit it for the sake of saying they have "kissed the Blarney stone."

G. R., Elma, Mo. Did Solomon commit a sin when he married Pharaoh's daughter, and if so, why?

Such unions with "strange nations and idolaters" were repeatedly forbidden. Since the time of the Exodus there had been no intercourse between the two countries, and David had discouraged it. The result of Solomon's alliance proved that it was impolitic, to say the least.

meaning in his reference to men and women would be if we knew more of the condition of the church at Corinth at that time. Evidently some errors were prevalent that Paul was striving to correct. The new wine was bursting the old bottles. The principles of Christianity were being held. But the only women who were emancipated at that time were women of bad character. There was a danger of scandal to the church, if the women who joined it acted wicked women showed. Paul had, therefore, to impose restraints so that there might be no cause for reproach. But lest they should regard him as adopting the principles of their oppressors, he tells them that woman has her place in the new dispensation. Man has no monopoly of its blessings. The Lord has need of both. That appears to us to be the meaning, although we are aware that other inferences have been drawn from the passage.

L. Roberts, Brooklyn, N. Y. Please explain how Christ, who is declared to have been sinless, can be especially fitted, as he is said to be (see Heb. 4:15) to sympathize with sinners.

Because he felt the power of temptation. His human nature rendered him liable to sin and he was thus aware, as the writer of the epistle says, how hard a struggle men must have, who had not, as he had, the strength of the Divine nature to oppose the tempter.

X. Y. Z. If Mr. Moody and other evangelists are really interested in saving souls, and not in making money, why do they not go out into the by-ways and poor country places where people are too poor to pay them much? Did Jesus and his disciples wait until sent for by a committee before going to preach?

Do you think Mr. Moody would be doing better for the cause of Christ, if he stopped preaching to audiences of four or five thousand persons and spent his life walking through country lanes, talking to the twos and threes whom he might meet? There never was an evangelist who cared less for personal gain than he. Your innuendo is most cruel and unjust, and you should pray that God will forgive you for writing it. That he goes to great cities is true, and he does so because there he has greater opportunities for doing good. Thousands have heard the Gospel from his lips and have been converted, who would still be in spiritual darkness if he had spent

THE FAMOUS AZTEC "CALENDAR STONE."

What is probably the oldest calendar in actual existence at the present time, is shown in the photographic illustration on this page. It is known to the Mexicans as the famous Aztec Kallenda or Calendar Stone, and is preserved in the public museum, City of Mexico. On this large circular block of porphyry are represented, in elaborate engravings, the transit of the sun, the solstices, equinoxes, months, weeks, days, and hours. The Aztec cycle was fifty-two years, and at the close of each cycle a great festival was observed, the concluding hours of which were marked by the offering up of human sacrifices to the gods. The Aztecs divided the year into eighteen months of twenty days each, adding five complementary days to complete the number required—a method similar to that of the Egyptians. The month was divided into four weeks of five days each. Every year there was a fractional remainder of six hours, which was allowed to accumulate until by adding twelve and a-half days the civil and solar years were made to harmonize. Word paintings or hieroglyphics represented the various divisions of time, each cycle or period of fifty-two years being typified by a sheaf.

his time in the by-ways, as you suggest. We venture to venture for it that Mr. Moody has never been deterred from going to any village by the poverty of its people. The invitations of committees, to which you refer, are chiefly valuable because of the co-operation in Christian work and united effort to help in the saving of souls that an evangelist has reason to expect when he receives such an invitation.

Mrs. E. A. W., Philipsburg, Pa. Was the "one thing" to which Christ referred in speaking to Martha (Luke 10:42) the same "one thing" as he referred to (Luke 18:22) in speaking to the

No, the context shows how different they were. The one thing that was needful for Martha was to put away all temporal matters and, like Mary, seek spiritual enlightenment. The one thing the ruler lacked was that supreme love for Christ and faith in him that he would give up everything for his sake. Martha's service was recognized. Christ knew that she was concerned about his temporal comfort. It showed her love, and so far was good, but Mary's course was better because Christ was happiest when his friends were seeking the spiritual blessings he came to impart. The ruler, on the other hand, lacked what was indispensable—the faith and love which Martha undoubtedly possessed.

J. A. L., Cornwall, N. Y., and B. S., Bay City, Mich. Can you give me name of some reliable publication that will guide me in my effort to put some fruit on the New York market, and into the hands of some honest dealer for sale on commission?

The Fruitman's Guide, published at Nos. 8, 10 and 12 Jay street, New York, will give you all the needed information. It is the accredited journal of the trade and thoroughly reliable.

J. W. S., Carlinville, Ill. 1. How is the chronology in the Bible to be reconciled with the records recently found in the East? 2. Why should the Christian be most miserable of all men if in this life only he has hope in Christ, as stated in 1. Cor. 15: 19? 3. In what sense are we to understand the fire and sparks in Isa. 50: 10, 11?

1. Before the discovery of the records the estimates in the margin of the Bible were challenged by Biblical scholars. The text of the Bible does not afford sufficient data for an accurate chronology and there is the same difficulty with the records. The length of the ancient year has always been a matter of dispute. Until we get more light on the subject the task of reconciling is hopeless. 2. Paul's hope in Christ was the centre and essence of his life. He had lost so much and suffered so much for Christ's sake that he felt his life was thrown away if the grave ended all. 3. When a man was in doubt and darkness, the prophet advised him to seek light from God and rest in faith. Those who trusted in their own reason and in witchcraft and sorcery, would lie down in sorrow. There was no sure guidance in them. They were like a man who trusted in a fire of his own kindling and the sparks that shot from it instead of the sun and its light.

Reader, Oxbow, N. W. T., Canada. 1. Where could I get a map showing the travels of the Apostle Paul? 2. Did Abraham commit a sin in saying (Gen. 12: 12) to the Egyptians that Sarah was his sister? 3. Was John really the son of Mary, the mother of Christ, as Christ intimated (John 19: 26)?

1. There is a very good map of the travels in the International Teacher's Bible, which is issued as a premium with this journal. You can get THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a year and the International Teacher's Bible by sending two dollars to this office. By sending three dollars you get the paper and the Bible, in superior binding and with a thumb index. 2. Yes, lying and deceit are sins in any one who commits them even though he be a patriarch. 3. No, the name of John's mother was Salome (compare Matt. 27: 56 with Mark 15: 40). Christ's words on the cross merely indicated his wish that John should be as a son to Mary and should care for her after her divine Son was dead.

E. M. Taylor, Tex. Do you think it is a sin to do any kind of sewing in the church as Aid Society to get the money for church purposes?

It is not an appropriate place for a sewing circle to meet for work. However, if the matter resolves itself to a question of necessity and there is absolutely no other available space, and the sewing has to be done, it might be done there. It is far better to hold such meetings in a school room or in the house of some church member or of the pastor.

Divorced, Aurora, Ill. In the mail bag you said that the Scriptures recognized only one or at most two legitimate causes for divorce. Is not a man justified in securing a divorce if his wife, by her violent temper, makes his home miserable?

We stated a fact and that fact cannot be disproved. Yours is a different question. It is impossible to pronounce on the case without knowing more of the circumstances. There may be on the husband's part what the courts call "contributory negligence." Perhaps the husband has not been free from blame. In some cases we have known, a little forbearance and tact and uniform kindness would have prevented the outbreak of temper which have made the home miserable. There is a tendency in some of our States to treat marriage as a light and trivial thing, and people rush heedlessly into matrimony trusting that if it does not prove satisfactory the divorce courts will give relief. No country prospers where the sanctity and perpetuity of marriage are not respected.

Joys Born with Christ.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning December 20. Luke 2: 8-20.

TO the Christian, the supreme joy of Christ's birth is that he came to bring salvation, and that joy dwarfs all others into insignificance; but it is well that sometimes we should take account of other blessings which we enjoy from his life and teaching. To fully recount them would involve many volumes, but the brief mention of a few will suggest many others.

Christ's coming introduced a new view of social conditions. As a great preacher has expressed it, he made a new division of society by using a vertical instead of a horizontal line. In his view, society was not divided into upper and lower classes, but according to character. The sheep were on the right and the goats on the left. Wealth, station, culture, did not count in this estimate. He did not inquire whether a man had much or little knowledge or wealth, but whether he had faith and love. The poorest, the very slave, might have these, and the wealthy and cultured might have them, too. How much this meant to the poor and the oppressed, and those whose lives were bitter from any cause, has been realized by multitudes. As he said, the last might be first and the first last, when character became the test.

He made forgiveness of injuries a duty. So emphatic was he on this duty that he explicitly limited God's forgiveness, and made it contingent on human forgiveness. The man of an unforgiving spirit was not to expect mercy. To how many this rule of life has given peace and immunity, none can ever tell. The wrong-doer who repents, but cannot atone, might but for this have suffered indefinitely, and have never been free from vindictive pursuit.

He made charity and helpfulness duties. The Good Samaritan, who helped a man of a race who despised him, and would have no dealings with him, was his model, and to his follower he says, "Go thou and do likewise." In his description of the last judgment, condemnation falls on those who had been negligent of this duty. I was hungry [in the person of my people] and ye gave me no bread, is his accusation. I was sick and in prison and ye visited me not. Beneficence from this time was no longer an act of merit, but compulsory as a duty. How many hospitals, charities, asylums and benevolent institutions have sprung from this legislation of Christ no one can number.

He insisted on the brotherhood of men. No socialistic teacher has been more emphatic in denouncing cruelty and oppression and injustice than he. His followers were not to seek their own honor or advantage at the expense of others. They were not to push themselves forward at feasts nor to seek titles or power over their fellows. "One is your Master and ye are brethren," was his injunction. The man who had two coats was to give to him who had none, and if his help was asked he was to do double the service that had been sought. We have not yet realized more than the beginning of the good that is yet to come from this principle, but in the time that is yet to come when his will shall be the law to the world we shall know it. Competition and the deadly struggle for supremacy will cease, and each will make it his business to promote his brother's good.

SOMETIME.

SOMETIME, when all life's lessons have been learned,

And sun and stars forevermore have set,

The things which our weak judgments here have spurned,

The things o'er which we grieved with lashes wet,

Will flash before us, out of life's dark night,

As stars shine most in deeper tints of blue;

And we shall see how all God's plans are right,

And how that seems reproof was love most true.

And we shall see how, while we frown and sigh,

God's plans go on as best for you and me;

How, when we called, he heeded not our cry,

Because it's wisdom to the end could see.

And e'en a prudent parents disallow

Too much of sweet to craving babyhood,

So God, perhaps, is keeping from us now

Life's sweetest things, because it seemeth good.

M. R. SMITH.

Bishop Ryle's Creed.

The Great Evangelical Bishop's Conclusions on Unfulfilled Prophecy.

ONE of the most earnest and useful Bishops in the Protestant Episcopal Church is Bishop Ryle, whose tracts and larger works are known and read in all lands wherever the Gospel has been preached, and have been blessed to the conversion of many souls. In the course of one of his later works, he thus summarizes the conclusions he has drawn from his study of prophecy:

1. I believe that the world will never be completely converted to Christianity by any existing agency before the end comes. In spite of all that can be done by ministers, churches, schools, and missions, the wheat and the tares will grow together until the harvest. And when the end comes, it will find the earth in much the same state that it was when the flood came in the days of Noah (Matt. 13: 24-30; 24: 37-39).

2. I believe that the widespread unbelief, indifference, formalism, and wickedness which are to be seen throughout Christendom are only what we are taught to expect in God's Word. Troublous times, departures from the faith, evil men waxing worse and worse, love growing cold, are things distinctly predicted. So far from making me doubt the truth of Christianity, they help to confirm my faith. Melancholy and sorrowful as the sight is, if I did not see it I should not think the Bible was true. (Matt. 24: 12; I. Tim. 4: 1; II. Tim. 3: 1, 13, 14.)

3. I believe that the grand purpose of the present dispensation is to gather out of the world an elect people, and not to convert all mankind. It does not surprise me at all to hear that the heathen are not all converted when missionaries preach, and that believers are a little flock in any congregation in my own land. It is precisely the state of things which I expect to find. This is a dispensation of election, and not of universal conversion. (Acts 1: 24; Matt. 24: 13.)

4. I believe that the second coming of the Lord Jesus Christ is the great event which will wind up the present dispensation, and for which we ought daily to long and pray. "Thy kingdom come," "Come Lord Jesus," should be our daily prayer. We look backward, if we have faith, to Christ dying on the cross, we ought to look forward no less, if we have hope, to Christ coming again. (John 14: 3; II. Tim. 4: 8; I. Peter 3: 12.)

5. I believe that the second coming of our Lord Jesus Christ will be a real, literal, personal, bodily coming; and that as he went away in the clouds of heaven with his body, before the eyes of men, so in like manner will he return. (Acts 1: 11.)

VI. I believe that after our Lord Jesus Christ comes again the earth shall be renewed and the curse removed: the devil shall be bound; the godly shall be rewarded, the wicked shall be punished; and that before he comes there will be neither resurrection, judgment, nor Millennium. (Acts 3: 21; Isa. 25: 69; I. Thess. 4: 14-18; Rev. 20: 1, etc.)

VII. I believe that the Jews shall ultimately be gathered again as a separate nation, restored to their own land, and converted to the faith of Christ. (Jer. 30: 10, 11; 31: 10; Rom. 11: 25, 26.)

I am well aware that the views I have laid down appear to many persons very gloomy and discouraging. The only answer I make to that charge is this: Are they Scriptural?

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

A Land of Orchards.

Southern California and its Great Fruit Farms—Raisin Pickers at Work.

SOUTHERN California has been called "the American Paradise." Certain it is that one might search the world over without finding a climate or soil better adapted to fruit-raising or vine-growing, or more attractive in respect to general healthfulness. Every passing year sees an increase in the number of fruit-growers, and the orchards and vineyards steadily multiply. Abundant sunshine, the best exposure, and just enough rainfall to supply the needs of the earth give assurance of the best results. Our illustration on this page, from a photograph recently taken, shows an interesting phase of fruit-culture at Fresno, Cal., where Armenian colonists have already demonstrated their ability to succeed as fruit-growers. This is a raisin farm, and the group of men shown in the photograph, are engaged in drying the fruit, which, after being exposed in the sun for a sufficient time, will be pressed, boxed, and sent to market. All of the five counties of Southern California—Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, Ventura, San Bernardino, and San Diego—are famous for the cultivation of figs, raisins, prunes, vines, olives, oranges, lemons, nuts, and many other kinds of fruit, in almost all of which America can now successfully vie with France, Spain, and even Southern Italy and Sicily, as far as quality is concerned.

Many of the fruit farms of Southern California are model establishments. There are the great white-walled dwellings, the spacious barn and stables, the neatly set out orchards or vineries, and the acres on acres of small fruits, all as prettily kept and as carefully tended as could be imagined. There is no slovenliness, no land going to waste within the farm boundaries, and no lack of scientific methods to produce the best results. Level lands, which in other years may have been almost a wilderness, have been made literally "to blossom like the rose," by the use of artesian wells, wind-mills, and irrigation ditches. A singular fact about the soil in that section is that the rain or ditch water has hardly penetrated the soil more than a few inches when the grass, probably parched before, turns green, and tender shoots and flowers spring up everywhere almost magically. In farms and gardens that are well cared for, there are grass-fruits and flowers all the year round, crop after crop in rapid succession. Henry T. Finck, an observant and reliable writer, says:

In that delightful climate—which seems to combine all the charm of Cannes, Nice, Villa d'Este, and Marrakech, without their dangers from infection and disease—there is always something of both spring and summer. There are many things that would seem amazing to the people of the North, but "drive," or wholesale slaughter of these pests of the farmer, and cows eating oranges off the trees! This latter sight, we are assured by Mr. Finck, that he personally witnessed in Anaheim—a fact which may possibly suggest a new but hardly an economical idea to farmers and stock-raisers.

A Word About Resolutions.

To make a good resolution and to keep it, is generally a very difficult task. For the encouragement of those who find it especially hard, Robert J. Burdette sends this seasonable word of inspiration: "Make your resolutions strong as you can, honestly intending to keep every word of them, or when, as sometimes we are tempted to think, they just break themselves, make the same ones over again and make them stronger. By and by they'll become too strong to be broken. When a regiment in battle breaks under the withering fire of the enemy the colonel doesn't give will now become a permanent feature of the programme—a most significant innovation. The leading lady speaker was the wife of a high official in Berlin, Privy Councillor Dr. Lippmann, whose address is said to have been a model of clearness and convincing common-sense.

Moslem Contempt for Women.

In Mohammedan society it is not considered polite to inquire after the health of the host's wife. Indeed, many Moslems would regard such an inquiry as an insult, and even while answering, would add, "May God elevate you," that is to say, "May he give you better taste in the selection of a subject for your conversation." To speak of a woman seriously or with consideration, is beneath Moslem dignity. This same phrase, "May God elevate you," he would use if you had mentioned a cow, a dog, or a pig.

Plucky Boys who Won Fame.

Grit and determination are excellent qualities for young folks to cultivate. By way of illustrating this, a pastor relates these two highly instructive incidents, drawn from his own experience, which should encourage young readers who are hampered at the outset of life's battle by

SUCCESS.

OUR life is a blessing, or curse, as we make it.
In spite of surroundings, we rise if we will; The power is given, if only we will take it.
The mountains to level—the valleys to fill.
Some stand at the bottom—no friends and no money.
Their lot is a hard one, but upward they'll rise
If firm in their purpose. The milk and the honey
Will fall to their portion, as food from the skies.
Our blessings avail not, if purpose is lacking;
Success is not won by a wish or a dream!
Hard work and persistence—with these for a backing,
One never is helpless, to drift on the stream.
Then shrink not from labor; with willing hands take it.
No drone ever conquered the ills of this life.
Take labor with gladness; a stepping-stone make it—Successes will sweeten the toil and the strife.
—J. M. MORSE.

The Bay-Window Garden.

FLOWERS in the garden are a delight; within the house they are a benediction. There are few things that lend a cheerier or more picturesque appearance to a room than a fragrant nook of delicate foliage and blossom. In many parts of our union, not longer than a quarter of a century ago, a bay window was a rarity, writes Edward B. Heaton, in the May-flower. With the advent of flowers came windows to receive them. To-day there are but few residences built without windows of various designs for the reception of flowers, and house-plants bless nearly every home. It is pleasant, also, to hear our matrons and daughters talk of the flowers. Flora's nomenclature comes "trippingly on the tongue." Great words like Pelargonium and Chrysanthemum seem as native as yes and no. A little botanical knowledge adds to the interest one takes in plants. The bay window is almost a new creation. How curious the plants! Here the tropics, where nature is at her best, have contributed their choicest and rarest dainties. Palms, Oranges, feathery Ferns, marvelous Orchids, and a thousand bulbs and tubers thrust up their glorious chalices for show, filled with royal perfumes. This floral education reaches much farther. Every village, almost, has its Chrysanthemum social. The churches are adorned with the choicest blooms. On Easter especially there is a deluge of bloom. The very chandeliers are hidden in gorgeous festoons. The preacher is never better pleased than when a mother in Israel brings a bouquet or a plant and places it on the stand by the side of the sacred desk.

Childish Efforts in Art.

In the drawings of children (says Professor Mason of Philadelphia, a famous art teacher), the early work should be as free and spontaneous as early speech. Visit the kindergarten. If mechanical drill is the right foundation for thoughtful expression through drawing, surely the earlier this foundation is established the better for the child. But what is the method of the intelligent kindergarten? Why, she tells her pupils to take a piece of charcoal, or wax crayon, or some medium that will make a soft, fluent line, and draw whatever they see or are thinking about. The first results are crude, to be sure; but the desire to express something is aroused, and the proper method is established of seeing—directing the attention, observing and attempt at picturing. What more does the artist do? What less should the child do? And yet with many it has become an established procedure that the little child should be drilled on lines, circles, oblongs, triangles, ellipses, etc., term in and term out, until he has mastered this alphabet of the line, when he can be trusted to draw from objects showing these shapes. Surely there is a better way of developing a child's taste for art.

ON A RAISIN FARM IN SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

up in despair and run away. No, he halts the scattered men, and re-forms under fire, and when he can do that it shows that he is not only a colonel, every inch of him, but that he is colonel of a fighting regiment. You are no coward. When your good resolutions break then it is time for you to show your nerve; correct your alignment under fire and move forward."

German Women in Public Affairs.

It is unquestionable that the majority of the German people seem to agree with Emperor William's sententious remark that woman's true province was the kuche, kirche, kinde (the kitchen, the church, and the children); but, notwithstanding, there are many sections of the empire where a wider field is accorded. Last year, for the first time in the history of Germany, a woman was permitted to address a public assembly of a religious or semi-religious character. It was at the convention of a representative body of earnest Christians from every section of the empire, clergy and lay, striving to solve the social problem in its widest aspects from the standpoint of the Word of God. The experiment has been repeated at the recent convention of this organization at Stuttgart, and what has hitherto been an experiment the lack of means and opportunities, "I was at college with a young man preparing for the ministry," he writes, "a man of brain power, who could receive no help, and he was poor. I knew that he moved out of the college building into a little shanty outside the campus, and there, with a group of half a dozen other students, he lived on three dollars and a half per month. I always thought he ate so much corn bread and sorghum molasses that it made his hair red; but he persevered and graduated. He is to-day a missionary in China. I knew another young man at that same college who had no friends, no money, and who desired to be a Christian minister. He shouldered his axe, walked three miles across the Blue Ridge and into the college campus seeking his education. He chopped his way through college for five years, and graduated with honor, being unable to obtain assistance.

"Christ - Flowers."

Very pretty are these verses to the Chrysanthemum or Christ-flower:

They are small and close-sheathed buds at first,
But full and fair when their buds are burst,
And sweetest of all when their buds are burst,
Because they were given their sweet name
For the holiest Child that ever came
To earth, when the day of his birth is here
They should have their part in the children's cheer.

NEW YORK'S GREAT REVIVAL.

Crowds Listening Daily to Mr. Moody's Presentation of the Gospel and Mr. Sankey's Thrilling Solos—Some of Mr. Moody's Illustrative Anecdotes.

IT has been many years since New York has witnessed a movement like that which has been aroused by Mr. Moody's services in Cooper Union and Carnegie Music Hall. Day after day, crowds

Among the illustrative anecdotes which Mr. Moody has used in the course of his services were the following:

Preaching by Candlelight.

When I was a young man and preached out in the West—I was a commercial traveler then—I would go into a little town and hold a meeting in a log school-house, and some old gentleman would say: "This young brother from Chicago will speak here this evening at early candle-light," and the first person that came would bring an old dingy lantern and stick it up on a bench—and even an old lantern with a little oil and a wick, you know, gives out considerable light after all on a dark night—and the next person that came, an old woman perhaps, would bring a sperm candle, and then would come an old farmer with another candle, and they would stick them up on the battered desks and they would splutter away there, yet all the time giving a good deal of light. And, do you know, by the time the people got gathered there in that old schoolhouse we had plenty of light. Now, it can be just so here in New York. There are Christians enough here in New York to light up the whole city. Have you got your light lit? If you haven't, light it up right off. See to it that your lantern is lit. Get filled with the spirit of God, and then you can't help but shine.

A Lost Child.

One of the sweetest sentences ever uttered is that which tells us what Christ came to do in this world. "For the Son of Man has come to seek and to save that which was lost." Don't let any one say that God has never sought you. He has sought you more times than you have hairs on your heads. All heathen religion is a man working himself up to his God. The religion of Jesus Christ is God coming down to man. In one of our meetings there was a little child who had been separated from her mother as they both were entering the hall. The mother had the child's name called out from the platform, and the little lost one was asked to stand up. The mother became frenzied as there was no response. Later the child was found in the very front seat. When asked why she did not speak when the inquiry was made for the lost child, she replied, "because I was not lost." She knew where she was and she was quite content. You laugh at the story, but I want you to know that you are lost and it is not some one else that Christ is looking for, but you."

Light in the Lantern.

You hear a great deal about religion nowadays. Let me tell you that religion is one thing, and vital godliness and Holy Ghost power is another thing. Now [holding up an unlighted lantern] we will call this religion. What is this lantern good for if I have got to stay in this hall all night? What is the matter with it? Why, there is no light in it. If you ask one of these dead-alive Christians about religion, the moment you begin to talk to him he will fetch out his old lantern. But if there isn't any oil in it what good is the lantern. What we want is to illuminate Christianity. May God do it here to-day. The moment you talk with men about religion they will get behind their lanterns and say: "Oh yes, we've got religion." Oh yes, and that is all they have got. When you get filled with the spirit of God you will get lit up, illuminated. That is what it is called: "Ye are the light of the world," Christ says.

Innocent Prisoners.

I remember some years ago preaching in the Tombs here in New York. There was not a man to be seen. It was pretty hard work preaching to stone walls and barred doors but the warden told me that the prisoners could hear me, so I gave them the straight Gospel. When it was over I went around to some of the grated cells and I asked the men what they were there for. It was the saddest thing. The wrong that had been done. These men were all innocent, it appeared—according to their story. One man was in because he happened to be in a place where a robbery had been committed. The thief got away and the police took this innocent man. Another prisoner was equally unfortunate. He was so like a notorious criminal the police arrested him by mistake—clean case of mistaken identity. So it was in cell after cell. It was no use talking to them. They were unfortunate, nothing more. It was sinners I wanted to reach. It was sinners I wanted to tell about Jesus. At last I found one man who owned up. It was like water to a thirsty soul. I knelt down on the cell floor and prayed with him. At last there was a man who wanted the pardon and salvation I had to preach, and I got that man before I left.

An Offer Doubted.

People get false ideas of promises in the Bible. They think they are too good to be true or are impossible to be performed. Promises are conditional or unconditional. If you do your part in the conditional promises all promises are going to be performed. If I don't walk uprightly the promises do not apply to me. But if I do, you can blot out the sun or upheave the ocean easier than you can break God's promises. I knew a Sunday School teacher once, a very earnest, faithful man who tried hard to get this into the heads and hearts of a class of big boys. He wanted them to see that when God promises a thing he means to do it. After talking some time he thought a little self-sacrifice might help his exposition. He took out his watch and offered it to any him crazy; some thought him a fraud, but no one had the sense to pay his shilling and get a coin worth twenty in exchange.

"IT IS ONLY ONE TICK AT A TIME."

"Ye would not come to me that ye might have life," was Christ's reproach.

A Discouraged Pendulum.

There was a lady who used to attend our meetings in England. She used to come in her carriage and go away without waiting for the after-meeting. She sat right in front every day with a cold, hard, critical face. But after a time she became anxious. She wanted the joy and peace of the Gospel. She stayed to the after meeting and told me her difficulty. She was in society, and she did not think she could hold out after the meetings were over and we had come back to America. Well, I told her the story of the pendulum. You know it? You see, it was a pendulum waiting to be fixed on a new clock. It began to calculate how long it would be before the big wheels were worn out and its work was done. It would be expected to tick night and day, so many times a minute, sixty times that every hour, and twenty-four times that every day, and three hundred and sixty-five times that every year. Nobody knew how many times that. It was awful! Quite a row of figures enough to stagger you. Millions of ticks. "I can never do it," said the poor pendulum. But the clock-maker encouraged it. "You can do one tick at a time?" he said. "Oh, yes," the pendulum could do that. "Well," he said, "that is all that will be required of you." So the pendulum went to work steadily ticking, one tick at a time and it is ticking yet, quite cheerfully. The lady saw the point I wanted to make and she went away to think it over. She wrote me that it was all right. She had bought a clock that had a pendulum visible and as she saw it swing, she said to herself, "it is only a tick at a time: I can trust Christ for a day." When I was sailing for home a package was left at the hotel for me. It was a clock from that lady and it is now at Northfield ticking away a tick at a time. I met that lady about twelve years afterward and I asked her how it was with her. She answered, "The old clock is still ticking, Mr. Moody." I learned that she was not only happy herself but she was helping others. There were city missionaries and foreign missionaries at work, whose salaries that lady was paying. She had told the secret to so many of her friends who felt the same way that they took to calling her Lady Pendulum.

MR. IRA D. SANKEY AT THE ORGAN.

gather outside the famous building in the early morning, patiently waiting for the doors to be opened. Again at mid-day another crowd assembles, and when at two o'clock the great hall is thrown open, every seat is filled, and even the aisles are thronged. On Sunday afternoons Carnegie Music Hall, immense as it is, does not contain a third of the people. Dr. MacArthur's large church is crowded from the overflow, and on Nov. 29, after that and the Central Presbyterian Church had both been filled, a crowd sufficiently large to fill another great church went away, unable to gain access to either of the three buildings.

It is significant that there is nothing of a sensational character in the services to attract such an enormous number of people. They come to hear the plain Gospel, presented by a plain man making no pretensions to oratory, but telling the old story of the Cross in homely but most convincing fashion. Doubtless many are drawn by the hope of hearing Mr. Sankey's thrilling solos, but in these, too, the Gospel of Christ is the burden of the song, and the rapt faces and falling tears, which are seen in all parts of the Hall while Mr. Sankey is singing, are the response to the same message set to music, which Mr. Moody has presented in his sermon. A practical effect of Mr. Moody's preaching was given in a letter covering a $100 bill, received by Controller Fitch. The writer said it rightfully belonged to the city, and he had been moved to send it by hearing Mr. Moody preach.

boy in the class. The boys looked at him in amazement. They thought he was joking or it was just a figure of speech. But one little chap walked right up to him and held out his hand. The teacher put the watch into it and the lad put it into his pocket and went off as proud as a prince. The other boys looked at each other more amazed than ever, and chagrined too. Every boy blamed himself because he did not have that watch. Why did that one boy get it? He believed the teacher was in earnest and he went and held out his hand. That is what you have to do. When you read a promise, go to God and hold out your hand.

A Gold Coin Not Wanted.

Some men in London were talking about popular incredulity. There was a dispute about it and one man made a bet that he would stand all morning on London Bridge where twenty thousand people would pass him and he would offer them a sovereign (worth five dollars) for a shilling, and that not one would take it. Well, his friend made the bet. Next morning the man stood on London Bridge, with a tray in his hand. He had a lot of worthless trinkets on the tray and among them the gold sovereign. He offered any article on his tray for a shilling, and all morning he stood there reiterating in a monotonous way, "A sovereign for a shilling! A sovereign for a shilling!" Some of the people thought

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

Capturing a Lawyer.

FEW years since, when a pastor in Boston, Mass., I became very much interested in a young man who was just finishing his theological course in the Boston University. The young fellow was so enthusiastic, so optimistic, so bubbling over with faith in God and love for men, and so sure that God was strong-

"Pray for me as you never did before; for this means everything to me. If God gives me this man in answer to my work and prayer at the very beginning of my ministry, I shall feel that everything is possible after that."

This letter impressed me deeply. The holy audacity of the young fellow almost took my breath away, and I awaited the future development with most prayerful interest.

About ten days later I received a second letter, in which ran these lines: "I could stand it no longer, and so have been to see Judge —. I just opened my heart and told him all about it. I told him I could hardly sleep or eat on his account, but was praying for him all the time. Everything I intended to say went out of my head, and I just blundered on, trying to tell him how much he owed the Lord, and what a great chance there was for him to change the whole community by swinging about and giving his heart to Christ."

"He was the most astonished-looking man I ever saw. He looked at me at first like you have seen a great St. Bernard dog look at a young puppy that runs up to him on the street. Still he was not offended, but treated me kindly, and I believe God will give him to me yet."

This was getting to be interesting. What a battle royal it was for a human soul. On one side the most successful criminal lawyer of the Ohio River Valley—a middle-aged man hedged about by evil associations and chained by evil habits. On the other hand, this ruddy young David with his sling.

I did not hear from the battlefield again for three or four weeks, and was becoming anxious, when one morning I received a letter which brought me to my feet. It began: "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." Judge — sent for me to come and pray with him last night. He was under deep conviction, and was mourning over his sins. He told me he had not had a moment's rest since the day I first came to see him and told him I was praying for him. I prayed over him and cried over him, and I believe he is happily converted er than the devil, that it was a delight to have fellowship with him.

When his theological course was completed, he went out to Cincinnati to begin his ministry in a plain little chapel in one of the suburbs of that city. There were few members in his little church, and all of them were poor. The outlook would have been very unpromising to many young college men, but to my young friend the difficulties in the way only inspired him to greater exertion. I shall never forget the first letter I had from him after he reached the field. It ran like this:

"I am on the ground at last, and am beginning to get the lay of the land. It seems good after being in school so long to feel that at last you are on the track and have a fair chance at the race. I imagine that I feel like a hound that has been chafing in his kennel for a long time and is at last turned loose, with the game in sight. The ministry never seemed so precious and splendid to me as now, and by the help of God I am determined to win victory for my Master. I have been looking over my field here and am strangely impressed that my success in getting a strong hold on this community depends on my capturing for the Lord the most prominent man there is in this part of the city. The most widely-known man here, and the man of most influence, is Judge —, a distinguished lawyer of Cincinnati. Indeed, he is the most famous criminal lawyer in this part of the country. He has been so long in the law that he has acquired a reputation for being the greatest evidence to show that he has a thought of becoming a Christian. Yet I feel that I must win him, and do it at once. You may think I am foolish about this, and I am astonished at myself; but after all, God is as willing to save him as he is to save anyone else, and I believe he is as willing to help me secure this man's conversion as he was to help Paul and Silas with the jailer at Philippi. Anyhow, I am sure that if I can only get him to see the light, the whole community will be changed."

Recalled Stormy Times.

It was a great day for me when I received this letter. I felt that I had found the man who was the key to the city. I felt that I had found the man who was the key to the city. I felt that I had found the man who was the key to the city.

to the Lord Jesus Christ. He will make a public confession in the church, and he and his wife will at once unite with it. What a glorious day that will be for this community. My joy is beyond words. I never can believe anything too hard for God again."

Judge — became a power for good, and was influential on many a platform in giving his testimony for Christ. I am sure you will not be astonished, after this incident, to know that this heroic youth is one of the most successful evangelistic missionaries in China, where, in the populous Hing-hua district, the Rev. William N. Brewster has led literally hundreds of the natives to the foot of the Cross.

Countess Schimmellmann's Zeal.

Cheering reports of the excellent results accomplished by the Gospel labors of Countess Schimmellmann in the great North German cities, are received. Her work is already known to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. A recent letter says: "From out of vast audiences in socialistic halls, she has been the means of leading many a soul to Christ, the divine-human Brother. From mingling with the city poor has sprung another work to her hands, that of rescuing neglected street children. The Countess has a yacht with a number of poor boys on board in training for a more useful life than that of the streets. She does not ask help of men, but prays that God would send her, through them, the funds sufficient for this work."

"The Countess has this summer been holding evangelistic meetings in the neighborhood of Copenhagen. At Aalborg, two thousand assembled to hear her."

Armenian Aid.

SINCE Turkey's recent warning from the European Powers, no serious outbreaks have occurred in any part of the Sultan's dominions. Anatolia, the name by which the Porte designates Armenia, is quieting down, but there is still much suffering at many points, according to the reports received from missionaries. The principal scene of suffering is in and around Harpoot. During the week the seventh weekly remittance of $1,000 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund was forwarded through the A. B. C. F. M. for distribution by its missionaries in the field at the following points:

Harpoot	$500
Cesarea	$250
Orfa	$250

This, together with previous remittances, makes the grand total of relief disbursements to date $49,000.

In acknowledging the receipt of $1,000 from the Fund for feeding and sheltering the Armenian exiles at the Salvation Army Farm at Ramsey's, N. J., Commander Booth Tucker writes as follows:

NEW YORK, NOV. 15TH, 1896.

My dear Dr. Klopsch:

I need hardly say how deeply we appreciate the generous and prompt manner in which you have co-operated with us in regard to the Refugees. You did a great deal more than merely help them. Personally, the Consul and I cannot too warmly thank you for your wise counsels, for your cheerful sacrifice of time and effort at a busy season, and for the effort you threw both into the Carnegie meeting and into the landing of the refugees.

Very sincerely yours,
F. AND E. BOOTH-TUCKER.

Rev. W. W. Peet, treasurer of American Missions in Turkey writes from Constantinople as follows:

We are just now getting very large subscriptions from Germany. It has taken a good while to get Germany informed as to the situation, but the Christian people there are now thoroughly aroused. Two committees in Germany have undertaken to supply a part of the money required for Arabkir.

It is learned that Minister Terrill has obtained the consent of the Turkish government to the emigration of this country of a party of women and children, the families of Armenians who have already come to the United States and become naturalized citizens. Among other fugitives who arrived in New York last week, is Rev. Mr. Livonian, a native Armenian pastor of Bitlis, who narrowly escaped massacre. A private letter from Constantinople says:

Mrs. Abdalian, wife of Dr. N. Abdalian, is on her way with four fatherless children, to New York. During the troubles at Gurun, near Sivas, Dr. Abdalian was murdered, his house pillaged and burned. He was an ordained preacher, and a medical doctor, graduated and ordained at Hartford, Ct., being also a naturalized citizen of the U. S. A.

Secretary Olney of the State Department at Washington has been notified of the murder of this American subject in the Sultan's dominions.

In a letter addressed from the members of the W. C. T. U., for the establishment of a Refuge for Escaped Armenians, Mrs. Willard writes:

"We must hold ourselves in readiness to help the refugees who are constantly escaping from the dominion of the Turk. But we must not let this work cause us to cease sending help to the shelterless and starving who remain in that hapless country. We must give money to establish industrial homes and orphanages for the women and children, but it must be apparent to all that if we can help to find homes and work for the starving refugees, we have at the same time helped to set the Armenian people on their feet, and to put a new hope in their hearts for the future. Thousands are penniless to-day in Bulgaria, Alexandria, Marseilles and all along the border of that accursed Turkish Empire, which only the rapacity of the great Powers suffers to blot the map of a world that is brightening into peace and brotherhood. It is the purpose to establish a home for refugees at some strategic point, possibly in Bulgaria, which shall belong to the World's W. C. T. U., and shall testify to the loyalty and tenderness of our society toward those who most needed our help at a time when the heart of the world was stirred by their unutterable misery.

Already we have commissioned Mrs. Laura Armstrong Chant to go to Bulgaria and report the situation. It is quite likely that Lady Henry Somerset and her son will soon follow for the purpose of establishing the refuge, which will be but one of a line of refuges of which Lady Henry Somerset writes: "We must arrange all along the coasts in Russia, Armenia and in Bulgaria, touching as near Turkish territory as possible, places to which the flying Armenians can go, where they will find a sort of St. Bernard's (with the dogs) and where they can be warmed, clothed and sheltered, and then sent on to some of the larger colonies that are being established by the Duke of Westminster's Committee. Every-thing is shaping itself now, and it looks as if we are all getting organized at last throughout England."

The letter is signed by Frances E. Willard, Isabel Somerset, Agnes Slack, Anna Gordon, and Mary Sanderson, Gen'l Officers World's W. C. T. U.

Can't You Eat Breakfast?

Count that day lost whose lately risen necessary mineral substances. Wheat bread, on the other hand, contains insufficient protein or tissue forming material and only a trace of fat and mineral substance. Quaker Oats is rich in all the desired elements, which are so properly proportioned that the whole body is energized and built up by it. It is pre-eminently a health food, easily digested, delicious, and so exquisite to tempt the most fastidious and rebellious appetite. It is, withal, economical and easy to cook and has that natural nutty flavor. If you can't eat breakfast try Quaker Oats.

Requests for Prayer.

At the Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Nov. 22, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

For the Conversion Praying Sister, Ly- of Relatives and Friends. asks prayer for the conversion of an aged brother.—"Anxious Mother," Malden, Mass., that her son, who has a hard heart and a bad temper and a stubborn will, may receive a new heart from the Lord and become a child of God.—A. T., Chatham, N. J., that a brother-in-law and two cousins may give themselves to the Lord and devote their lives to his service.—Reader, Campbell, Va., for the conversion of father and mother and that they may have the spirit of Christ.—Anxious Mother, Long Beach, Calif., for the conversion of two sons, one of whom once made a profession of Christ, but has wandered into sin; also, that the other may have grace to overcome a passionate temper.—Reader, Jersey City, N. J., that a husband and father, once a church member, but now a wanderer from God, may be brought back, and made truly a child of God.—Sister in Christ, Hastings, Pa., for the conversion of a son and his wife and family, and a brother and sister and their families, all very dear and often prayed for, but all strangers to Christ.—Anxious Mother, St. Albans, Vt., for the conversion of a son for whom many prayers have been offered, who is being led astray by evil companions.—Believer, Millville, Pa., for the conversion of children who have not yet given their hearts to Christ; also that a neighbor, the father of a family, but the slave of drink, may be saved from his sins and become a follower of the Lord.—Anxious Mother, New Brunswick, N. J., for the conversion of her son, who has become addicted to strong drink, and that God would give him strength to overcome his propensity.—Anxious Mother, Julian, Pa., that her two sons might give their hearts to God, before they go out into the temptations of the world.—Anxious One, Ottawa, Ont., for the conversion of a father and three children who are far from God; also for some near and dear friends who do not know the Lord.

For the Restoration "Believer," Brims- of Health. wick, N. J., that God would give full resto- ration of health to one who has long been a sufferer.—J. A. S., Richmond, Va., that God would heal her, or give the sweet peace and assurance that will support her in her way through the dark valley of the shadow of death.—E. A. M., Gilliam, Mo., that her sick husband may be raised up and be able to resume his work.—C. O., Natchez, Miss., that father and mother, who are both sick, may be fully restored.—H. E. B., Continental, O., that a dear friend who has been stricken with paralysis, may be restored to health.—S. L. C., that a sick woman, who is suffering from a sprained hip, may receive healing and strength from the dear Lord.—"Believer," Christine, N. Dak., for the recovery of a dear friend who is prostrated with lung trouble.—"Anxious," Livermore, Ky., that her husband's hearing may be restored.—J. H. S., Iola, for the recovery of a dear sister who has a great sufferer for many months past; that a dear friend, who has no hope of re- y, might be healed by the Great Physi- —"Believer," Marietta, O., that a dear , who is sorely needed by her little chil- dren, may be raised from a bed of sickness and fully restored to health; also that a Chris- tian girl, the only child of her parents, might be cured of a distressing malady.—"One who Trusts" for the restoration to health of many are dependent for bread.—"Reader," Mankato, Kans., for the recovery of an in- valid sister.—A. H. C., Olin, Ia., a poor, help- less cripple who begs that prayer may be of- fered for him.

Ashland, Oreg., for the restoration to health and strength of a brother who has been stricken with paralysis.—"Praying Sister," Lyons- dale, N. Y., that she may be cured of a dis- tressing sickness which causes excruciating tion, may be comforted by the Lord, and may have the help they need.—"One who Trusts," Bethlehem, Pa., that he may obtain assurance of salvation, and that God will give him the financial help he needs in his pressing emer- gency.—X. Y. O., Viola, Va., that a young man in delicate health with a young wife, who is an invalid, may succeed in obtaining em- ployment that will permit of their removing to more salubrious quarters.—"Believer," Ari- zona, for help in the hard struggle to earn an honest livelihood, and that a situation with remunerative employment may soon be ob- tained.—"Subscriber," Joppa, Md., that an earnest seeker after salvation may soon re- ceive grace to believe.—"Troubled One," Vincent, O., who is in great distress, asks prayer that persons who owe money may soon pay their debts, so that the present pressure may be relieved.—O. B., Mobile, Ala., that the officers of an insurance company may be so influenced that they may fulfil their obli- gations, and so relieve a needy family.—"Be- liever," Pennsylvania, for guidance in difficul- ty, and that success may attend a persistent search for employment.—A. T., Chatham, N. J., that her husband may have a forgiving spirit, and that both husband and wife may live nearer to God.—"Believer," Tombigbee, Ala., for strength to give up the use of tobac- co.—J. D. M., Nashville, Tenn., that God would avert ruin from an aged couple who have been brought into difficulties through the treachery of false friends.

Many other requests for prayer were received and were duly presented at the Converts' Prayer Meeting, as were those on November 8 and 15, but we have not space this week to publish them in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

180,000 COPIES OF Demorest's Magazine.

THE increasing popularity of Demorest's Family Magazine, a popularity extending over thirty years, is ample proof that each succeeding year finds it improved in its vitality, beauty, and attractiveness. There must be something in a magazine that increases its subscription list from 80,000 to 180,000 names (a clear gain of 100,000) in less than a year. Don't you think so?

♦ ♦ ♦ Read This ♦ ♦ ♦

"Demorest's Magazine is a literary conservator of the artistic and the useful. Got up in America, where it has enormous sales, it is the most remarkable work of the class that has ever been published and combines the attractions of several English magazines." London Times.

"We have received a number of this delightful Magazine, and we find ourselves bound to reiterate with great emphasis the high encomiums we have already pronounced on preceding numbers. We are not given to disparage the literary and artistic publications which emanate from the London press, but we are bound in simple fairness, to assert that we have not yet met with any publication pretending to a similar scope and purpose which can at all compare with this marvelous shilling's worth." London Budget.

"The London Budget says: 'There are none of our monthlies in which the beautiful and the useful, pleasure and profit, fashion and literature, are so fully presented as in Demorest's.'" the case in Paris and London. In the recent Lord Mayor's annual parade in the English capital, an old-fashioned, gilt "Lord Mayor's coach," drawn by six prancing steeds, was followed by a modern vehicle, propelled by a motor. Electrical cabs (like that shown in our illustration) are likely to become plentiful in London, and the London Electrical Cab Company, with large capital, is about to place a large number in public service. It is claimed that the new style of vehicle can be run at much less cost than the old (about $1.30), and that the risk of accident is reduced one-half.

"The Beggars' Church" of Agra.
A NUMBER of years ago, Dr. Colin S. Valentine, an Englishman, settled in Agra, India, as Superintendent of a Training Institute there. So many of the very poorest class came to the service every Sunday morning to hear the Gospel and receive alms, that after a time an hour was set apart for them, and was called "the Beggars' Hour." Between seven and eight years ago they were formed into a church, the number in attendance varying, being sometimes as high as four hundred, though the average each Sabbath is about one hundred and sixty. It is a motley gathering of men, women, and children, embracing the maimed, and the halt, and the blind, and the leprosy. One woman, who had never been able to walk, having, it is believed, been born a cripple, is in the habit of coming every Sabbath morning from Secundra, four miles off, the entire distance being completed on her hands and knees.

The lepers especially present a very miserable and in some cases even a sickening appearance. Many of these beggars have no regular place to live in. During the hot season they lie about the corners of the streets, on the ground, and during the rainy and cold season under any shelter they can get. The gnawing of hunger is with them a daily and painful experience. No one could desire a more attentive audience. They are well instructed, and are addressed by the native students in rotation. Dr. Valentine taking part in the exercises.

Cost of Public Schools.

The Teacher, in an interesting article on our public school system, furnishes some instructive statistics. The number of pupils in the public schools of our four largest cities last year were as follows: New York, 227,932; Chicago, 185,558; Philadelphia, 125,180; Boston, 74,328. School expenditures for these cities in the order named were respectively: $5,635,353; $6,466,995; $3,461,183; $2,290,967. The cost per child was: New York, $24.71; Chicago, $34.88; Philadelphia, $27.65; Boston, $30.82. New York had 196 school days in the year, Chicago 187, while Boston and Philadelphia each had 200.

A SUPERB REFERENCE LIBRARY

covering the entire range of human knowledge, invention and discovery up to the present day, including the Arts, Sciences, History, Biography, Philosophy, Astronomy, Meteorology, Geography, Navigation, Geology, Exploration, Botany, Agriculture, Commerce, Finance, Zoology, Ethnology, Physiology, Chemistry, Electricity, Law, Medicine, Theology, Statistics, etc.

JUST OFF THE PRESS!

The new American Standard Encyclopedia is brought right down to the date of its issue, and contains hundreds of articles on subjects on which all the older reference works are necessarily silent. It is also a superior Pronouncing Dictionary, giving all words in general use, carefully defined. It contains a Biographical Dictionary, a Gazetteer of the World, a Glossary of Technical Terms, late Census Reports, an Atlas of the whole globe, and a rich storehouse of general, practical, up-to-date information—scientific, historical, military, social and civil—all arranged and classified in convenient form for ready reference.

UNTIL Dec. 31 ONE DOLLAR

Secures immediate possession of this Superb library. Balance payable $1.00 monthly for 6 months,—about 3 cents a day. Total Only $7.00.

IT IS THE VERY LATEST OF ALL REFERENCE WORKS. These are some of the five topics that are treated with 1896 accuracy and freshness, viz: Argon, X-rays, Atlanta Exposition, Li Tung Chang, Nansen's and Perry's Arctic Explorations, Horseless Carriage, Air Ships, Color Photography, Free Silver, Electrical Science, Acetylene, Prof. Roentgen, Skiagraphy, etc. On these and other important topics of to-day the older books say nothing or are years behind the age. This great new work is an absolute necessity to all who want to keep abreast of the times.

IT IS MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED THROUGHOUT with beautiful colored maps of every country on the globe, superb charts bearing upon anatomy, mineralogy, entomology, zoology, fossils, electrical science, ordnance, etc., besides the countless wood-cut engravings that graphically illustrate the thousands of subjects.

OUR GREAT SPECIAL OFFER FOR INTRODUCTION

As a means of quickly introducing and popularizing this peerless home reference library, we have decided to distribute a few advance sets in each community, regardless of cost and purely as an advertising project. We know that every set so placed will prove an advertisement of the greatest power, and lead to hundreds of additional paying purchasers. Comparison with any and all other reference works will quickly demonstrate the immeasurable superiority of our grand new work. This distribution will occur during December only. On January 1 prices will be advanced to regular rates—$19.00 to $31.00 a set. We reserve the right to withdraw this offer at any time without notice, in which case money will be returned without cost to sender.

HOW TO ORDER: Send $1.00 to American Newspaper syndicate (address below) and the entire set will be forwarded. Subsequent payments to be made as follows: On cloth style, $1.00 a month for 6 months; on Half-Russia style, $1.00 a month for 8 months. When ordering be sure to state style of binding wanted, we recommend the Half-Russia with full shipping directions. All transportation charges to be paid by purchaser. Books guaranteed as represented or first payment refunded if set is returned within ten days. We refer to any newspaper or bank in Philadelphia.

SPECIAL TO CASH BUYERS: If cash in full be sent with order, prices will be $5.00 for cloth style, $7.00 for Half-Russia until Dec 21 only. Book of Specimen Pages mailed free upon request.

CAUTION! We are the sole publishers of the new American Standard Encyclopedia, and assume no responsibility for any orders except those sent directly to us. Beware of inferior imitations advertised at higher prices. See that our name, and no other, is at the bottom of each title page.

Soldiers of the Lord.

A New Organization on Military Lines for Evangelistic Work.

APPPLY there is no patent or copyright in Christian service. The supreme aim of the follower of Christ is to win souls for his Master. If he has discovered a method by which unsaved men and women may be reached and drawn into the Gospel fold, he is glad to have it adopted by other workers, and rejoices if they are helped by it in their labors. The Salvation Army and the American Volunteers will therefore have a cordial welcome for a new organization of their own type which has recently come into the field. It has been organized in connection with the Protestant Episcopal Church and is called the United States Church Army. Like the Salvation Army, its mission is to reach outsiders who never attend church, and on whom existing church agencies exert no influence. It takes up the mission of the King, who directed his servants to go on the streets and lanes of the city and urge all whom they saw to come to the feast. How large a number of persons there are who are never found within the walls of the house of God and who never hear the Gospel message from the pulpit, every Christian worker knows. To these the officers and soldiers of the Church Army will go, bearing the invitation of Christ, delivering it wherever it may find them, whether in the street, the saloon, the gambling-house, or the resorts of vice. It has already been tentatively at work in various districts of the country for a year past, and has been so successful that the Parochial Mission Committee of the Church has formally accepted charge of the movement; and has appointed a commission of four clergymen who will have absolute control of its management. The members of the commission are Rev. E. A. Bradley, D. D., Rector of St. Agnes' Church, New York; Rev. E. Walpole Warren, of St. James', New York; Rev. W. D. Bodine, D. D., of Philadelphia, and Rev. J. Newton Perkins, of the Church of the Reconciliation, New York. General Secretary. The officers of the Army Staff are Col. H. H. Hadley, Major Samuel F. Jones, Superintendent St. Stephen's Rescue Mission of Boston; Major Sarah Wray, the song evangelist, aide-de-camp, and as chief adjutant, Major James K. Bakewell, Superintendent of the Brotherhood Rescue Mission, Pittsburg, Pa.

As in the Salvation Army, the organization is of military type and nomenclature. Officers of the staff will wear a uniform of black frock coat with gold braid and shoulder-straps denoting rank of wearers; a brown slouch hat, and a blue cloth vest of severe cut, ornamented with monogram of the Army. A thin stripe of gold will decorate the trousers. A blue gown, with shoulder straps similar to that of the men, and an alpine hat, forms the not unpleasant costume in which the women will appear.

Each post is to be connected with some church, and any rector desiring army operations in his parish can secure the organization of a post by applying to headquarters, 423 Lexington avenue, New York. Each post is expected to be entirely self-supporting, and to contribute one-tenth of its gross receipts to the cost of the work at headquarters, where a training institution for the education of recruits in Army methods will be maintained. No attempt is to be made to establish a new church or chapel in any field, but the converts of the Army will be placed under the charge of the rector of the church to which the post is attached. Martial music, street-preaching, personal influence and appeal will be the main features of the Army's methods, and care will be taken that there shall be nothing grotesque or undignified in services, dress, or procedure.

It is intended to send a captain and first lieutenant to any Protestant Episcopal Church, whose rector applies to Army headquarters for the organization of a post in connection with his church. These two officers will receive a salary. The post will then be made up of volunteers under their command. It will then labor to bring outsiders into the church. In this it differs from the Salvation Army, whose converts often remain with the Army in preference to making a church-connection.

GOLD WOMEN.

Who can form the greatest number of words from the letters in INDUSTRIOUS? You can make twenty or more words, we feel sure, and if you do you will receive a good reward. Do not use any letter more times than it appears in the word. Use no language except English. Words spelled alike, but with different meaning, can be used but once. Use any dictionary. Plurals, pronouns, nouns, verbs, adverbs, prefixes, suffixes, adjectives, proper nouns allowed. Anything that is a legitimate word will be allowed. Work it out in this manner: In, into, i'ustrious, no, not, nut, nuts, dust, dusts, us, sit, sits, etc. Use these words in your list. The publisher of WOMAN'S WORLD and JENNIES MILLER MONTHLY will pay $20.00 in gold to the person able to make the largest list of words from the letters in the word INDUSTRIOUS: $12.00 for the second largest; $10.00 for the third; $8.00 for the fourth, $5.00 for the ten next largest, and $2.00 each for the twenty-five next largest lists. The above rewards are given free and without consideration for the purpose of attracting attention to our handsome woman's magazine, twenty-four pages, ninety-six long columns, finely illustrated, and all original matter, long and short stories by the best authors; price $1 per year. It is necessary for you to enter the contest, to send 12 two-cent stamps for a three-months' trial subscription with your list of words, and every person sending the 24 cents and a list of twenty words or more is guaranteed an extra present by return mail in addition to the magazine, of a large 200-page book, "Dorris' Fortune," by Florence Warden, a love story of intense interest. Satisfaction guaranteed in every case or your money refunded. Lists should be sent at once, and not later than Jan. 20. The names and addresses of successful contestants will be printed in the February issue, published in January. Our publication has been established nine years. CANCER

Its Scientific Treatment and Cure.

Drs. McLeish & Weber, of Cincinnati, O., have made the treatment of Cancer and Tumors a specialty for many years, using no knife or other severe measures. As an evidence of their success they cite the names of a few well known persons who have been cured by them.

Mr. T. E. C. Brinly, Louisville, Ky., President of the Brinly, Miles & Hardy Co., manufacturers of the famous "Brinly Plows," was cured ten years ago cancer of the mouth. Had been operated upon three times before going to them.

Prof. H. McDiarmid, formerly editor Christian Standard, Cincinnati, now Pres. Bethany College, Bethany, W. Va., was cured four years ago of cancer of the face. Before their treatment was applied, the diseased part had been cut out twice, each time recurring in about six months.

Judge R. J. Bowman, of Alexandria, La., was cured of cancer of the right cheek and forehead three years ago. A line addressed to Drs. McLeish & Weber, 419 John St., Cincinnati, O., will secure a 48-page treatise free.

The Philafrican League's Progress.

THIS new organization is rapidly approaching the stage when its humanitarian work for the relief of African slaves can be safely inaugurated in the heart of the Dark Continent. At an important meeting held lately in the parlors of the Young Men's Christian Association, New York, the organization of the League was completed and a definite programme of work decided on. After listening to an interesting report by Mr. Chatelain, and to brief remarks by the chairman, Rev. L. T. Chamberlain, D.D., on the plan of work and the present state of the League, the meeting proceeded to the election of additional directors and to the approval of various suggestions submitted by the chairman. Among the new Directors, most of whom had already signified their willingness to serve, are President Daniel C. Gilman of John Hopkins University, Mrs. Frederick Douglass, Dr. Albert Shaw, Editor of the Review of Reviews, Herbert Welsh of Philadelphia, Hon. Robert Treat Paine of Boston, Hon. Thos. B. Bryan of Chicago, Booker T. Washington of Alabama, Dr. C. E. Welsh, U. S. Senator John T. Morgan, and General A. L. Chetlain. At the meeting of the Board of Directors which followed, the Executive Committee of seven, provided by the constitution, was finally appointed; as were also several Vice-Presidents. Honorary Secretaries, members of the International Council and Corresponding Members. The Executive Committee is composed of Revs. Drs. Josiah Strong, L. T. Chamberlain, W. W. Atterbury, J. H. Edwards, Dr. Louis Klopsch, Wm. Jay Schieffelin and Arthur D. Chambers. This committee was instructed to organize all business arrangements; to appoint workers for Africa; to negotiate with the Colonial governments; to co-operate with the European Liberators' Leagues; to incorporate the League; to fill vacancies and to attend to all other matters requiring prompt action. After all the appointments were made, decisive steps were taken toward raising the $10,000 needed for Free Settlement No. 1. It would certainly be a very easy task for the Christian cities of New York, Philadelphia, Boston and Chicago to provide each $10,000 for the founding, within a year, of four cities of refuge and strongholds of Christianity on the high and healthy tableland between Angola and Lake Nyassa.

The first local League was organized two weeks ago at Atlanta, Ga., after a speech by Prof. J. W. E. Bowen and a forcible presentation of the claims of African slaves on our practical sympathy, by President W. P. Thirkield of Gammon Theological Seminary.

Persons desiring to become members of the League or to obtain further information should apply to Mr. Heli Chatelain, 511 United Charities Building, N. Y.

The Famine in India.

A generous rain in several of the drought-smitten districts of India, is reported by cable. This will help matters. The famine is believed to be felt in the Telegu districts (generally called the "Ceded districts," on account of their having been ceded to the British by the Nizam of Hyderabad), lying between Madras, Mysore and the Nizam's dominions. The London Missionary Society are the most active of importance in the districts; the famine relief committee is working in the Ceded districts.

LAST WORDS.

CALL me not back, with loving words and tender;
Thou lov'st me well, but Jesus loves me more.
Bid me farewell, and let me now surrender
My life, my all, to Him whom I adore.

Alas, how soon, must earthly ties be broken!
We part, e'er dies the sunlight in the west.
Oh, may I hear, those blessed words once spoken,
"Come unto me, and I will give you rest."

The glorious light, that shineth from His presence, Reflected down, has found a home in thee.
To cheer and comfort, by thy love intense,
This poor weak heart, that soon shall cease to be.

The chords of love are hard to break asunder.
We part with tears, to meet in realms of light,
Where we shall see, with love, and joy, and wonder,
Our blessed Lord, and all his angels bright.

O joy divine! O rapture past expressing!
How poor our sorrows then shall seem—how small;
We live, surrounded by divinest blessing,
And Christ himself shall be our All in All.

—M. A. B.

An Accomplished Empress.

FOR those who believe that it is difficult for a woman, having many social demands upon her time, to accomplish anything of value in life, this account of the social, intellectual and philanthropic activity of ex-Empress Frederick will be found interesting: In conversation it is difficult to broach any subject, no matter what it is, that she has not mastered.

Her close acquaintance with mediæval renaissance and modern schools of painting, and with all forms and works of art and industry, is unsurpassed even by those men who have devoted their lives to these studies. The writer has, on one and the same evening, heard the Ex-Empress her converse on Venetian art with Ludvic Passini, proving herself his equal in knowledge of Venice, past and present; talking with a distinguished physician, who was astounded by the theoretical knowledge which she displayed of the throat and breathing organs, declaring that if she had but practical experience she would have been the finest throat doctor in the world; and discussing literature with a celebrated Englishman of letters, chiding him upon his admitted inability to cap a passage which she quoted. Her skill with the brush is far beyond that of a mere amateur, while her sculptures surpass anything of the kind usually attempted by a woman, no matter how skilled in the art.

The subject which naturally stimulates her most artistic effort is a portrait of her fondly-loved husband. On one occasion she had given a commission to a very celebrated German sculptor for a colossal statue of the Emperor Frederick. One day she called at his studio while he was at work on the clay model of the bust. She pointed out to him some features in which he had not caught the likeness. When verbal explanations did not adequately convey her meaning she asked permission to model herself, set to work, and in half an hour, with a touch here and there modeled the features to such a degree that the sculptor was astounded by the striking likeness. The model has since been put into marble, and is universally considered to be the best portrait extant of Emperor Frederick.

Strange New Shrub that Cures Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc. Free.

We have previously described the new botanic discovery, Alkavis, which proves a specific cure for diseases caused by Uræ acid in the blood, or disorder of the Kidneys or urinary organs. It is now stated that Alkavis is a product of the well known Kava-Kava Shrub, and is a specific cure for these diseases just as quinine is for malaria.

Dr. R. C. Wood, of Lowell, Ind., writes that in four weeks Alkavis cured him of Kidney and bladder disease of ten year's standing, and Rev. Thomas M. Owen, of West Pawlet, Vt., gives similar testimony. Many ladies also testify to its wonderful curative powers in disorders peculiar to womanhood. The only importers of Alkavis so far are the Church Kidney Cure Co., of 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all Sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. It is sent to you entirely free, to prove its wonderful curative power.

This is positively the last chance you will ever have to secure the work on such extremely liberal terms. We fully intended to advance the price to regular rates on Nov. 30, but thousands of people in all walks of life have requested an extension of time until Christmas. After careful consideration we have decided to continue our Special Offer until Dec. 24. This is done simply and only as a further means of advertising this wonderful storehouse of information. We do not expect to make money by this offer as the very low price on such liberal terms barely pays for paper, printing and binding, saying nothing of the enormous investment of over $750,000 required in the production of the work. The tremendous amount of talk created will help to advertise this most modern and entirely up-to-date home reference library. No advertisement can do it justice—it is its own most eloquent advocate.

5 CENTS A DAY
BUYS IT.

FOR A CHRISTMAS GIFT NOTHING COULD BE BETTER.

Your pastor, teacher, friend, parents, or your children will appreciate this great work beyond expression. It will last a life-time and always give satisfaction. No business or professional man, teacher, student, mechanic, housewife, or any other person who wishes to keep abreast of the times, or who is interested in the laudable enterprise of self-education, can allow this rare opportunity to pass without careful investigation. The new and entirely up-to-the-times

WHAT THIS GREAT WORK IS.

IT IS THE ONLY REFERENCE WORK ON EARTH that contains satisfactory and up-to-date encyclopædic treatment of such important topics of to-day as the following: Battleship, bimetalism, money, wages, germ theory, Arctic explorations, tariff, Christian Endeavor, appendicitis, shadow-photography, electrocution, steam navigation, and hundreds of others.

IT IS THE LATEST AND BEST DICTIONARY of our language. Each legitimate English word is exhaustively treated as to its origin, history, development, spelling, pronunciation, and various meanings.

IT IS A CONCISE ENCYCLOPÆDIA of anatomy, botany, chemistry, zoology, geology, art, music, physics, philosophy, mathematics, mechanics, theology, biblical research, etc. 50,000 separate encyclopædic subjects, including the latest inventions and discoveries, tersely treated by educators of vast renown.

IT IS A SUPERB LIBRARY BOOK, printed on high grade white paper from plates never before on press, durably bound, and containing the most superb illustrations, in 17 colors and in monotone, ever made for any reference work.

IT IS BETTER THAN ALL OTHER DICTIONARIES because it is the latest and most complete, containing nearly twice as many words as are in the largest "unabridged," and treating 20,000 more encyclopædic subjects than are covered by other cyclopædias costing from $50 to $200. There is no other publication in its class.

WHO SAYS SO:

Rev. Dr. Chas. H. Parkhurst, "The Encyclopædic Dictionary is a library condensed into four volumes; a ton of diffusiveness reduced to forty pounds of quintessence, and, withal, as delicate in detail as it is comprehensive in contents."

"The Churchman," New York,—"This dictionary is as up-to-date as one could be made. Its topics are treated with a fulness and minuteness which enables it to take the place of any encyclopedia."

"Scientific American," New York,—"It forms in itself a library for the busy man of affairs, the mechanic ambitious to advance himself in his line, or the student or apprentice just making a beginning."

From Ex-Judge Noah Davis, J.L.D.,—"It has no superior in any of the qualities that make up a good dictionary. To these qualities it adds a fund of encyclopædic knowledge which I have never before seen in such a work. I give it my hearty commendation."

CAUTION!

Beware of unscrupulous imitators masquerading under high-sounding names, who have copied our advertising methods—even to the wording—with the self-evident purpose of deceiving our customers. Spurious works are offered under a similar title. Old editions, years out of date and therefore incomplete, are advertised as "damaged," ancient encyclopædias, slightly revamped, are brazenly put forth under alluring new titles as new and original works; small and inferior old books are bound up in from three to eight volumes of microscopic size and heralded as "libraries." Do not be deceived by any of these! Remember, the genuine Encyclopædic Dictionary is complete in four large volumes of 5,359 pages. We can assume no responsibility for any orders except those sent directly to us.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

Royalty in Disguise.

Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., { "Why feignest thou thyself to be on the Text 1. Kings 14: 6: . . . { another?"

planned the arson, the murder, the theft, the fraud, go free, while those who were decoyed and cheated and hoodwinked into the conspiracy, clank the chain and mount the gallows. Aaron Burr, with heart filled with impurity and ambition, plots for the overthrow of the United States Government and gets off with a few threats and a little censure, while Blennerhassett, the learned Blennerhassett, the sweet-tempered Blennerhassett, is decoyed by him from the orchards, and the laboratories, and the gardens, and the home on the bank of the Ohio River, and his fortunes are scattered, and he is thrown into prison, and his family, brought up in luxury, is turned out to die. Abominable Aaron Burr has it comparatively easy; sweet-tempered Blennerhassett has it hard. Benedict Arnold proposed to sell out the forts of the United States; to surrender the Revolutionary Army and to destroy the United States Government. He gets off with his pockets full of pounds sterling, while Major Andre, the brave and the brilliant, is decoyed into the conspiracy, and suffers on the gibbet on the banks of the Hudson; so that even the tablature—the marble tablature that commemorated that event has been blasted by midnight desperadoes. Benedict Arnold has it easy; Major Andre has it hard. I have noticed that nine tenths of those who suffer for crimes are merely the satellites of some great villains. Ignominious fraud is a juggler which by sleight-of-hand and legerdemain makes the gold that it stole appear in somebody else's pocket. Jeroboam plots the lie, contrives the imposition, and gets his wife to execute it. Stand off from all imposition and chicanery. Do not consent to be anybody's dupe, anybody's ally in wickedness, anybody's scapegoat.

The story of the text also impresses me with the fact that royalty sometimes passes in disguise. The frock, the veil, the hood of the peasant woman hid the queenly character of this woman of Tirzah. Nobody suspected that she was a queen or a princess as she passed by, but she was just as much a queen as though she stood in the palace, her robes incrustured with diamonds. And so all around about us there are princesses and queens whom the world does not recognize. They sit on no throne of royalty, they ride in no chariot, they elicit no huzza, they make no pretense, but by the grace of God they are princesses and they are queens. Sometimes in their poverty, sometimes in their self-denial, sometimes in their hard struggle of Christian service—God knows they are queens; the world does not recognize them. Royalty passing in disguise. Kings without the crown, conquerors without the palm, empresses without the jewel. You saw her yesterday on the street. You saw nothing important in her appearance, but she is regnant over a vast realm of virtue and goodness—a realm vaster than Jeroboam ever looked at. You saw her, after the time of affliction and want and suffering. You saw the story of trial written on the wasted hand of the mother, on the pale cheeks of the children, on the empty bread-tray, on the broken kettle, on the broken chair. You would not have given a dollar for all the furniture in the house. But her command, God bless it, is a law. Let the members of the palace come there and discuss the case and say, "It's pauper." They do not realize that God has burnished for her a crown, and that after she has got through the fatiguing journey from Tirzah to Shiloh and from Shiloh back to Tirzah, there will be a throne of royalty on which she shall rest forever. Glory veiled. Affluence hidden. Eternal raptures hushed up. A queen in mask. A princess in disguise.

When you think of a queen you do not think of Catharine of Russia, or Maria Theresa of Germany, or Mary Queen of Scots. When you think of a queen you think of a plain woman who sat opposite your father at the table, or walked with him down the path of life arm-in-arm—sometimes to the Thanksgiving banquet, sometimes to the grave, but always side by side, soothing your little sorrows and adjusting your little quarrels, listening to your evening prayer, toiling with the needle or at the spinning-wheel, and on cold nights tucking you up snug and warm. And then on that dark day when she lay a-dying, putting those thin hands that had toiled for you so long, putting them together in a dying prayer commending you to that God in whom she had taught you to trust. Oh, she was the queen—she was the queen! You cannot think of her now without having the deepest emotions of your soul stirred, and you feel as if you could cry as though you were now sitting in infancy on her lap, and if you call her back to speak your name with the tenderness with which she once spoke, you would be willing now to throw yourself on the sod that covers her grave, crying, "Mother, mother!" Ah! she was the queen. Your father knew it. You knew it. She was the queen, but the queen in disguise. The world did not recognize it.

But there was a grander disguising. The favorite of a great house looked out of the window of his palace and he saw that the people were carrying heavy burdens, and that some of them were hobbling on crutches, and he saw some lying at the gate exhibiting their sores, and then he heard their lamentation, and he said: "I will just put on the clothes of those poor people, and I will go down and see what their sorrows are, and I will sympathize with them, and I will sympathize with them, and I will be one of them, and I will help them." Well, the day came for him to start. The lords of the land came to see him off. All who could sing joined in the parting song, which shook the hills and woke up the shepherds. The first few nights he has been sleeping with the hostlers and the camel-drivers, for no one knew there was a King in town. He went among the doctors of the law, astounding them; for without any doctor's gown, he knew more law than the doctors. He fished with the fishermen. He smote with his own hammer in the carpenter's shop. He ate raw corn out of the field. He fried fish on the banks of Gennesaret. He was howled at by crazy people in the tombs. He was splashed of the surf of the sea. A pilgrim without any pillow. A sick man without any medicament. A mourner with no sympathetic bosom in which he could pour his tears. Disguise complete. I know that occasionally his divine royalty flashed out, as when in the storm on Galilee, as in the red wine at the wedding banquet, as when he freed the shackled demoniac of Gadara, as when he turned a whole school of fish into the net of the discouraged boatmen, as when he throbbed life into the shriveled arm of the paralytic; but for the most part he was in disguise. No one saw the King's jewels in his sandal. No one saw the royal robe in his plain coat. No one knew that that shelterless Christ owned all the mansions in which the hierarchs of heaven had their habitation. None knew that that hungered Christ owned all the olive groves, and all the harvests which shook their gold on the hills of Palestine. No one knew that he who said "I thirst" poured the Euphrates out of his own chalice. No one knew that the ocean lay in the palm of his hand like a dewdrop in the vase of a lily.

No one knew that the stars, and moons, and suns, and galaxies, and constellations that marched on age after age, were, as compared with his lifetime, the sparkle of a firefly on a summer night. No one knew that the sun in mid-heaven was only the shadow of his throne. No one knew that his crown of universal dominion was covered up with a bunch of thorns. Omnipotence sheathed in a human body. Omniscience hidden in a human eye. Infinite love beating in a human heart. Everlasting harmonies subdued into a human voice. Royalty en masque. Grandeurs of heaven in earthly disguise.

My subject also impresses me with how people put on masks, and how the Lord tears them off. It was a terrible moment in the history of this woman of Tirzah when the prophet accosted her, practically saying: "I know who you are; you cannot cheat me; you cannot impose upon me; why feignest thou thyself to be another?" She had a right to ask for the restoration of her son; she had a right to practice that falsehood. It is never right to do wrong. Sometimes you may be able to conceal an affair; it is not necessary to tell everything. There is a natural pressure to the lips which seems to indicate that silence sometimes is right; but, for double dealing, for moral shuffling, for counterfeit, and for sham, God has nothing but anathema and exposure. He will tear off the lie. He will rip up the empiricism. He will scatter the ambushade. There are people who are just ready to be duped. They seem to be waiting to be deceived. They believe in ghosts; they saw one themselves once. They heard something strange in an uninhabited house. Going along the road one night, something approached them in white and crossed the road. They would think it very disastrous to count the number of carriages at a funeral. They heard in a neighbor's house something that portended death in the family. They say it is a sure sign of evil if a bat fly into the room on a summer night, or they see the moon over the left shoulder. They would not for the world undertake any enterprise on Friday, forgetful of the fact that if they look over the calendar of the world they will see that Friday has been the most fortunate day in all the history of the world.

As near as I can tell, looking over the calendar of the world's history, more grand, bright, beautiful things have happened on Friday than any other day of the week. They would not begin anything on Friday. They would not for the world go back to the house for anything after they had once started. Such people are ready to be duped. Ignorance comes along, perhaps in the disguise of medical science, and carries them captive: for there are always some men who have found some strange and mysterious weed in some strange place, and plucked it in the moonshine, and then they cover the board fences with the advertisements of "elixir," and "panaceas," and "Indian mixtures," and "ineffable cataplasms," and "unfailing disinfectants," and "lightning salves," and "instantaneous ointments," enough to stun and scarify and poultice and kill half the race. They are all ready to be wrought upon by such impositions. Ah! my friends, do not be among such dupes. Do not act the part of such persons as I have been describing. Stand back from all chicanery, from all imposition. They who practice such imposition shall be exposed in the day of God's indignation. They may rear great fortunes, but their dapple grays will be arrested on the road some day, as was the ass by the angel of God with drawn sword. The light of the last day will shine through all such subterfuges, and with a voice louder than that which accosted this imposition of the text: "Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam: why feignest thou thyself to be another?"—with a voice louder than that. God will thunder down into midnight darkness and doom and death all two-faced men, and all charlatans, and all knaves, and all jockeys.

and all swindlers. Behold how the people put on the masks, and behold how the Lord tears them off!

My subject also impresses me with how precise and accurate and particular are God's providences. Just at the moment that woman entered the city, the child died. Just as it was prophesied, so it turned out, so it always turns out. The event occurs, the death takes place, the nation is born, the despotism is overthrown at the appointed time. God drives the universe with a stiff rein. Events do not just happen so. Things do not go slipshod. In all the book of God's providences there is not one "if." God's providences are never caught in dishabille. To God there are no surprises, no disappointments and no accidents. The most insignificant event flung out in the ages is the connecting link between two great chains—the chain of eternity past and the chain of eternity to come. I am no fatalist, but I should be completely wrtched if I did not feel that all the affairs of my life are in God's hand, and all that pertains to me and mine, just as certainly as all the affairs of this woman of the text, as this child of the text, as this king of the text, were in God's hand. You may ask me a hundred questions I cannot answer, but I shall until the day of my death believe that I am under the unerring care of God; and the heavens may fall, and the world may burn, and the judgment may thunder, and eternal ages may roll, but not a hair shall fall from my head, not a shadow shall drop on my path, not a sorrow shall transfix my heart without being divinely arranged—arranged by a loving, sympathetic Father. He bottles our tears, he catches our sorrows, and to the orphan he will be a Father, and to the widow he will be a husband, and to the outcast he will be a home, and to the most miserable wretch that this day crawls up out of the ditch of his abomination crying for mercy, he will be an all-pardoning God. The rocks shall turn gray with age, and the forests shall be unmoored in the last hurricane, and the sun shall shut its fiery eyelid, and the stars shall drop like blasted figs, and the continents shall go down like anchors in the deep, and the ocean shall heave its last groan and lash itself with expiring agony, and the world shall wrap itself in a winding sheet of flame and leap on the funeral pyre of the judgment day; but God's love shall not die. It will kindle its suns after all other lights have gone out. It will be a billowy sea after the last ocean has wept itself away. It will warm itself by the fire of a consuming world. It will sing while the archangel's trumpet is pealing forth and the air is filled with the crash of broken sepulchres and the rush of the wings of the rising dead. Oh, may God comfort all this people with this Christian sentiment.

Wayfarers' Christmas Dinner.

At the Thanksgiving dinner given at the Bowery Mission a year ago, Mrs. Sarah J. Bird gave a written verse of Scripture to every one present, at the same time making a promise to give a dinner to those who would keep them, and repeat from memory the verse a year from that date. A number of these verses were handed in at the recent Thanksgiving dinner, when fifteen sat down to eat the promised meal in the Mission room. Superintendent Mershon intends to keep the doors of the Mission open on Christmas, all day, and to feed any hungry men who apply. Any reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD wishing to help cheer these wayfarers may do so by sending whatever they can to the Mission, at 105 Bowery. Gifts of turkeys, chickens, hams, beef, butter, potatoes, apples, &c., should be sent by express, charges prepaid.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

Soul-Winning in Little Italy.

One Woman Missionary's Experience among the Italian Tenements — A Deserving Christian Work in New York.

IT is not generally known that more than one twentieth of the dwellers in New York City to-day are Italians and that this number is constantly on the increase, adding what is rapidly becoming an exceedingly important element in the social and political life of the great metropolis. These sons of toil have come to our shores, weary of oppressions in their own land, and though nominally Roman Catholics, with a dislike of kings and of priestcraft, and a willing ear for anyone who will offer them better social conditions. Therefore it is a vital question for serious minds whether they shall be met, on the threshold of this country, with the overtures of the anarchist or with the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Anarchy has its agents everywhere. The street corner is its kindergarten and the saloon its high school; while the Church has provided simply five or six struggling missions for the 100,000 Italians, with a membership of little more than 1,000 in all, the obtaining of Sunday School teachers and workers being almost an impossibility. The pastors and missionaries themselves are Italians who, for the most part, have come here to look after their countrymen.

The only American entirely devoted to this special field is Miss Anna C. Ruddy, who, as was noticed in these pages a few months ago, has charge of the Little Italy Christian Mission which for the present is holding its services in the Lexington Avenue Baptist Church. She has studied their language and for seven years has gone in and out among them as one of themselves. As a result of her work she has seen mission churches and institutions spring up and prosper, and the Gospel has been preached to thousands in the street meetings alone. That many of these foreigners would accept Christ if they were only spoken to, is apparent from the testimony of an old man who spoke in an Italian mission one evening. He said:

"Last summer, I was walking down a country road one Sunday, lonely and miserable, and passing by a church. I heard the voice of singing, so I ventured in. I understood nothing that was said, but the people were so kind: they took me by the hand and talked to me. I only understood one thing, and that was the word 'Jesus.' Then somebody gave me an Italian Testament. I studied it, and I went again and again to that church, and at last I learned to know Jesus Christ, and now he fills my soul with joy. But it is late! So late! I am over seventy years of age and I never knew it till now."

Miss Ruddy has great faith that thousands of these people are to be saved, especially from the ranks of the children. It is this confidence that has made it possible for her to go on, in the face of many obstacles, receiving no salary, for weeks and months at a time living on very little food, preaching the Gospel on the streets in the heat of summer and the cold of winter, with no companions but the converted Italians. These Italian women, with their stolid faces, are wonderfully faithful. Scarcely does one of them ever swell the ranks of the fallen in the streets of New York. Miss Ruddy has taught them in their homes and has found in them ready listeners to the Gospel message.

She visited a sick child every day for weeks, and at last left it safe in the beautiful children's ward of the New York Hospital. She returned to the wretched home to tell the parents about the little one. Neighbors and friends gathered to listen, and to see the lady who had been so kind to one of their number. After a whispered consultation with her husband, the mother said:

"Signorina, my husband, wants to give you some money for what you have done for our little Felice."

Miss Ruddy thanked her, saying, "Oh, no; I did not come to you for money. I am only too glad to have helped you in your trouble."

"Well, then, if you did not do it for money, please tell us why you did it? Everybody has been talking about you and wondering why you have been coming to us."

Glad that at last the opportunity had come, the missionary began to tell them the story of Jesus. They listened with breathless attention, the room being now crowded. As she told them of his wonderful love and pity, she saw that the women were sobbing. One said, "Oh, this is the Jesus I have seen in my dreams; not the one the priests have told us about." Another said, "Signorina, won't you teach us to know this Jesus as you know him, and to love him as you love him?"

A few devoted young people have gathered around Miss Ruddy and have volunteered to share the burden of the work. It was decided to form a Circle for the furtherance of the work among the poor Italian population, and this was done accordingly, the headquarters of the work being at No. 1751 Madison avenue, New York, where inquiries may be addressed. The work is entirely one of faith, and the missionary has full confidence that the

A Golden Opportunity.

NO matter whether you live in town or country, you must have books to read. If you have a family, the young folks must be entertained; and to make them proof against allurements and social frivolities outside of the home, there is nothing like an interesting book.

Not one, but ten splendid volumes of the very best literature, is what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offers in its Premium Library for 1897. For many months, ten different authors, including some of the most famous of our time, have been busily engaged in writing these books, and it is not too much to claim that between the covers of the ten elegant volumes comprising the Library, there will be found a feast of pure and wholesome enjoyment for every reader. A more attractive, enchanting and fascinating collection, combining so much of pleasurable entertainment, helpful information and real, intrinsic value, has probably never before been gotten together in the same case. They are all highly artistic. As to the binding, it is rich, olive green vellum cloth, with red and gilt titles; the type is comfortably large and clear, and the case itself forms quite a unique ornament for the parlor table or the bookshelf. It is just the kind of a set of volumes book-lovers would be apt to fall in love with, and to make almost any sacrifice to possess. In this admirable Premium Library, entirely different from last year's production, there is sufficient variety to satisfy every taste, from the stalwart son or the sprightly daughter to the old grandmother with her gold-bowed spectacles, who still retains her love for a good book.

The Wedding Ring, by Rev. Dr. Talmage, gives both wise and witty counsel to those who intend to marry, as well as to those who have already entered the matrimonial state. It is a volume that will be heartily enjoyed by either sex, and will provoke more smiles and instil more quaint, yet sound philosophy, than any score of books on the same subject.

The Fairy-Land of Science, by Arabella R. Buckley, is the very romance of Nature and its wonders. In its pages one can learn much of the marvels that surround us, and which are part of our common lives. This author is a wise and pleasant tutor for those happy readers who join her train. Recitations for the Social Circle, will afford material for many hours of pleasant enjoyment, where young folks or old gather by the winter firelight. Mr. Harvey has made the very best selections, and it would be a strange company indeed that could not find capital entertainment in this book. In How to Succeed, Mr. Marden has struck a stirring keynote that will ring through the brain of young manhood and womanhood, and spur the reader on to that industry and energy which assure triumph in life. This book is a bugle-blast which, once heard, will continue to sound, and influence the whole after-career. Mrs. Sangster, in Holiday Stories for the Young, leads us like a fairy godmother into bewitching paths and through wonderful adventures, bringing us out all right at last—as fairy godmothers invariably do.

The Land We Live In, is the patriot book of the generation, telling us all about our dear native land, from the time of the first planting of the seed of liberty, until the tree attained its present marvelous growth, overspreading a great Sisterhood of States. If you want to know what an honor and privilege it is to be an American, native or adopted, just read this book. In The Secret of a Happy Life, Marion Harland discloses the best conditions for domestic happiness. Thousands of homes that haven't the secret will be made pleasanter by this precious volume. Amelia E. Barr's book of Winter Evening Tales, is a wonderful weaving of the strangest and most delightful romances in real life—humor, pathos, tragedy, and mystery, all blended together by the magic skill of a great writer. In Many Thoughts of Many Minds, Dr. Klopsch has given us a volume that contains the ripest and wisest utterances of poets, philosophers and leaders of human thought in all ages on a wide variety of topics. In Notable Nineteenth Century Events, John Clark Ridpath selects the very essence of the century in science, art, literature, politics, war, industry and religion—events that make history and exercise a distinct influence on the destinies of the race. Nothing could be finer than the author's vivid descriptions of Waterloo, Sedan, Antietam, Gettysburg, and other great battles.

We have thus briefly outlined THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Premium Library, but it is impossible to do justice within so brief a space to the many merits and attractions. All are new, and every volume has been specially written for the benefit of our readers. This Library of ten volumes, each in artistic binding, and the whole in a substantial and handsome case, is sent together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year for the subscription price of Three Dollars. We are forwarding many hundreds of sets daily to our subscribers who, almost without exception, write us expressing their surprise and delight at receiving such an unexpected premium. To repeat their expressions here would seem extravagant; but we are highly gratified to know that the 1897 Premium Library is meeting with the magnificent welcome it deserves. All subscriptions for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with 1897 Premium Library, should be addressed to No. 92 Bible House, New York.

Quarterly Review.

Sunday School Lesson for Dec. 27. Golden Text, Eccles. 12: 13. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THIS is the end of the matter; all hath been heard; fear God, and keep his commandments, for this is the whole of man (the word "duty" is not in the original). For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every hidden thing whether it be good or whether it be evil.

The Whole of Man

according to these words of the Preacher, was lived out by one man only: the Lord Jesus Christ. An entire man, made in the image of his Person, must of necessity fear God and keep his commandments without deviation. True manhood is to do the will of God always, and this the Lord Jesus alone perfectly accomplished. His delight was to do the will of his Father, his law was within his heart (Ps. 40: 8); he did always those things which pleased him (John 8: 29); he fulfilled "all righteousness" (Matt. 3: 15), and therefore became "the end of the law for righteousness to everyone that believeth." Solomon understood the true end of man: the wisdom of God in his writings, and yet, glorious as was his beginning, the latter part of his life was a sad, ignominious failure. In reviewing his life shall we not seek to discover the cause of this?

Solomon began well, chosen of God, from the very time of his birth, to be David's successor, and to build the temple of the Lord, he came to the throne amid the acclamations of his people, who almost unanimously set aside the claims of Adonijah, and received with joy the decision of their aged king David, to appoint Solomon regent at once, and to be his successor on the throne of Israel. Young as he was, Solomon had great advantages in the example and in the prayers of his father, and in the counsel of the prophet Nathan, and also probably of his mother, Bathsheba, who, we may believe, was partner with David in the broken and contrite heart for their mutual sin, which finds utterance in

In Solomon's choice of blessing, when God so graciously placed his Almighty resources at his command, and he chose above all personal desires "a hearing ear, and a seeing eye, and a lowly heart, to rule God's 'so great a people,' Solomon made a beginning of his reign which could hardly have been equalled, perhaps never surpassed by any other monarch. Heavenly and earthly wisdom was no small thing in his day for representing the people, and for the good of his people! No wonder, with such an inquiry in his mind, he comes to the conclusion that "all is vanity!" Here is a man loaded with all the good of this present life, and moreover, really knowing God, and having known special intercourse with God, full of the most profound wisdom, and yet concluding that the life of man is one long disappointment! The Apostle Paul starts from quite a different point of view when he exhorts us by the mercies of God to present our bodies "a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God," which is our reasonable service. No shadow of disappointment for a Christ-like Christian, for "all things work together for good to them that love God." (Rom. 8: 28.) No weary looking forward to losing everything that we have labored for because we know not who may come after us. On the contrary, "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal." (11 Cor. 4: 17.) Solomon "hated life" (Eccles. 2: 17); with Paul to live was Christ and to die was gain." (Phil. 1: 21.) It was the self life which tarnished the lustre of Solomon's glory and wisdom.

And thus he became a channel of wisdom and blessing from above, the streams of

to himself just what God had prohibited, houses, gold and silver and wives. (Deut. 17: 16, 17.)

In the first half of his reign Solomon was fully occupied with the building of the Temple and of his own house: the first, seven years; the latter, thirteen. He was at the zenith of his glory when the Temple was dedicated. How far the thirteen years building of his own house was the carrying out of God's thoughts we do not learn, but the inference we draw is that self-seeking crept in, little by little, at this period of his life and ultimately led to his terrible downfall. Self-seeking develops into self-consciousness, which easily leads on to self-indulgence. Every step in self is departure from God.

The whole purpose of the book of Ecclesiastes, which is about Solomon, is, "What profit hath man?" What good is a man's life to himself? What a declension in the great Preacher from the moment when, recognizing himself as "a little child," he had prayed for an under-any man may have leave him as dependant on God for real goodness as though he had none of them.

It is a solemn question, often asked, but never answered, whether Solomon's declension was final, or whether he found a way of return. God has drawn a solemn veil over his last days. If, however, the words of Ecclesiastes are the last words of Solomon, it is evident that he had come to a true balance. The dangerous experiment he had made in proving his heart with mirth and the enjoyment of pleasure (Eccles. 2: 1-10), on the one hand, and also the melancholy, almost despair, which had overtaken him on the other hand, had yielded to a conviction that man's true good was his urgent duty "to fear God and to keep his commandments."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the use of Sunday School Teachers.

TYPICAL of the ten lessons of the past weeks, is Watts's famous symbolical picture of the Bridge of Life, of which an engraving appears on this page. On the left is the new-born infant being placed by the angel in his mother's arms. Under his mother's guidance he is mounting the steps, then he is receiving instruction. Courtship and marriage bring him to the middle of the bridge, where he receives the good things of life and is crowned. Farther on he is seen pursuing money and fame, and as he descends, the burden of the world is on his shoulders, and he steps faltering down to the end, where Death awaits him to bear him away in his boat.

Solomon's career, which we have been studying in detail, was such a journey, full of hope at the start, magnificent in its prime, and gloomy and sad in its close.

The Hebrew people have always looked back to Solomon's reign as the golden period of their national history. That it was a period of national glory, is obvious. The historians revel in descriptions of the magnificence and luxury of the time. They descend on the number of Solomon's horses and chariots, his retinue, and the fleets bringing him gold and ivory, and the thousands of men toiling to bring cedar and stones for his palaces. His drinking cups were of fine gold, they tell us, and they add regretfully, as an evidence of the wealth of the times, that Solomon made silver to be in Jerusalem as stones; "it was not anything accounted of in the days of Solomon." The magnificence speedily passed away. Within five years of Solomon's death, his son was having brass shields made to take the place of the gold shields, and the King of Egypt had stripped Temple and palaces of their most precious ornaments. But even while the splendor continued, there was a dark background to the glory. The common people were groaning under the burdens which the king's luxury entailed. How heavy these burdens were, we learn from the humble address presented by the dejected son of the king to his father and successor. They said: "Thy father made our yoke grievous; now, therefore, ease thee, son, what the grievous servitude of thy father and his heavy yoke that he put upon us." Evidently the people had suffered and denied themselves, that the king, of whom they were proud, might have money to squander on his luxurious tastes and on his foreign women. There was no need to regret the closing of the period. It was a time of moral decadence. All this extravagance and luxury was an offence. This was not Israel's mission among the nations. It was not for this that God had brought them out of Egypt and set them apart. This was not the golden time of Israel's history. The splendid services she rendered to humanity were not rendered in this brief period of her glory. They were rendered in the wilderness, when Moses laid the foundations of law, in the exile when her poets wept by the rivers of Babylon, and in the time of harass and poverty and weakness after the return. Israel had a higher calling, a grander mission, than the building of palaces, and the accumulation of gold and ivory. She was to be the spiritual teacher of the world; but she must suffer expatriation, oppression, and bitter persecution before she could give us Isaiah and Jeremiah and Ezekiel and Micah. It is to the days of her sorrow, and not to the days of her material glory, that we owe her contributions to the world's store of the wisdom that is more precious than gold.

Why hath the Lord done thus? (1. Kings 9: 8.) God's promises to Solomon were conditional on his being obedient and faithful. That they were not fulfilled to his posterity and his people, was due to his own failure. He was drawn aside, and precisely, too, by the temptation of which he had been warned. Peloubet gives a significant fable in illustration. During an eclipse of the moon, the moon said to the sun: "Why, O my dearest friend, do you not shine on me as usual?" The sun replied: "Do I not? I am sure I am shining as I always do. Why do you not enjoy my light as usual?" "Oh, I see," said the moon, "the world has got between us." That is the trouble with the backslider. The world, with its joys and pleasures has come between God and the soul.

My son, despise not the chastening of the Lord (Prov. 3: 11). Sometimes adversity is necessary to break the heart, and when God sees that it is he sends it. Freeman tells the following parable: The four Seasons decided to try to break a huge boulder which lay on a plain. Spring coaxed the stone with gentle breezes, and made flowers spring up around it, but the stone was obdurate. Summer came and caused the beams of the sun to pour upon it. The stone warmed under the rays, but its heart was hard as ever. Autumn came and stripped away the flowers, and blustered, and threatened the stone, but it took no notice. Finally winter came. It sent a cold rain which saturated the stone. Then it sent a hard frost, and behold, the stone was rent in pieces.

Went not fully after the Lord (1. Kings 11: 6). God will not accept that kind of half-hearted service. Solomon building temples for Ashtoreth and Molech was a spectacle to make angels weep. From him, as from every one who offers worship, God expects undivided allegiance. There is an ancient legend that in the early days of Christian popularity, the Roman Senate, desiring to conciliate the Christians, spontaneously passed a decree authorizing them to place a statue of Christ in the Pantheon. This was deemed a great concession. It was supposed that the Christians would have felt honored by permission to place the statue with the gods in the national temple. It was impossible to make the senators understand how shocking to the Christian principle the proposal was. We realize it, but even we do not give to Christ the exclusive allegiance that is his due.

The merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver (Prov. 3: 14). Mr. Moody tells a fable of a crane on the bank of a river. The crane was busy catching snails, when a beautiful swan came down the river. The swan urged the crane to go with him to heaven, where there was a beautiful river and all the joys of life. "What do you eat there?" the crane asked. The swan described angels' food. "Are there any snails there?" was the next question. The swan thought not; he had never seen any. "Then," said the crane, "you may go to heaven without me. I'm after snails."

RESCUED FROM SIN AND SHAME.

The Christ-like Work of the New York Rescue Band—Hundreds of Fallen Men and Women Lifted Up and Saved from Ruin.

MID the many philanthropies of the great metropolis, there is probably none that is doing a more precious and blessed work at the present time than "The New York Rescue Band."

As an undenominational and independent organization, the Band has for its platform, this simple declaration of principles and purpose:

"We aim to rescue fallen men and women from lives of sin and shame, and to lead them to Jesus Christ, who alone can save and keep from sin."

They strive to accomplish these results. First:—By seeking out erring girls, whether in saloons, opium dens, or on the street, or wherever they may be found, and taking them to a home for women, where, if they are willing to abandon a sinful career, they may be helped to reform and return to a life of virtue. Second:—By establishing Missions, where the Gospel is preached to the lost, and also shelters and homes where those girls who forsake sin may be received and built up physically and spiritually, and fitted to go out into the world and earn an honest living.

The foundation work of this organization is the personal visitation of erring girls wherever found and in whatever condition. The Band does not wait for them to come to a room in which the Gospel is preached, but goes out after them and preaches the Gospel to them wherever they are met, offering them an opportunity for a better life. These faithful workers go into the vilest places in the city. In this way thousands of erring girls have at least an opportunity to forsake evil lives, who otherwise would not themselves seek out the chance to do better. The only way to reach these wanderers is to go after them.

The workers have the recognition and protection of the police authorities which is important, as they are liable to be taken in a raid, or arrested on the street, unless thus protected. They are identified by means of a specially designed and appropriate badge. The names and addresses of girls, met on the street and otherwise, are given to a missionary employed by the organization, who visits them later at their rooms and follows them up. Cards, having the addresses of the home and a statement of the willingness of the organization to help them, are handed to the girls on the streets or elsewhere. The missionary also visits the prisons and hospitals. When a girl has been sent to prison, a memorandum is made of the time her sentence expires, and she is visited by the missionary and met at the time of her release from prison, and taken to the Industrial Home or other homes.

In May, 1893, the Rescue Band opened a mission in the Chinese quarter of New York City, where meetings have been held nightly, commencing about 10 o'clock, and lasting sometimes until 1.00 a. m. The seating capacity of the mission hall is about 300, and it is frequently filled to overflowing. Thus there are over 100,000 attendances during the year, largely of out-cast men and women, who otherwise would not hear the Gospel. Those attending this mission are of the lower class, and many conversions have taken place. The expenses of this department are about $2,500 per year. No salaries are paid at this place excepting to the janitor. In the mission room is also being carried on a work among the children of this neighborhood which will, undoubtedly, yield good results. At the present time, over 160 children are enrolled.

In this locality, the extreme boundaries of which are less than a stone's throw apart, there are at present living about 200 white girls, the majority of whom are under 25 years of age. Many of these girls are regularly visited in their rooms by the Band's workers, and thus, even if they do not come into the mission, they have the Gospel presented to them.

The latest prominent development of this rescue work is a unique effort to reach the "medium" and "better" classes of erring girls. The officers of the Rescue Band consider it absolutely necessary to carry on a distinct line of effort for the different classes of erring girls. Experience has shown that fallen girls, who have had good education and refined training are not largely reached at present. Probably a large percentage of the girls received by the various Rescue Homes of the city have come from the lower social levels, and whose surroundings have been illiterate and unrefined. Very few of those who come from the higher ranks of society enter such homes willingly, whatever the reason. A distinct work on special lines would seem to be the way to reach these classes.

In August, 1895, the Girls' Industrial Home was opened at 208 East and the fact that there are no servants excepting a cook, the managers have been enabled to do this at a net cost of $1.67 per week for each girl for food, clothing, etc. For 1897 the work of the Industrial Home will cost $6,000, and the Doyer Street Mission about $2,500.

Many interesting incidents have occurred during the course of the Rescue Band's history. Recently a girl of seventeen was met on the street by one of the workers. It was found she had been living a life of sin but a few months. She was willing to abandon it and to enter the Industrial Home. She accepted Christ as her Saviour, and after corresponding with her plaintain did not appear against her, having learned that she was properly protected. This girl has since gone to her home and become a good woman. An interesting letter, showing gratitude, has been received from her.

These incidents might be multiplied. It is touching and interesting to hear from the lips of the erring girls, the sad stories of their downfall. Girls in their unfortunate position will not attend a church and few of them would go to a mission. Some voluntarily apply to the various homes of the city for admission, but the majority are uncared for, and must be sought out individually. The rescue work is largely done at night, and, of course, means a sacrifice not only of the worker's ordinary engagements and physical preferences, but also of sleep and rest.

Here is a band of nearly a hundred consecrated men and women who have signified their willingness to work, unpaid among the outcast. Few of them are able to give much money, and the organization, while ready to do the work, looks to the generous public for financial support. They aim to have two hundred honorary members or friends who will give each $50 per year—less than $1 per week, the Rescue Band undertaking to raise the balance among themselves. "We are frequently asked," said one of the leaders in the Rescue Band, "what results we see from our labors. From the standpoint of cold figures, the results might be deemed discouraging. While many people may feel that the reclamation of erring women is almost impossible, the experience of Rescue Workers has shown that this is not the case. Certain of the workers connected with this band have during the past fifteen years in their own personal work, helped under God eighty-three girls who have abandoned this life. Out of these eighty-three, about twenty-one girls fell back into the old life: twenty have died or dropped out of sight, while 42 are still living a correct life."

While spiritual results cannot be measured materially, the following facts gleaned from the forthcoming annual report of the trustees will be found instructive:

Doyer Street.—Attendance, 12 months, 110,000; persons removed to home, 115; visits to erring girls, over 3,000; inquiries for

Hope Mission School.—An average attend-

Fourteenth Street.—164 girls fed, lodged, clothed and instructed; 12,000 aggregate attendance in our two private chapel daily services; classes formed in six industrial pursuits, and many girls returned to their homes.

General Rescue Work.—Over 4,000 cards given in various places to erring women; regular visits to jails, etc.; many unpaid workers nightly working.

The work of the Rescue Band is supported entirely by voluntary contributions, and as New York is the great centre where the erring ones come, from all over the country, the Band receives contributions from all sources. All communications concerning the work and all inquiries by intending patrons, should be addressed to H. A. Gould, Treasurer, 208 E. 14th St., N.Y.

father, who desired her to come back, she left New York the day before Thanksgiving for her father's home.

While leading the religious service one Sunday, in one of the city jails, one of the workers found a young woman of about twenty, refined, quiet and evidently laboring under a terrible sorrow. She was quite unwilling at first to speak to anyone whom she believed to be a missionary. She was drawn into conversation, however, and stated that a man who wished to get rid of her had sent her to prison. The case was looked up and the worker was on hand the next day to see that justice was done. The girl, after some hesitation, told her entire story, from the time she left her mother's home, and asked the worker to pray for her. Next day the com-

JEWISH COLONIES IN PALESTINE.

Their Condition and Prospects—The Jews of Yemen—Beautiful

Persian Jewesses—The Box Colony and its Denizens—Jewish Types in Jerusalem.

WE will go next about one-half mile northwest of the city, half way to Schneller's Orphanage for Syrian boys, a well-known landmark in that region, and look at another settlement of Yemen Jews. So far as the style of buildings and the situation are concerned, this is the most attractive Jewish colony about Jerusalem. The houses are all shown in the illustration, and can be readily counted. They accommodate probably three hundred, or, by putting a family in each room, five hundred souls. It will be seen at a glance that the printed statement of certain enthusiasts, namely, that "this settlement contains five thousand or at least three thousand souls," is very incorrect. Some of these houses are two stories in height, and they are all provided with tile roofs, which is a modern innovation in Palestinian house architecture. The old stone roofs are no doubt greatly superior to these as a protection from the extreme summer heat. It should be said that these houses were not built by the occupants themselves.

About the year 1882 these Jews from Yemen, in Southern Arabia began to arrive in Jerusalem, and as a class they were extremely poor. Charity from the London Jews' Society and from other sources literally clothed their nakedness and prevented them from starving. They numbered a few hundred only, and their chief Rabbi informed me that their motive in leaving their ancient home was to better their condition. They had heard that homes and land would be provided for them if they should port was extensively circulated throughout Europe and America. One of their prominent Rabbis was named "Gad," and this was all the foundation there was for the strange report just men-other parts of the world, and on this account they deserve special attention. They are very small in stature, with very thin, with which we are familiar in America or as the Yemen settlement just described this being south of it. It is known as derived its peculiar name in the following manner: During the summer of 1891-'92, a considerable number of Jews arrived from Persia, being led to this movement by reports that the land was ready for them when they should reach the Holy City. These people, too, were entirely distinct in appearance from the Yemen Jews and quite as distinct from all European Jews. The nose, eyes and hair were unlike the Polish type, the features were regular, their faces and eyes full, and both men and women were large and finely formed. It was commonly remarked by the residents at Jerusalem, "We have never seen Jewish women so large and well formed as these from Persia." These people were desperately poor and had to be provided for. The government began to be alarmed at this influx of helpless men and women and ordered them to leave the country. Under the circumstances it was a cruel order, and all classes of citizens shared in the feeling that it was unjust. Strong efforts were made to have it rescinded, but these were of no avail. A large number of wretched human beings crowded like cattle into a shed and thence driven to Jaffa. A few however managed to remain, and for these shelter was provided. Walls were built of stone and mud. On these sticks or pieces of scantling were placed, which were covered with pieces of tin instead of boards. All the kerosene imported into that country is carried in oblong tin cans holding five gallons each. As there were plenty of these at command they were cut up and tacked on to the string pieces of wood to protect these poor people from the sun and rain. During the winter they suffered terribly from the cold and wet and from scarcity of food. Many were sick, some died, but those who survived till the next summer obtained work so that they could make their wretched hovels more comfortable, and do far better as to food.

It is asked: "Why did not

PERSIAN JEWISH DWELLINGS IN THE "BOX COLONY."

they, or charitable people for them, get cheap boards to cover their shanties with?" All lumber in that country is brought from Europe to Jaffa, and at that time was brought from Jaffa to Jerusalem, a distance of of forty miles, on camels, and the natural result was that the price of a single board was beyond the means of any poor person. The illustration shows how the houses were built, these particular houses having stood for two years. To have only a cold heavy rain or a storm of sleet, would seem to our comfort-loving friends in America a very poor protection especially when there was little or no fire, and when clothing or food were scant. It is gratifying to know that these people are confined chiefly to the first winter. This

In the neighborhood of a large city like Jerusalem, it is easy to see how a settlement of Jews whether large or very small, called by them in every case a "colony," can be established, and in time the settlers manage to make some sort of a living. Besides those described there are a few small ones of a familiar character, places of residence for Jews who are trying, by trade or handicraft, to earn their daily bread. All this, however, is not what is generally thought of when the colonization of Palestine is mentioned. It is the agricultural settlements upon which the eyes of the world are fixed, and it is with regard to the success or failure of these that the friends of the Jews are anxious. Americans do not need to be told what it means to settle a new country, for the process has been going on before their eyes for generations. I find that many persons, with no real appreciation of the difficulties in the way, simply transfer these ideas with which they are so familiar, to the settlement of Palestine by the Jews. But it appears that the processes in the two cases are absolutely unlike. We should suppose that the common idea of earning a living by tilling the soil would actuate the settlers in the one country as well as in the other; but it is not so. In the case of the settler in

JEWISH COLONY NORTHWEST OF JERUSALEM.

America, he has a certain amount of capital in hand. He has skill, he becomes practically the owner of the soil at once, his taxes are not burdensome, his government is favorable to all his plans, the climate is for the most part congenial, his market may, in some cases, be remote, but it is sure, and, in due time, he becomes prosperous and independent.

In case of the Jewish settler in Palestine, he has, instead of capital, poverty, generally great poverty. He must live under a government that is unfriendly to him, and which interposes obstacles at every step. He cannot become the owner of the land, but must till that of another. He is undertaking work for which he has had no training, which he inherited no adaptation from his fathers, for which he has neither desire nor taste. The new climate to which he is exposed is trying, and may cost him both health and life. Finally, what he raises he must guard night and day to prevent its being stolen, and when he takes it to market he receives for it but a pittance inadequate to repay the cost of production.

I can scarcely think of another project where theory looks so beautiful on the one hand, and where the work required to make it a success is so great on the other. If the settler in the new portions in America experiences hardships, the settler in Palestine experiences ten-fold greater hardships, and with prospects for ultimate success proportionately diminished. There are, in all, twenty of these agricultural colonies in different parts of the country, with a total population, counting men, women and children, of three thousand souls. Two-thirds of the colonies are under the care of Rothschild, of Paris.

He owns the land and employs the colonists to till his soil, paying them so much a month for their services. Houses are provided, synagogues, schools, teachers, medical attendance and medicine are furnished without charge to the settler. With my American ideas, I do not consider the experiment a fair one when colonists have to be hired at a pretty fair salary to what they are doing. I believe that when a colonist is not directly affected by the success or failure of his efforts, his interest and diligence are affected accordingly. Some of the colonies are beginning to raise wine. That already produced has been pronounced "from fair to excellent," but when it costs from one to two dollars a bottle to produce it, and it sells in Jerusalem at eight cents a bottle, there is no prospect before a colony of self-support. I have often asked myself and my Jewish friends this question: If the support now received from Rothschild and other sources also, were cut off what would become of these colonies?

All these colonies were started with the idea of benefitting the Jew materially. Very few well-to-do Jews have thus far been found to favor this movement, that is by entering into it personally themselves. My experience with the Jews (as I shall relate it in future letters), convinces me that the material side of their nature does not need further development, but that morally and spiritually they do need the uplifting help of Christian sympathy and love. SELAH MERRILL.

Edison's Wondrous Energy.

Edison, the famous inventor, frequently works for thirty or even sixty hours at a time without sleep. In an interview, published in The Phonoscope, he says: "Some days I don't sleep; other days I sleep nearly all the time. Sometimes I go seventy hours without sleep. Very often I go forty-eight and fifty and not infrequent-

NEARLY FOUR CENTURIES OLD.

The Quaint and Venerable "Burger Wees-Huis" of Amsterdam and its Orphan Inmates—How Good Dame Claesdochter's Kindness to a few Orphans was Multiplied a Thousand-Fold and gave Rise to a Splendid National Charity.

A GATE OF THE WEES-HUIS.

LIKE all other large centres in Europe, the old city of Amsterdam is gradually losing many of its distinctively local characteristics and assuming the aspect of a nineteenth century metropolis. Ancient buildings of the quaint architecture of mediæval Holland are year by year being replaced by more modern structures, streets are being repaved and widened and what is perhaps regrettable, from a purely artistic point of view, the poorer classes and even the visiting peasants are discarding their peculiar costumes for the commonplace attire of latter-day civilization.

It was for this reason possibly that the attention of the writer, while on a visit this summer to the Dutch capital, was particularly called to the appearance of the boys and girls of the "Burger Wees-Huis," or Citizens' Orphanage, whom one encounters on the public thoroughfares at certain times of the day. Their mediæval costume, partly of bright red, affords a dash of color to the comparatively sombre surroundings and brings to mind the figures in the queer paintings of early Dutch life one has seen at the various picture galleries of the larger towns. For these orphan boys, it must be understood, are dressed in the costume generally worn by the burghers of Amsterdam three hundred years ago; the left section of the coat and hat, scarlet, the right section a deep black, these being the city colors. The girls wear the same colors in the same fashion, excepting that their headdress consists of a white cambric cap of decidedly ancient pattern and that they wear a shoulder-piece of the same material folded in pleats back and front.

"The Citizens' Orphanage would well with the city and its history is closely identified with the story of our progress and development. Do not imagine that these children are waifs in the common sense of the word. Admittance to the orphanage is hedged about with the various restrictions and conditions which remove it from the category of ordinary charitable institutions, although of course it is primarily philanthropic in its aims and results.

The Citizens' Orphanage of Amsterdam is situated in the heart of the city, three minutes walk from the royal palace on the Dam. I approached it by its ancient entrance on the Calver Straat, an archway of solid masonry crowned by a quaint bas-relief representing a group of citizens postured around a flying dove, the arms of the institution. This doorway was constructed in 1521 and bears a quotation from Vondel, Holland's national poet.

I was not destined to pass beneath the arch, however, for after repeated knock-

Amsterdam "burgers" or citizens. The number of her proteges increased very rapidly, so that the municipal authorities were soon obliged to take charge of the establishment and on March 31st, 1523 a rescript was issued regulating the admission of children and appointing a Regent to govern them. A few years later the government of the asylum was placed in charge of a board of six male and four female regents. Supported by voluntary contributions, by special taxation and otherwise, the asylum continued to thrive, and in 1573 it moved into its present quarters. In 1632, the establishment received the further addition of an adjoining building devoted to the care of old people, which now constitutes the boys' department. Besides this valuable real estate, the asylum also acquired, in course of time, a great deal of landed property in the north of Holland, the rentals from which are one of its principle sources of revenue at the present day. Primarily eligible for admission to the orphanage are the children of citizens who are ings, an attendant appeared and directed me to the entrance on the St. Lucien steeg, around the corner, another most picturesque gateway dating from 1634. Once inside, one might imagine one's self at a country seat a hundred miles away from the metropolis. To the right a spacious garden overshadowed by an enormous chestnut tree and hedged in by four sides of an imposing structure that would compare favorably with some of the palaces I had already visited in the Netherlands: on the left another elaborate gateway, leading, as I afterwards learned, to the boys' department. It was nearly noon and the garden was alive with rosy-cheeked girls of different ages wearing the picturesque orphanage costume. Contentment and indeed happiness were depicted on every face. The younger ones were engaged with a skipping rope or playing with the large white cat of the house, the elder girls occupied the circular seat beneath the great tree, knitting, sewing and exchanging confidences.

The Burger Wees-Huis of Amsterdam was founded in 1520 by a rich and charitable woman of the name of Haesje Claesdochter. She began by devoting one of her buildings to the care and shelter of seven or eight young orphans, children of deceased registered upon its books. The admission fee in this case is less than sixty cents in American money. Children of non-registered citizens, otherwise eligible, are required to pay a sum equivalent to $10. The Regents reserve the right of transferring Catholic orphans to other establishments. They are also empowered to send to their rural establishments children whose conduct is calculated to exert an evil influence over the rest. The child enters the orphanage with the distinct understanding that it shall remain until the age of twenty, nevertheless no inmate incapacitated by ill health or weakness of intellect has ever been turned adrift on the world. For such the asylum remains a home for the balance of their lives and there is even one case on record of an "orphan girl" dying beneath its roof at the age of one hundred!

From the foregoing it is easy to understand why the "Burger Weesen," as these children are called, are not classed by the citizens in the ordinary run of orphans and foundlings. Nor can it be forgotten that from this very asylum have gone forth men who bore the names of Jurriaan Pool, former "Burger wees" can present a certificate of good conduct from his or her employer, a further payment of twenty-five guilders ensues.

To conclude this outline of one of Holland's best known and in many respects most typical eleemosynary institutions, I cannot do better than quote the following extract from its last annual report, to wit:

"It is interesting to know that an investigation of the statistics of the asylum covering a period of twenty years, discloses the fact that after deducting twenty-three per cent. of whose final disposition no reliable data has been obtained, and forty per cent. who have died, eighty-five per cent. of the inmates have obtained success in their various vocations, eleven per cent. have done passably well, while four per cent. have gone entirely to the bad. The responsibilities with which we have burdened ourselves have sometimes led to disappointments; but in the main, we have every reason to thank the Most High for having blessed our efforts and the children confined to our care."

AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Royal Arbitrator.

A WELL DESERVED tribute is paid by our Government and that of England, in the agreement they have reached on the Venezuelan difficulty, to the character of Oscar II., King of Sweden and Norway, whose portrait appears on this page. They have invited him either to be President of the Tribunal which is to decide the questions in dispute, or to select the President. There are to be five members of this Court of Arbitration. The Supreme Court of the United States will designate two; and the English High Court of Justice, two. National sympathies may, and probably will, lead to a tie vote, so far as these four members are concerned, so it was important that the fifth member should be not only a man of sound judgment, but one absolutely disinterested. Such a man the two governments have found in King Oscar, who, whether he sits himself, or is represented by some judge of his selection, cannot be suspected of having any interests of his own to serve by the decisions he may render. It may safely be affirmed that no better choice could have been made. King Oscar is a man of marked ability and high character. He is sixty-seven years old, and has reigned twenty-four years. He is a grandson of Marshal Bernadotte, one of the first Napoleon's officers, who in the general European upheaval of the Napoleonic period, was invited to occupy the throne of Sweden and Norway. The experiment of intrusting the destinies of the united kingdom to the guidance of a French general, who could not even speak the language of the people whom he undertook to rule, was extremely hazardous, but Bernadotte proved to be a wise and patriotic ruler. During his reign he maintained the honor and dignity of the country in exceptionally difficult circumstances. His son, Oscar I., who succeeded him, was even more popular than his father. The interest he took in the welfare of his people and the reforms he initiated, endeared him to both nations. His wife, a grand-daughter of the unhappy Josephine, the first wife of the Emperor Napoleon, was almost idolized by the people. Their children, of whom the present king was the third, were trained by her with singular devotion. All of them proved worthy of the care bestowed upon them. Oscar, especially, who, in his boyhood, was not expected to come to the throne, was an ardent student. He is an accomplished linguist, a musician of great skill, and a statesman of the first order. He is the author of several learned works, as well as of volumes of poetry and fiction. His kindness, benevolence and sympathy with the unfortunate among his people, have won for him a sincere and affectionate loyalty. He possesses, too, in a high degree, the sagacity which is required for the performance of the duties he is now invited to undertake, as President of the Tribunal on the Venezuelan question. It will be noticed that Venezuela is not directly represented on the Tribunal and that fact may prejudice her against the arrangement; but it is hoped that she will be satisfied that her interests will be sufficiently protected by the two members who will represent the United States. The arrangement is a distinct triumph of American diplomacy, and is creditable to all parties. We may hope that the decision of the Tribunal will be so equitable that other nations will be encouraged to resort to arbitration instead of to war, and so the world may have a foretaste of that time of which the prophet wrote:

He shall judge between the nations, and shall rebuke many peoples: . . . nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more (Isa. 2:4).

Lost Her Propeller.

Shipping reports from Halifax, N. S., announce the arrival there in tow of the steamer Catchpole, which sailed from New York for Hull, England, on November 5th. It appears that five days after leaving port the Catchpole was caught in the heavy storm. She was heavily laden, and had great difficulty in keeping her course. After battling bravely with wind and waves for two days, a serious disaster befell the devoted ship. The main shaft broke and her propeller fell to the bottom of the sea. The ship was entirely at the mercy of the waves, and the crew for some time gave themselves up for lost. The captain, however, eventually inspired them with hope sufficiently to make an effort to save the ship. For five days and nights they were kept busy in holding the ship's head to the wind and sea. If there had been the slightest relaxation of vigilance the ship must have foundered. She drifted as helplessly as a log on the surface of the sea. On the morning of the sixth day the crew were gladdened by the sight of the smoke of a steamer. It was the Holbein on her voyage from New Orleans to Liverpool. She saw the disabled steamer and went to her help. After consultation of the two captains, it was decided to try to reach Halifax, as the Catchpole had drifted so far out of her course that that was then the nearest port. A tow-line was attached and the Holbein towed the helpless vessel slowly day after day. Three times the stupendous weight of the crippled steamer broke the tow-line, but eventually she was brought safely into port. It was a narrow escape. A steamer without a propeller is a most helpless thing. Not only can it not proceed on its voyage, but is liable to drift and founder. In this it is like the Christian life. The man who is making no progress in the things of God is apt to drift backwards, and eventually to suffer wreck.

Wherefore let us cease to speak of the first principles of Christ and His way, and let us rather seek to live in His way.

A Miser-Philanthropist.

The death is announced in the New Orleans papers of a remarkable man. He was at first supposed to be very poor, then a man of great wealth, and finally a modest philanthropist. He had occupied one room in a boarding-house for many years. His landlady noticing his small economies and the care he took to avoid spending a cent unnecessarily, believed him to be a poor man, and she showed him many little kindnesses under the impression that he found it difficult to pay his way. Recently the man became infirm, although not in extreme old age. He was confined to the house and fell sick. The landlady urged him to consult a physician, but he refused. Finally, in spite of his refusal, she sent for a doctor and undertook to pay his fee herself if her lodger proved unable to do so. It was, however, too late to save him. The old man died and was buried. It was then found that he was comparatively wealthy. Title deeds were found in his room to over thirty houses, and there were shares and bills aggregating in all over a hundred thousand dollars. The papers, in describing the case, referred to the dead man as a miser; but it has since been found that the tenants of his houses were poor worthy people, most of them widows, whom he allowed to live in them rent free, and whom he was accustomed to assist with frequent generous gifts. Twice the people, who knew the man, formed a wrong estimate of him, not knowing all the facts. Such an incident should make us cautious in our estimates of others, and should teach us to follow the Apostle's advice:

Therefore judge nothing before the time until the Lord come . . . who will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall each man have his praise (1 Cor. 4:5).

Lost in the Fire.

A sad death occurred recently in Boston, Mass. An old house in which about a dozen persons were peacefully sleeping, was found to be on fire soon after midnight. The first alarm came from an elderly lady who was awakened by the barking of her dog, who broke into her room and leaped on the bed. She rose and hurriedly seized a cloak and wrapping herself in it, ran through the house alarming the other tenants on her way and reached the street in safety. All the inmates effected their escape, though two of them who were forced to jump from the second story windows, had been hurt by the shock. After the flames had burnt themselves out, the firemen explored the building and to their surprise found among the ruins the body of the woman who had aroused the other inmates and thus saved their lives. The body of the dog who had awakened her was lying by her side. She had evidently returned to by the officials to prevent communication. The women were in one wing of the prison and the men in another and, excepting on Sundays when all went into the prison chapel for divine worship, they never approached each other; yet in some way, every woman knew when her husband, or son, or brother, was in the prison. How they learned it was a mystery the officials could not solve for a long time. It was evident that they made the discovery in the chapel, but as a high board partition separated the male from the female prisoners, it seemed impossible that they could see each other. After puzzling for months over the mystery, a clue was at last obtained. It was noticed by a shrewd detective, whose services were called in, that the eyes of all the prisoners were fastened on a large cross over the pulpit. This was kept so bright that it served the purpose of a mirror. In its clear surface the prisoners saw the reflection of every woman as she entered and took her place, and the women saw the reflection of each male prisoner as he went out. The brass cross has now been removed, and the blank wall tells no secrets. We suppose the principles of seclusion adopted for discipline in the prison rendered its removal necessary, though it is difficult to understand in what way it could be detrimental for some woman to know that her husband or brother was in the prison, or for some man to know that his wife or sister was near him. It is a good thing that no one can remove the Cross of Christ from the preaching of the world. Many a poor sinner looking to it has learned how near to him He came who gave his life for his salvation.

Looking unto Jesus . . . who for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame. (Heb. 12: 2.)

Niagara's Power in Buffalo.

After utilizing the power of Niagara Falls in the immediate neighborhood, to give light and motive force, the Company holding the concession has extended its operations to Buffalo, a distance of twenty-two miles. For a year and a half past, all branches of mechanical industry in and around the village of Niagara Falls have been run by the electricity generated by the river. The experiment was subsequently made of conveying the power to Tonawanda, which is ten miles distant. It was confidently predicted that the experiment would fail, but in spite of these prognostications, it proved completely successful. The undertaking of extending it to Buffalo was much more formidable, but that, too, has been achieved. In a large section of the city the surface cars are now dependent on Niagara Falls for their motive power. The mode of generating the power is very simple. The current is tapped about three quarters of a mile above the Falls by a canal about two hundred feet wide and twelve feet deep, which runs inland at right angles to the river for little more than quarter of a mile. The the burning house to save some treasure, and had been caught by the fire or been overcome by the smoke. Doubtless the poor woman thought she would have time to get her treasure and return; otherwise, she would not have ventured back after once escaping. Many souls have been lost in a similar way. They have thought they might safely venture to enjoy some amusement or some worldly association just once more before following Christ wholly, and they have become entangled and returned to the world.

For if after they have escaped . . . through the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein and overcome, the last state is become worse with them than the first. (11. Peter 2: 20, R.V.)

How the Prisoners Knew.

A curious discovery was made recently by the warden of a county prison of the way the male and female prisoners learned of each other's detention within the same walls. Great care had been taken water falls through shafts 136 feet deep upon great turbine wheels and is conducted back to the river by a race. The wheels are connected with a dynamo of five thousand horse power and the current is sent on by the most powerful transformers in the world. At the Buffalo end, three transformers of five hundred horse power each, receive and handle the current. The company expect to extend their operations to other cities, as the power that can be generated by the Falls is practically inexhaustible. The only problem to be solved is how to convey it to the place where it is needed. It is so with spiritual force. The power that the Christian needs for his own life and for his Master's work is not in himself, but is derived from an inexhaustible Source and is limited only by the channel of his faith through which he receives it. Christ's assurance has never yet been fully tested:

He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto my Father. (John 14: 12.)

Wonderfully Popular.

NEVER was a premium more popular than this year's edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The ten volumes which are enumerated below, and which are altogether distinct from those offered last year, aggregate thirty-two hundred pages of large print, and each volume has an illustrated title page. They are bound in rich, olive vellum cloth, with red-and-gilt stamp, and every book looks well worth several times the amount involved. These ten books in a very handsome book-case, make one of the prettiest gifts of the season.

these Libraries have been sold in a single day, and the demand as yet shows no abatement. As last year, over twenty-five thousand orders came in after our stock was exhausted, causing some delay, we have made such early and specially liberal provision this year that every order, without a single exception, may be filled the very day it is received. Many Sunday School Teachers, who wish to have a copy of these ten books makes a very attractive and acceptable gift, thus thousands of hearts will be made glad through the gift of these ten books.

Better order a few days earlier than necessary, and thus make proper allowance for the enormous demand on express facilities made by the holiday trade.
Order to-day if you have not already done so. Remember, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Premiums are always better than advertised. Money refunded if not entirely satisfactory. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may be sent to one address, and the Premium to another without extra expense.

One of hundreds of similar appreciative letters from subscribers who have received our beautiful premium book, "The Home of the Bible," is this:

CHAMBERSBURG, PA., Nov. 28, 1896. Thank you for "The Home of the Bible" received in good order a few days ago. It is a delightful volume to me in every way, especially so as a souvenir of a recent visit with my brothers to the Holy Land. On opening the book the very first picture that met my eye was the genial and kindly countenance of "mine host," Mr. Gelat, of the salt hills which the cap of limestone in this particular case had protected. This singular object is called by the Arabs Bint Sheikh Lot or "Lot's daughter," and is the groundwork of an Arab legend. Several modern commentators hold that the true interpretation of the passage (in Gen. 19: 26), is that Lot's wife looking back, perished and her body was quickly covered by an incrustation of salt or saline bitumen.

Amid the multitude of editorial correspondence, it is pleasant to light upon such letters as the following, which are simply examples of many hundreds, more or less appreciative, coming to us daily:

It would be hard to say how delighted we are with the exquisite frontispiece of the million edition. You are not likely to be surpassed or even equaled by any competitor in this line, either religious or secular. In reading matter, you, for the price, outstrip any other magazine. How you can do it is to us inexplicable. I wonder that it has not occurred to you to print the color pictures, such as your masterpiece, Ruth, on a separate or detachable sheet, so that it might be preserved unimpaired, without injury to the paper itself. What a home picture gallery we might bring together, how many walls of sick rooms might be brightened by them!

The North Atlantic Squadron, which last winter had its rendezvous near Fort Monroe, is now in effective shape for quick sailing orders, either to Cuban waters or elsewhere. Our photographs show some of the types of war ships that compose the Squadron. The New York (Capt. W. S. S. S. Teacher, Brooklyn, N. Y. 1. What is the Higher Criticism? 2. Is it true, as I am told, that the Higher Critics deny the inspiration of the Bible?

1. Practically and roughly stated, the Higher Criticism is an attempt by an analysis of the books of the Bible and a close examination of the style and language used in them, to determine the approximate date of their composition and how they were written, whether they were original compositions or a compilation of older books. 2. There are many evidences of inspiration. One of them is that the Holy Spirit and the writers were merely amanuenses and at times did not themselves know the meaning of what they wrote. The Apostle Peter's words (1. Peter 1: 11), are quoted in proof of this theory: Searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, etc. A second theory is that the revelation came to the writers and they were left to their own mode of expressing it, but were preserved from misrepresenting it. A third theory is that the revelation of God to man was progressive; that the earlier writers had incomplete views of God and imperfect ideas of morality and religion; that the conception of God in the Pentateuch is not so true as in the Psalms, nor in the Psalms as in the later prophets, nor in the later prophets as in the New Testament. This third theory is the one held by the Higher Critics. They do not deny the inspiration of the Bible, but they do deny that the inspiration and authority of the early writers were equal to those of the later writers.

E. R. Turnbull. Was Mark the cousin of Barnabas as stated in the International Bible, or his nephew as stated in the Oxford Bible?

There is the same difference between the Authorized and the Revised Versions. The former speaks of him (Col. 4:10) as sister's son to Barnabas, and the latter in the same passage as the cousin of Barnabas. In all cases of variation we prefer the Revised Version and therefore think the International Bible right in calling him his cousin.

E. E. P., New York. Is there any difference in principle in killing birds to use their feathers and in killing seals, beavers, etc., to use their fur?

Fur may be, and undoubtedly is, a practical necessity in many countries, for securing warmth; but this can hardly be asserted of feathers. There are countries in which the use of fur is simply a gratification of vanity, but feathers, always and everywhere, are worn for no other purpose. Thus there are conditions in which the one may be justifiable and right, while the other is invariably wrong.

Rev. G. W., San Diego. 1. Where did the name of Abyssinia come from? 2. Why is Ethiopia so called?

Ethiopia is derived from either the Coptic word ethos (a boundary), or an ancient Sahidic word esos, which the Greeks interpreted as meaning "to burn," the Ethiopians being of a very dark, sunburned complexion.

MATRIMONIAL PLANS.

OR once Alice

BY AMELIA E. BARR.

Lloyd was not sorry to see her mother's place at the dinner-table vacant. She felt that it would be easier to draw her father into conversation, that he would be more amenable to reason and less disposed to contradict and oppose whatever others desired; and this reflection made her sigh, for she understood that these moods were generally assumed for the very purpose of annoying the woman whom he had vowed to love and cherish.

This evening he came into the dining-parlor with a singularly subdued excitement. He condescended to praise the weather, he told Alice that she was looking very well, he was willing to allow that the soup was excellent and the wine properly cooled, and in short, for once he brought to his own table the urbanity and satisfaction that he usually reserved for strangers and mere acquaintances. But the rare mood rather frightened Alice; she did not like to disturb it; if she made him angry, he would be sure to reproachfully point out the fact that whenever he tried to be good-natured at home he was imposed upon. She involuntarily became silent and thoughtful and was quite ignorant that her father was observing with approbation the beauty of her downcast face and the still grace of her reflective, pensive mood.

Finally the servants left the room, and Alice felt that she might now change the conversation proper before them, to one more private and personal. Mr. Lloyd had the same thought and was more prompt to realize it. Before Alice could form her request, he had asked, "Is Stephen in the house yet?"

The question, put without interest, and without anger, grieved her. She involuntarily felt this absence of anger to be a wrong. It argued a want of feeling which would be far harder to influence than the most bitter resentment. She answered coldly.

"He has gone away again."

"He did not care to see me, I suppose. I don't wonder. But I am astonished, he had such a proper sense of shame."

"He would have liked to see you, father, but he thought you did not care to see him. He is going to sea on Saturday."

"He is a mental and physical tramp. I suppose your mother has been crying and praying over him all the day." He drank a glass of wine hastily, and then turned to Alice, who had risen from the table, and asked, "When do you go to Newport?"

"I do not want to go this summer, father. I wish—if you have no objections—to take some lessons, and perfect myself in music."

"What new fad is this?"

"It is not a new fad. I have often told you I would like to be proficient in some one thing."

"I want you to go to Newport. I have a particular reason for it, and I may as well tell you now, as again. To-day, I have been able to oblige, in a very essential way, a young English nobleman. He is going to Newport. Can you not see that this circumstance may contribute considerably to your clat there? I intend to bring him out here on Saturday, and introduce him to you. The rest is in your own hands."

"I will not pretend that I do not understand you, father, but—"

"That is right! That is right! I knew you were a sensible girl. If your brother had only a thimble-full of your intelligence he might, at least, learn how to spend the money I make for him. The fact is, Alice, this young nobleman is of the best blood in England; you have, or will have, lots of solid American gold. He can take you to courts, give you a title, rank, prestige, and what not! You can give him the means to keep up the splendor of his natural position. I own that I should like to be father-in-law to an earl, and I am willing to pay for it."

During this speech, Alice had been thinking rapidly, and she concluded that it was not yet the time for opposition. She felt strong in her ability to temporise, until she had carried out her plans for Steve—afterwards—afterwards—well, afterwards was perhaps a long way off; she need not at any rate, go to meet "afterwards." So when her father ceased speaking, she asked gravely, but yet with a show of interest:

"What is your opinion of this nobleman, father?"

"He is gentlemanly-looking. I hear people say that he is handsome. I am no judge of Apollos."

"And yet you are yourself a very handsome man, father."

"Am I, little girl? Well, at least, I have a very handsome daughter."

He was much pleased with the genuine compliment, and also with the bright smile that answered his reply to it. For once they were ready to begin a dispute in a thoroughly good-natured mood; and Alice opened it by saying:

"You would not wish me to marry a man who did not love me, or for whom I had neither love nor respect?"

"Have I said such a thing?" Then he added scornfully, "Love is supposed, in all marriages."

"At Newport a girl has great disadvantages. All the beauties of the Continent are gathered there. It takes a fortune to dress yourself. The simplicity style will not pass now. It is dowdy. No matter how much a man is in love, he cannot offend the conventionalities; he cannot 'devote' himself. There are more engagements broken off in Newport than there are made. And this young Earl will be the idol of the season. Plenty of girls quite as pretty and as rich as I am, will offer him sacrifices that Alice Lloyd could not think of. If you really wish me to marry this noble Englishman, father, you must let me have a fairer field than Newport for his conquest," said Alice, smiling.

"Where then?"

"This house is beautiful. The surroundings are romantic. Everything here, is my ally. I have no contingents to bother me. This is the kind of home, a man desires after the buzz and babble, and hollowness of Newport; he will come here, and find that out."

"You may be right. I will bring him here on Saturday. Women understand the tactics of matrimony better than men. You have no other lover, Alice? You are not in love, with any other man?"

"I am not in love with any man. I have no lover. I never had one. You forget that I am just out of college."

"College! That has nothing to do with it. Love rather affects a gown and cap now. He is become a B.A., and he laughed good-humoredly at his own idea.

"Perhaps he has, father," said Alice. "At any rate, if you do not object, I would like to become a Doctor of Music. I only need a good teacher, to do so."

"Very well; but mind this. I will have no foreign, long-haired woman's darling, coming to teach you. Get a sensible, commonplace American; who wears a neck-tie, and gets his hair cut."

"I thought of a young lady who has been highly recommended to me; a Miss Jessie McAslin."

Alice had determined to name the Mc-

Aslins very carefully; and then, without intent or consideration, the word slipped off her tongue. She watched its effect breathlessly. For a moment, it appeared to awaken no memory; then swift as light, it penetrated the dust and forgetfulness of years; and the man's face paled, and the glass in his hand trembled, and he said, as if to himself—

"McAslin! McAslin! Where have I heard the name? Jessie! Jessie! Jessie McAslin!"

"I dare say you have seen the name very often, without consciously putting it into your memory," answered Alice. "Miss McAslin has a brother, a clever young man, who writes for the reviews and newspapers."

"Now I remember: very sensible articles they are; just my views on the gold standard."

"Then you have no objection to my employing Miss McAslin?"

"No. If you are right about Newport, she may help to profitably pass the summer. I wish it was over for my part."

The conversation was dropped without any answer to this remark. Alice did not think it wise to ask for reasons, which would give opportunity for saying disagreeable things; she handed her father his newspaper, and went into the next room, and played softly a pretty Nocturne. The music did not offend him, as it too often did; he let the sweet dreamy notes sink into his consciousness; and memory set herself to them. He was twenty-two again. The bloom of young desire, the purple light of love, were his own; and pretty Jessie Allison was walking hand in hand with him, through the sweet clover of the home-meadow. He had hopes then: sweet innocent hopes; now, he had only their memories.

Anon he began to wonder about the McAslins. Jessie had married a man of that name; could these young people be her children? He felt an unusual interest in this question. Why should he care? He told himself that he did not care; and yet faces and voices long forgotten, came back to his inward eye and ear; and he grew nervous at last under the unusual companionship. As the shadows deepened, he rose up and called for lights and the evening papers; and in their astonishing records of struggling, sinning, game-playing humanity, found an habitual and congenial atmosphere. He was at once his own man in it; and the wraith of his youth—with its dreams and hopes—passed away from him.

In the morning early, Alice wrote to Jessie McAslin. She wished her to receive the note before Steve went to sea; for she judged it likely he would hear about it; and so understand that his sister was disposed to sympathize with his wishes and friendships. It was of course a formal little note; and yet somehow, notes do carry the spirit in which they are written. Unthoughtful of this occult influence, Jessie was yet sensitive to it. "What a nice note!" she said to herself as she read it. It found her also in an hour favorable for consideration. She was sitting alone with Steve, when the sharp whistle of the postman, penetrated the room. Mrs. McAslin was busy about her household affairs, and her husband sat reading and talking beside her. Flora and her lover had gone for a walk. John had been invited to some Trade's Hall, to discuss with its members questions relating to their position. Steve, who was generally delighted to go with John to such meetings, had this night declined to do so.

He had placed himself in comfortable pose at one open window of the parlor. Jessie sat at the other. She had a book and pencil in her hand, and appeared to be making notes, or entries; really she was speculating about Steve; and the book and pencil were only a pretense. She was weary of it when the postman's whistle blew a fresh interest into the room. Steve insisted on going down-stairs for what had been left, and Jessie made no objections. He brought up two letters, one for John, and one for Jessie. She took it with a little curiosity; its appearance was unfamiliar. In a moment or two, she was possessed of its contents, and she rose up in an excited manner, and went to her father and mother. Steve sat down again in his seat by the window. He knew the letter was from Alice, and he expected to hear it discussed. He was quite prepared when she returned to the room with her mother; both of them in a glow of pride and pleasure.

"Steve," cried Mrs. McAslin, "what do you think? Jessie has a note from Miss Lloyd—Nicholas Lloyd's daughter—asking Jessie to give her music lessons. Do you remember our conversation about the Lloyds? You said you knew the son at school?"

"I did."

"What kind of a boy was he?"

"In some ways he wasn't a bad boy. He couldn't learn anything useful, or up-to-date."

"That does not matter, mother," interrupted Jessie. "The boy might be very stupid and disagreeable, and the girl clever and delightful. The thing that puzzles me is, who told Miss Lloyd about my playing and teaching? I know no one who visits in her set."

"Sets run over and into each other in New York, and inquiries are made from all kinds of people," answered Steve. "I suppose you will give her lessons, Jessie?"

"I will go and see her to-morrow. She has sent me a marked time table, and if I let her know what train I will take, she says 'the carriage will meet me.' I will telegraph her to-night. I wonder which will be the most convenient train?"

"Ten-thirty," said Steve, promptly.

"How do you know?"

"I have acquaintances up the river. I always take that train. It is an express. Shall I go and telegraph for you?"

"I wish you would, Steve."

He went at once to obey her wish, and Jessie discussed the affair and laid out her best walking-suit, and retouched her black hat for the expedition. In this way she wearied her enthusiasm a little, and Steve found her on his return sitting in the parlor, silent and depressed. "Steve was going away." Her heart iterated this complaint, and refused to be consoled by any mere financial good fortune, for Steve had become a large part of Jessie's thoughts and imaginations. He constantly surprised and puzzled her. John said he was a fine, classical scholar, and he did not appear to be in need of money. His good breeding was evident, and when he attempted to use slang or popular language, he could not do so as one born to its peculiarities.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

A MOTHER'S SORROW.

BECAUSE of one dear infant head
Which looked with yearning gaze
To me all little heads
A halo wear,
And for one saintly face I know
All babes are fair.
Because of two wide earnest eyes
Which looked with yearning gaze
My sad soul through.
All eyes now fill my own with tears
Whate'er their hue.
Because of little death-marked lips
Which once did call Upon my ear in vain appeal
From children small.
Two little hands held in my own
Long, long ago.
This world of woe,
To clasp each baby hand stretched out
In fear of foe.
The lowest cannot plead in vain,
I loved him so.

Indian Mothers and Babies.

How the Little Ute and Shoshone Papposes are Cared for by their Mothers.

DOMESTIC life among the more civilized American Indian tribes, while it has possibly lost much of its old-time picturesqueness, is still a very attractive theme for the artist and photographer. Our illustrations on this page show how the Indian mothers carry their babies, or papposes, around with them, while going about their daily household tasks. A lady reader of this journal at Loveland, Colo., has sent us a most interesting letter which gives a glimpse of the home life of the Utes. She writes:

The Colorado Southern Utes are a tribe in the Southern part of Colorado and Northern New Mexico, and number about one thousand. They are really divided into three tribes or families, the Weeminches, Moaches, and Capotas, and are superior men and women physically, two hundred to two hundred and twenty-five pounds being the usual weight of a full-grown Ute. Indians, as a general thing, are healthy, and one seldom sees a lame, halt or blind person among them. The weak children die early and only the fittest to stand their mode of live survive to reach manhood and Ignacio, the chief of the Utes, is a fine specimen. He has no use for "book learnin'" or education in any way. He says, "Heap learnin'" make Indian heap lie, just like white man." These Indians are not self-supporting. Although they have plenty of good, tillable land and many cattle and horses, they are lazy and indolent. The squaws do all the work. If the man rides it and the woman walks along behind. On monthly "ration day" the old lady goes to getting the family allowance of flour, meat, meal, sugar, baking powder and soap (the last named, I am sorry to say, they have but little use for). I once visited one of of furniture. The woman grinned and motioned me to sit down on the dirt floor, while she bustled around preparing the meal. As she washed her hands before mixing her biscuit, I thought I might want to stay and dine there; but when she took the same water to that the boy might have "a safe ride to the happy hunting grounds."

Some one once said that "the only good Indians were dead ones." Now, these Utes do not seem to want to die for the express purpose of becoming good, but they do think that there is only one place in the great future and all Indians go there. They have their modes of worship with dance and music (if such they may be called, but no amount of trouble if they know of such a thing—has ever caused one of them to commit suicide.

The only remedy for Indian ignorance and superstition is to be found in education and the Gospel. Thanks to the efforts of our zealous missionaries and devoted teachers, the children of all the Indian tribes are now being educated and taught to know the Saviour. So rapid is the Gospel progress that ere many years pass away, there will not be a single un-evangelized tribe of red men within our borders.

A Strange Wedding.

Probably in no place in the world is the marriage ceremony attended with such a curious custom as that among the Ne-He-He of the Philippines Islands. When two islanders are to be wedded, the whole tribe is assembled, and the affianced pair climb two trees growing near to each other. The elders then bend the branches until the heads have thus come into contact the marriage is legally accomplished, and great rejoicing takes place. A further dance follows the marriage ceremony.

A Wonderful "Grandfather's Clock."

Baron Ferdinand Rothschild is the owner of an ancient "grandfather's clock." The clock is made of wood and is very old. It is said to be the oldest clock in the world. It is now in the possession of the Rothschild family. The clock is very large and is made of wood. It is said to be the oldest clock in the world. It is now in the possession of the Rothschild family. The clock is very large and is made of wood. It is said to be the oldest clock in the world. Baby Songs.

Today are full of the personification of buds, bees and butterflies. Poetry, with music and gesture, appeals to the childhood of the individual as to the childhood of the race, long before prose. So song to babe and child have an influence that nothing else can exert, writes Anna Williams in the Home Queen. To crowd their little heads with too many other things before the poetic and imaginative have had full play, is to deny them a portion of their lawful inheritance.

A Plea for the Step-mother.

Why is it that, almost by unanimous consent, the social and domestic as well as the literary world, looks down upon the step-mother? She is a misunderstood individual, misrepresented, and her best purposes too often distorted by prejudiced tongues and pens, who prefer to criticise harshly instead of doing generous justice. A writer, in the course of a plea for the better treatment of step-mothers in general, relates this experience: "I found every tradition against me," said a step-mother. "All the books represent the step-mother as scheming and unkind; outsiders invariably pity the children when their father marries again; and relatives are always ready to criticise the slightest attempt at discipline or guidance. The children love me now; but the first year was the most trying ordeal through which I ever passed." And her step-daughter, who was present, said, "Yes, indeed, we were on the defensive for six months, because our nurse told us that step-mothers were cruel whenever they got the chance, and sometimes turned children out of the house. It took us a long time to realize that we could love and trust our new friend just as we did other people. I remember perfectly how astonished and ashamed I was when I first understood how mistaken we had been, and what love and patience we had been fighting against!"

Doubtless much of misery and ill-feeling would be spared if instead of prejudging the step-mother we took her for what she really is, and valued her accordingly.

Grant's Early Boyhood.

In his comprehensive story of the early life of Gen. Grant, Hamlin Garland, in My Grandfather's House, gives these interesting details: "The life which the boy learned was primitive, unrefined, elemental. The village (Georgetown) was almost a mere cluster of huts, a mere cluster of cabins. The houses were small, undorned, and overcrowded with children. The women cooked at the open hearthplaces with pots and cranes, with 'reflectors' and 'dutch-ovens' as luxuries. The ceilings were very low, the walls bare, the furniture rude and scanty. The women spun and wove and dyed their own garments. The men wore jeans and hickory, while 'store-clothes' were a mark of great extravagance or gentility. Doctors and judges and clergymen were sometimes seen appalled in the magnificence of 'boughten clothes' on feast-days and Sundays. Ripley, down on the Ohio river ten miles away, was the principal market. From Ripley or Higginsport, Georgetown, was reached by stage over hill or through deep wood. Ulysses Grant lived for sixteen years in this locality, and upon his boy mind were impressed the faces, the speech, the manners, and the daily habits of these people. He loved the town with the love men have for the things thus clothed upon with childish wonder, which never lose their halo, but remain forever sweet and marvelous.

A Wedding by Wholesale.

SINCE the institution of the marriage ceremony, there probably never was a wedding on such an extensive scale as that which took place at Susa, in the days of Alexander the Great. A writer in Self-Culture gives this interesting description of that event:

When Alexander had conquered Persia, wishing to unite victors and vanquished by the strongest ties possible, he decreed a wedding festival. Alexander himself was to marry Statira, the daughter of Darius; one hundred of his chief officers were to be united to ladies from the noblest Persian and Median families, and 10,000 of his Greek soldiers were to marry 10,000 Asiatic women.—20,202 persons to be married at once! They had the most splendid arrangements. On a plain near the city a vast pavilion was erected on pillars sixty feet high. It was hung and spread with the richest tapestries, while the gold and precious stones which ornamented it would have made your eyes blink. Adjoining this building were one hundred gorgeous chambers for the hundred noble bridegrooms, while for the remaining 10,000 an outer court was inclosed and hung with costly tapestry, and tables were spread outside for the multitude. A separate seat was assigned each pair, and all were arranged in a semi-circle on either hand of the royal throne. Each bridegroom had received a golden vessel for his libation, and when the last of these had been announced by trumpets to the multitudes without, the brides entered the banquet hall and took their places. And now don't imagine that each bridegroom stood up separately and vowed, "With this ring I now thee wed." The ceremony was very simple; the king gave his hand to Statira and kissed her as his wife; and all the other bridegrooms followed his example. Such was Alexander's wedding.

Saying Kind Words.

Some time ago, a party of young people in New York organized a "Kind Word Society," the object being to aid young working girls who had lost their position, to find employment, and incidentally to speak a kind word to cheer them along. Several thousand girls have been assisted by the society, which is still carrying on its good work. Its experience furnishes an excellent example for others who may be in a position to do similar good work. Much may be done by a little group of earnest people, who, not expecting great deeds, are resolved to embrace every opportunity of performing such humble, kindly service as lies within their power.

Truths Learned by Experience.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning December 27.
Psalm 90: 1-17.

IN inviting members of the Christian Endeavor Society to draw the veil from before their sacred inner life, it may be presumed that the Committee does not desire to make the meeting a confession, but to encourage the members to help each other, by imparting light which they have gained by study or experience. Such mutual help it is possible to give, and it may be of the utmost value. It must have been a barren year for any Christian if he is unable to respond to the invitation by naming, "one spiritual truth that I have learned this year." It may not be a new truth, but if he has tested an old truth by experience and learned its value in his life, it is as valuable to him as if it had been newly and specially coined for his use in God's mint. If he has suffered a bereavement the lesson may be, the comfort which He gives who is the Resurrection and the Life—a lesson so old that his people have learned it by the graves of nineteen centuries; yet has to be learned anew by the individual believer in our day as it was learned by the first disciples. Or it may be, that circumstances almost as bitter as death, have separated two loving hearts and each has had to learn that "there is a Friend who sticketh closer than a brother." Or there has been sickness, and in that fertile land many lessons may have taken root and sprung up to blossom and fruitage which were dead theories at the beginning of the year. These may be lessons of patience, of faith, of the value of human sympathy and kindly helpfulness, or of sweet peace enjoyed in the Valley of the Shadow of Death. Or there may have been a change in social conditions. Riches do certainly make to themselves wings and fly away. Some may have had to learn by painful experience, how hard poverty is to bear, and how God comforts and supports his children in adversity. If any have learned what it costs to resist temptation and to do right, when there is financial stringency and the opportunity to make the money bitterly needed, by unrighteous methods, has been rejected, that soul should be able to tell of the peace of conscience which is better than riches. Or it may be with some, that the year has been uneventful, but even with these the weary drudgery of life, the carking daily cares, the infinitesimal annoyances of daily toil, or the dull round of social duties have tried and depressed the child of God, and he has found in the fount of living waters some word that gave new strength to his fainting heart. In the endless variety of human experience, there is no lot unforeseen by our Heavenly Father, no sorrow without its alleviation, no burden but can be borne through the spiritual strength that is given to every seeker. The prophet's advice is still the most sound and practical that can be given to any one in trouble, whatsoever the trouble may be: "Who is among you that feareth the Lord, that walketh in darkness and hath no light? Let him trust in the name of the Lord and stay upon his God." Those who resist the temptation to fret and repine, and to complain of God's treatment of them, who are cheerful and confident in his unchanging love, soon learn that: "He will keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee."

MYSTERIES OF GRACE.

I DO not know exactly how
The work of grace was wrought
Within my heart: I only know
His Holy spirit taught
Me to believe in God's dear son;
I did, and so the work is done.

I do not understand at all
How He can ever need
Such worthless ones as I to do
His work, but then I read
The foolish shall confound the wise
If in his hand the vessel lies.

I cannot tell the moment when
My Saviour will appear,
And so I must be ready now;
To-day he may be here.
For all around us tells so plain
That soon He will be back again.

A PRAYER.

O HOLY Spirit, lead me through the dark,
For many foes are in the wilderness
Through which I press my way to holiness.
O, precious Spirit, lead my soul aright
Until I leave the dangers of the night,
And mount toward heaven like the morning lark.

Guide me, sweet Spirit, in the unknown way,
For many are the winding paths which cross
And lead astray the pilgrim to his loss.
O, gracious Spirit guide me in the gloom
Until I reach my sweet celestial home;
O, keep me in the heavenly King's highway.

Yes, guide me, Holy Spirit, through the night,
For many snares the enemy has laid,
And pitfalls deep, so that I halt dismayed;
But Thou, O, Guide divine, canst safely lead
My anxious soul to its eternal need;
Guide me, sweet Holy Spirit, to the light.

The New Temple.

A New Temple to be Built in Jerusalem in the Latter Days by Restored Judah.

By REV. E. J. HYTCHE.

one can read the unfulfilled prophecies, whether uttered by Moses or Paul, without inferring that a time will yet come when not a mere remnant, but the whole family of Abraham shall be restored to their God-given inheritance, and when there shall be converted. An important question, nay the very crux of the question is thereby suggested—will they be converted as a nation, or by human agency, or by such a direct Divine interposition as has marked their whole history? An answer to this question is of the greatest importance, not only because it leads to an inquiry as to their revealed future, but because on it hinges the inference as to what we are to expect as the outcome of the present agencies for their evangelization.

From the whole tenor of Scripture we are led to the conclusion that not only will the Jews be converted as a nation, but that they will be converted in two divisions, namely, first the two tribes, and then the ten tribes, or Israel proper—in correspondence with their distinct expatriations—and that on different periods after the Second Advent.

We learn from Zechariah 12: 12-13, that at some future period, the three tribes, Judah, Benjamin, and Levi, who remained united when the Ephraimite Kingdom was formed, up to the time of Titus, will return to the Holy Land in an unconverted state. Either just immediately before their return, or when there, by a treaty with Antichrist (Isa. 28: 14, and Dan. 9: 27), they will be placed under the protectorate of the lawless one. This covenant, for some unexplained reason, will be made for only seven years, and thus has an element of uncertainty as to its after continuance when that period has expired.

But notwithstanding the limited duration of this covenant with Antichrist, the Jews will rebuild their temple, possibly not on its former site, but on Mount Zion (Ps. 87). That their former temple will be rebuilt on their restoration to the Holy Land we might infer, had we no Scripture authority for asserting it, from the fact that in their liturgy the Jews in all lands pray daily, "Build thou the temple in our days, speedily." But for such re-edification of the ancient temple we have something more than well warranted inference, for in Ezekiel 40: 43, its dimensions and ritual are specified in the minutest detail. This last great temple is also referred to in Isa. 66: Zech. 6: 13; Mal. 3: 1; II. Thess. 2: 4, and Rev. 11: 1-2. So that Ezekiel's temple is no mere mystical allegory, as most Biblical commentators assert, for the writers of both the Old and New Testament, pre-report it as a literal building—for literal worship and sacrifice.

Though the covenanted protectorate of Antichrist was for seven years, yet for some unexplained reason—but most probably as preparatory to his claim for Divine worship—he will break his covenant with the Jewish rulers when only a moiety of that period has expired. In this infraction of his own covenant he will apparently be aided by some apostate Jews, since we read that (Dan. 11: 30) "he will have intelligence with those who forsake the holy covenant." Then he becomes the bitter enemy of the people who have trusted him.

PREACHING TO PRISONERS.

ONE of the most effective efforts of Mr. Moody, the well-known evangelist, has been to give the Gospel to the prisoners in the jails and penitentiaries. Pastors in different lohas for over a year held regular preaching services weekly in the Mercer County Jail, and has occasionally had the privilege of assisting in services at the State Prison. His methods are very simple, but the meetings are not without interest, as the prisoners listen with the closest attention to the plain statements of Scripture truth. Mr. Grady tries to make the men understand that while he cannot help them in the least so far as the law is concerned, they may be greatly helped if they will accept the gracious invitations of the Gospel. He also tries to impress upon their minds the fact that it matters but little, comparatively speaking, where they spend the next few months, or even years, but the question of where they are to spend eternity is of infinite importance. Rev. J. P. Farrar, of Lynn, Mass., accompanied him to the jail one day lately, and preached a short sermon, and also had an opportunity to witness Mr. Grady's manner of working. "At the close of the services," Mr. Farrar writes us, "nearly all manifested their desire for salvation. Since Mr. Grady began the work, several have professed faith, and many have signified their intention to live a new life."

The evangelist would be glad to present such prisoners as give evidence of spiritual interest, with a Bible, Testament, or some appropriate book, which would be helpful to them, but thus far he has not been able to do much in this direction. His services are given to the prisoners without remuneration.

Russia's Two Great Thinkers.

Throughout all classes in Russia, the teachings of Tolstoi have weight, and by his recent works very many have been awakened to a sense of duties and responsibilities. However widely the views of most of those who read these lines may differ from Tolstoi, few will fail to be thankful for his vigorous, earnest summons to take Christ at his word, and to follow Him only. "One of the most pleasant incidents of my stay in Russia," writes Mr. J. E. B. Meakin, "was a couple of days spent at his simple country home, in contact with his mind and character. But Tolstoi has suffered from coming in touch with bigotry, narrowness and bigots. Another of Russia's great thinkers, Vladimir Soloviev, a man whom the University found too Christian a student to retain him, still a member of the Russian Church, impressed me almost as much. He did not hesitate to attribute his country's troubles to its treatment of its Jewish citizens, the victims of the same party how fully his views are shared in other countries, and of the place the chosen people hold with us. With the exception, however, of the restricted area allotted to its Jewish subjects by the government, I can find no great cause of complaint at present, and there is every reason to hope that the days of their persecution are over."

Behold the Fair Star!

BEHOLD the fair star that is shining
With radiance lent from above!
O'er Bethlehem hills it is inclining
To lead us to Infinite love.

Our eyes shall behold the Redeemer
Whom angels rejoice to adore—
The Lord of the earth and of heaven,
So worthy of praise evermore.

Our glad hearts rejoice in salvation
Our souls to thanksgiving shall stir
To Jesus we bring adoration,
Our gold and frankincense and myrrh.

Let the mountains break forth into singing
The rivers and rocks lift their voice—
Let the ocean, its sweet incense bringing,
Cry loudly "Rejoice! O, rejoice!"

Sing together, O, stars of the morning!
Let the Lament of God be unfurled
Let us crown him forever and ever
Our Saviour, the king of the world!

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

Mother Stewart's First Glass.

ALTHOUGH Mrs. Thompson of Hillsboro, Ohio, is known as the mother of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the famous Mother Stewart, of Springfield, in the same State, who was known in the days of her prime as "The Wendell Phillips in Petticoats," was the immediate cause of the term, "Temperance Crusade," which clung to the early stages of the movement of the women for "God and Home and Native Land."

There was one saloon in Springfield just opposite the leading churches, and from the house where Mother Stewart was living, she could see the throng of men coming, in defiance of law. The preacher could stand in his pulpit and see the people passing into the saloon during his sermon, and yet none of the men took hold of the matter to get evidence against the saloon-keeper and make him obey the law. The incident that stirred Mother Stewart up to act for herself, was the sight of a man carrying a sweet-looking little baby in his arms with him into the saloon on Sunday morning to get his dram.

"If I had a disguise I would go in there," and she asked her landlady if she could furnish her one. She thought a moment and said, "Yes, I can;" and brought her a large waterproof circular that enveloped her to her feet. She took off her glasses, put back her hair and donned the outfit. She appeared then as a very respectable old Irish woman. As she passed out, she turned to the lady and her daughter and said, "Oh, now pray for me as you never prayed before in your lives!"

Mother Stewart says she was not thinking of danger, but felt buoyed as if she was treading on air. She passed the third door before reaching the saloon where the drinking was going on. There were young men standing at the counter drinking, and some older men sitting about the place. She desired to make two cases at the same time against the saloon-keeper, one for selling distilled liquors by the glass to be drank on the premises, under the State law, and the other for selling on Sunday, under the city ordinance. But she was afraid to ask for whiskey or brandy, lest she might be suspected as a spy. She asked the bartender if she could have something to drink. He asked what she wanted. At a venture she asked if he had any sherry wine. He set a bottle and two small glasses on the counter, one having a little water in it. She did not understand what the water meant; still, she picked up the bottle and started to pour out the wine, but as her hand trembled, and as she wanted to implicate the saloon-keeper as much as possible, she requested him to pour it out for her, remarking that she felt rather badly. So he poured it out for her and she asked the price, and he said a dime, which she laid down and picking up the glass, walked out.

On the Tuesday evening following that Sunday morning Mother Stewart spoke in the church opposite the saloon, to an audience that packed it to the doors and taking her glass of wine she exhibited it to the audience and told the story, "How I bought my first glass of liquor."

That was the beginning of the Temperance Crusade in the city of Springfield, which reached large proportions and did a great amount of good. It was the editor of the Journal of Dayton, O., who named the new movement. He wrote:

"One woman in Springfield is disturbing the whole city—not an unusual thing for a woman to do, however, as they have in times past changed the course of whole empires. The lady to whom we refer is Mrs. Stewart, who is on a Temperance Crusade against liquor-selling. She is determined to banish the trade from Springfield, and has got herself reinforced by a battalion of resolute women, who are making it hot for the saloon-keepers."

And so it was that out of the heroism of one motherly woman, the famous phrase, "The Temperance Crusade," was born.

The New Armenian Patriarch.

An event of religious moment in the East was the recent election of Bishop Maghashia Ormanian, of Constantinople, to the Patriarchate of the Armenian Church. The election was sanctioned by the Sultan's irade, and gives the greatest satisfaction to Armenians everywhere, as Bishop Ormanian is greatly beloved by his people. The new Patriarch was formally installed at the Armenian cathedral at Koum-Kapou, on Dec. 2. Mgr. Ormanian is 55 years of age, a native of Constantinople, and a convert from Roman Catholicism.

Home Talks with Mothers and Daughters.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

HOME CONFIDENCES.

YOU may think it is strange advice I am giving you to-day, mothers wise and daughters dear, but it is advice which comes so straight from my heart, that I must speak, even if you don't agree with me. By the way, I don't expect you always to agree with me. There are generally several points of view, and if mine does not seem to you the best one, it will be very good in you to write and tell me so. I will be glad to hear yours.

Mothers and daughters ought always to be intimate friends. They ought to be on confidential terms. If I've heard it once, I've heard it half a hundred times or more, that a girl should have no secrets from her mother. And I believe it thoroughly, and feel sure that the mother who has so kept the love and faith of her daughter that the daughter goes to her with every question, every experience, every puzzle and problem, is a fortunate mother, and her daughter a girl to be envied.

The fact is, unhappily, that a great many women do not understand one another in the least, and you cannot be friends in the truest sense with a person whom you do not understand. The relationship of mother and daughter affords a good deal of opportunity for knowing and criticising, each for herself, the weaknesses and faults of the other, but it does not invariably result in the fine, sweet, beautiful affection which is like music without a jarring note, and which makes one think of heaven begun below.

Now, my friends, for my bit of counsel. Let one another alone in non-essentials. The way in which people interfere in one's own home with perfectly unimportant matters which do not concern them, is to say the least fearfully exasperating. Why, I know a dear lady fifty years old, who for years has been wanting to try her hair in a different style from the one she usually wears it in. She fancies it would look well in a high roll combed up from her face. But do you suppose she'll ever have the satisfaction of seeing herself with the coiffure she admires? No, mesdames. Her daughters do not approve of a change, and "mother" does not dare to show independence in the matter, small as it is, for Lucy and Martha and Matilda would make a fuss and call her ridiculous. There is a great deal of petty tyranny practiced in home life, and daughters are not the only ones who are responsible for it. Mothers are transgressors, too, and they sometimes forget that they used to be young, and fail to enter into the fun and spirit of things with their girls, and generally throw a wet blanket over the pleasure of planning and doing, and going here and there.

Girls often feel restless and dissatisfied and they are hardly aware what they really wish for, knowing only that as the bird desires to try its wings, they long for change and a new sphere of action. The longing is not in itself wrong, for there may be a divine discontent with the actual and a gladness in the mere effort to realize one's aspirations. When I was a girl, I think girls were more contented with quiet home life than they now are, for the times were, at least till the war came, less strenuous and less exciting, and life was simpler.

The queer thing is though, that even men, in those days which seem so far off, and are so dear in memory, girls often sought other confidantes than their mothers. Some mothers are too chary of showing their love. If they only could wish on their half-grown girls, and their daughters just flowered into fair womanhood, the kisses and sweet words, and the tenderness they show their babies, the girls would not shrink from telling them of their longings and thoughts, fearing lack of sympathy, and saying, "Oh, mother doesn't understand!" But the mothers fell out of the habit of petting, as the girls grew up from baby days and baby ways, and now there is an invisible separating wall between their souls, a barrier hard to break.

The subtle antagonisms of race come in! A girl is her mother's daughter, but her mind, her tricks of manner and speech, her trend of thought, all descend to her from her father's people, and it won't be till she has a daughter of her own, that the mother-type will reappear in the family. A mother is sometimes younger in feeling, more full of poetry and sentiment, and much more romantic than her daughter. Sometimes they eat at the same table and sleep under the same roof, and are miles and leagues apart. Soul-life is a strange and solitary thing for some of us.

I have heard of mothers who never once said anything caressing to daughters, after the latter were old enough to be impressed by demonstration or its reverse, "I'm glad I had scarlet fever and nearly died," said a young woman. "I never knew until that night when they thought I wouldn't live till morning, that my mother cared for me even a little bit."

Now, do you say, I'm contradicting myself, when, in one talk, I advise letting each other alone, and in the same breath, speak of expressing true love in sweet and generous ways? I don't blame you if you think I'm all mixed up, but I'm not.

You must let each other alone, in matters where interference and nagging and fault-finding are killing frosts on home love. And you must not let each other alone where gentleness and kindness and self-sacrifice and daily consideration are going to make you happier and life more worth living.

Reduced Prices on Dresses and Cloaks

We wish to close out our entire line of Winter suitings and cloakings during the next few weeks, and in order to do so we have made decided reductions. In addition to this, we have made up a Bargain List of sample garments, and are offering them at half price—some even lower—as we wish to close them out without delay.

Tailor-Made Suits, $5 up, were $8 and $10.
Stylish Dresses, $6, formerly $10 to $18.
Bicycle Suits, $5, former price, $8 to $12.
Skirts, $3.75, really worth $6 to $8.
Capes, $3, reduced from $6.
Jackets, $3, former price $6.

We have also reduced prices on some of our Suitings, and are offering several lines of suitings at 65 cents per yard, former prices 80 cents to $1.15.

Write to day for our Winter catalogue and samples of materials. We will mail it to you, together with our Bargain List of reduced prices. Write now, as these garments will undoubtedly be closed out very rapidly.

The Youth's Companion

For 1897 he will tell how the seventy American post-offices of Washington's time have increased to seventy thousand. The history of our postal service is full of entertaining incidents and inspiring facts, and both will be found in the Postmaster-General's article on Early Days of the Post-Office.

Two other members of the President's Cabinet will contribute to THE COMPANION during 1897. Hon. Judson Harmon will describe "What the Attorney-General Does," and Hon. H. A. Herbert, Secretary of the Navy, will write on "Building a War-Ship."

One of the most beautiful CALENDARS issued this year will be given to each New Subscriber to The Companion.

It is made up of Four Charming Pictures in color, beautifully executed. Its size is 10 by 21 inches. The subjects are delightfully attractive. This Calendar is published exclusively by THE YOUTH'S COMPANION and could not be sold in Art Stores for less than One Dollar.

Consumption

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE—As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I have seen that you have saved numbers from consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as you due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily, Spurgeon.

"Westwood" Bethel Hill, England.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all its long and delicate habit should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and the Life, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be made in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had most free of charge, or the book will be sent free with every first order for $1.00 bottle of Congreve's Balsamic Elixir.

THE INVALID'S HOPE.

STRENGTH to endure I ask,
Must still my hopes defy.
Upon the rudder be,
My little bark shall safely sail
O'er calm or stormy sea.

I know that some day soon
This life and I must part.
I do not ask the meaning now,
But for a patient heart;
For in that land beyond
Across life's troubled sea,
I well do know my Father's love
Will make it plain to me.

So, if thou wilt but give Me grace, that I may bear
Each moment's pain as it may come,
I shall have naught to fear.
I do not need to know
What path before me lies,
The help that suits my present needs,
My morning satisfies.

But oh, I would not live
One moment without Thee;
Without the guidance of Thy hand
Life seems a trackless sea,
And bravely onward move
Because my bark is launched upon
The ocean of thy love. L. A. M.

Requests for Prayer.
At the Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Nov. 22, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

For the Conversion Anxious Mother, of Relatives and Friends. Baltimore, Md., that her son might be delivered from his bondage to the intoxicating cup and become a child of God.—Mother, Azusa, Cal., for the salvation of her son and his deliverance from the vice of drunkenness.—Friend, Washington, D.C., that her husband may be brought to Christ, and be relieved of the burdens that now distract his mind.—S. Falbrook, Ont., for the salvation of an intimate friend, and his deliverance from the tobacco habit.—K. A. J., Hagerstown, Md., for the conversion of a beloved father, who is an infidel; and that a beloved sister who is not saved may seek the Lord.—Sorrowing Wife, Va., that her husband, who once professed Christ, may be truly converted and delivered from his besetting sin.—B. A. H., Newton, Mass., for the conversion of a son for whom his Christian mother has been praying for forty years; also that his wife may give her heart to God.—Reader, Trenton, for the conversion of a very dear friend, and that he may speedily return to the friends who love him and are waiting to welcome him.—Sister in Christ, Grundy, Iowa, that a young man who is about to marry a Christian girl might be converted and help her in her Christian life.—Sister, New York, for the conversion of her husband, who is much discouraged through financial reverses; also that two brothers who are addicted to drink might be delivered and made sons of God.—E. M., Beloit, Wis., for the conversion of a brother and sister.—Broken-Hearted Sister, Ont., that a brother who has fallen under the power of drink may be saved in answer to the prayers of his dear old Christian father and four sisters, who beg the prayers of Christian readers for the same blessing.—M., Willow Hill, Ill., for the conversion of one who is very much beloved, but is not conscious of his need of a Saviour; also that a dear brother might give himself to the Lord.—Friend, Altoona, Pa., that God would open the eyes of a sinful woman to the wickedness of her present life, that she may be brought to repentance and may return to her husband and child and give the remainder of her life to making atonement for the sorrow and shame she has caused.—Hopeful Sister, Pa., that a brother-in-law may be converted and see the need to quit a pernicious business.—Praying Wife, Altoona, Pa., for the conversion of her husband, and that his disposition toward members of the family may become more kindly.—Widow, Spokane, Wash., for the conversion of her three sons, for which she has long been praying.—R. A., Northville, Mich., for the conversion of father, mother, brother and grandfather; also that one who is in great distress, fearing that her unpardonable sin has been committed, may receive light and the assurance of forgiveness.—M. P., Whitten, Iowa, that a dear husband and son who are not saved may give their hearts to Christ in answer to the prayers of many years.—L. M. S., Lincoln, Ill., for the conversion of an only son who is away from home.—O., Paynesville, Mo., that two sons-in-law may give their hearts to God and devote their lives to the service of Christ.—H. R., Chicago, Ill., that a dear brother now in the far Northwest among unfavorable surroundings may be led to Christ and kept from sin.—Anxious Mother, Pittsburgh, Pa., that her only son, who it is feared, is on the downward road, may be stopped, and led to seek Christ for salvation.—Subscriber, Oakland, Ill., for the conversion of two sons and a daughter-in-law, all of whom are living without hope and without God in the world.—O. B., Mobile, Ala., that two young men give their hearts to the Lord and become true Christians.—Anxious Wife and Mother, Little Valley, N. Y., for the conversion of husband, daughter, son, and daughter-in-law, and that the latter may be enabled to rain their children for Christ.—Sorrowing sister, Mankato, Kans., for the conversion of her husband.—F. A. M., Vincent, Stone, Va., for the conversion of two sons who once believed themselves to be Christians, but who have never really given their hearts to the Saviour.—Subscriber, New York City, that a whole family of three sons and four daughters might be weaned from the world and with their children serve the Lord with all purpose of heart.—Sister in Christ, Anderson, Ore., for the conversion of a brother who is far away from home and is living a life of sin; also that his father who is growing old, but is not prepared to die, may turn to the Lord and find mercy even at the eleventh hour.—Anxious Mother, Livermore, Ky., that her son, for whom many prayers have been offered, and who is now in the city exposed to temptation may be delivered from evil and if it is consistent with God's will, may yet live to preach the Gospel, also that a brother who was once numbered among the Lord's people, but has now returned to the world might be restored to God's favor.—"Unhappy One," Continental, O., for the conversion of one who has been a church-member for many years, but has never really known the Lord.—Reader, Greensburg, Pa., for the conversion of fathers, brothers and sisters; also that seven young men who have been turned from the way of life by the inconsistencies of professing Christians may return to the Lord.—C. O., Natchez, Miss., that God in his mercy would touch the hearts of an uncle, three brothers and a friend, who are all living without God, and bring them to see their need of a Saviour and that they all might be saved.—Subscriber, Conway, Mo., that a father grown old in sin may seek pardon and salvation through Christ in his old age and may be saved before it is too late; also that a man who believes in Christ, but does not attend church and is grieving the Holy Spirit, may see the error of his way and turn to the Lord.—Believer in Kansas, that her husband and sons may be saved and become workers in the Lord's vineyard.—M., that her husband and father may be delivered from their bondage to strong drink and may go to Christ for salvation.—Constant Reader, Sacramento, Calif., for the conversion of three brothers and their families, and that they may all be delivered from the power of sin.—"Anxious Mother," Unionville, Conn., for the conversion of her daughter and that she may be delivered from an infatuation that will be ruinous to her spiritual interests.—"Broken Hearted," Olive Hill, Ky., that a young man who has strayed from God, and has become addicted to an insidious drug may be delivered and may find in Christ salvation for soul and body.

Many other requests for prayer were received and were duly presented at the Converts' Prayer Meeting, as were those on Nov. 29 and Dec. 6, but we have not space this week to publish them in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

SHELBY, N. C.—For 20 years I had Catarrh, was very deaf 18 years. Dr. Moore cured me and fully restored my hearing in 1892, and it is still perfect. Mrs. J. Bastick.

For many years I suffered from Catarrh, which destroyed my hearing, and for twenty-five years I was so deaf that I could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear against it. I had tried every known remedy, and nothing gave me the slightest relief. I obtained Dr. Moore's treatment, and in three weeks my hearing began to improve, and now I can hear common conversation across a room; I can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room, 30 feet away. I think I am entirely cured, and my hearing permanently restored. Edwin Coleman, Box 585, Wichita, Kas.

Settle that vexed Christmas Gift Question this minute, and settle it better and obtain for yourself and give to another more genuine satisfaction for 99 cts. than if you invested a hundred dollars in the usual way of "hunting 'round." These famous World's Fair Souvenir Teaspoons are becoming more valuable as the World's Fair becomes a recollection, and you cannot find a more useful, a more acceptable, nor such a wonderfully artistic present at the matchless Bargain Price of 99 cents for a set of six full size Teaspoons. The set is put up in a handsomely-lined box and sent prepaid by mail. Think of six triple-plated silver full size Teaspoons with Gold-Plated and engraved bowls for only 99 cts.! No one can afford to miss such a magnificent Christmas or Holiday opportunity. Send to-day for a set.

SETTLE IT NOW!

Every visitor to the Fair knows that the price of these spoons on the Fair grounds was $1.50 apiece, or $9.00 for a set of six, or $18.00 for the entire collection of twelve different spoons, and here we sell you a set of six for only 99 cents.

JUST THINK OF IT! The spoons are divided into two different sets, as follows: SET No. 4 comprises these six buildings—Manufacturers, Horticultural, Woman's, Fisheries, Machinery Hall, Transportation. SET No. 5 comprises these six—Administration, Art, Agriculture, Electrical, Mining, Government. You can have either set you like, but under no circumstances will less than a set of six be sold, nor will they be divided in any other manner than above. Practical Religion.

Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, James 2: 20:

"Faith without works is dead."

THE Roman Catholic Church has been charged with putting too much stress upon good works and not enough upon faith. I charge Protestantism with putting not enough stress upon good works as connected with salvation. Good works will never save a man, but if a man have not good works, he has no real faith and no genuine religion. There are those who depend upon the fact that they are all right inside, while their conduct is wrong outside. Their religion, for the most part, is made up of talk—vigorous talk, fluent talk, boastful talk, perpetual talk. They will entertain you by the hour in telling you how good they are. They come up to such a higher life that they have no patience with ordinary Christians in the plain discharge of their duty.

Yonder is a river with steep and rocky banks, and it roars like a young Niagara as it rolls on over its rough bed. It does nothing but talk about itself all the way from its source in the mountain to the place where it empties into the sea. The banks are so steep that the cattle cannot come down to drink. It does not run one fertilizing rill into the adjoining field. It has not one grist mill or factory on either side. It sulks in wet weather with chilling fogs. No one cares when that river is born among the rocks, and no one cares when it dies into the sea. But yonder is another river, and it mosses its banks with the warm tides, and it rocks with floral lullaby the water lilies asleep on its bosom. It invites herds of cattle and flocks of sheep and coveys of birds to come there and drink. It has three grist mills on one side and six cotton factories on the other. It is the wealth of two hundred miles of luxuriant farms. The birds of heaven chanted when it was born in the mountains, and the ocean shipping will press in from the sea to hail it as it comes down from the Atlantic coast. The one river is a man who lives for himself. The other river is a man who lives for others.

I have often spoken to you about faith, but this morning I speak to you about works, for "faith without works is dead." I think you will agree with me in the statement that the great want of this world is more practical religion. We want practical religion to go into all merchandise. It will supervise the labelling of goods. It will not allow a man to say that a thing was made in one factory when it was made in another. It will not allow the merchant to say that watch was manufactured in Geneva, Switzerland, when it was manufactured in Massachusetts.

When practical religion goes to a ball swing in the world it will go down the street, and it will come to that shoe store and rip off the fictitious soles of many a boot maker. It will come to that clothing store and rip off the artificial collar and cuff between the neck and the throat. And this practical religion will go right into a grocery store and it will pull out the plug of all the adulterated syrups, and it will dump into the ash barrel in front of the store the cassia bark that is used to give a false color to the fruit. It will shake out the Prussian blue from the tea leaves, and it will sift from the flour plaster of Paris and bonedust and separate the one quart of water from the few honest drops of cow's milk, and it will throw out the live animalcules from the brown sugar.

There has been so much adulteration of articles of food that it is an amazement to me that there is a healthy man or woman in America. Heaven only knows what they put into the spices and into the sugars and into the butter and into the apothecary drug. But chemical analysis and the microscope have made wonderful revelations. The Board of Health in Massachusetts analyzed a great amount of what was called pure coffee, and found in it not one particle of coffee. In England there is a law that forbids the putting of alum in bread. The public authorities examined fifty-one packages of bread, and found them all guilty. The honest physician, writing a prescription, does not know but that it may bring death instead of health to his patient, because there may be one of the drugs weakened by a cheaper article, and another drug may be in full force, and so the prescription may have just the opposite effect intended.

Now, practical religion will yet rectify all this. It will go to those hypocritical professors of religion who got a "corner" in corn and wheat in Chicago and New York, sending prices up and up until they were beyond the reach of the poor, keeping these breadstuffs in their own hands, or controlling them until the prices going up and up and up, they were, after awhile, ready to sell, and they sold out, making themselves millionaires in one or two years—trying to fix the matter up with the Lord by building a church or a university or a hospital—excluding themselves with the idea that the Lord would be so pleased with the gift he would forget the swindle. Now, as such a man may not have any liturgy in which to say his prayers, I will compose for him one which he practically is making: "Oh, Lord, we, by getting a 'corner' in breadstuffs, swindled the people of the United States out of ten million dollars, and made suffering all up and down the land, and we would like to compromise this matter with thee. Thou knowest it was a scaly job, but then it was smart. Now, here we compromise it. Take one per cent. of the profits, and with that one per cent. you can build an asylum for these poor miserable ragamuffins of the street, and I will take a yacht and go to Europe, forever and ever. Amen!"

Ah! my friends, if a man hath gotten his estate wrongfully and he build a line of hospitals and universities from here to Alaska, he cannot atone for it. After awhile, this man who has been getting a "corner" in wheat, dies, and then Satan gets a "corner" in him. He goes into a great, long Black Friday. There is a "break" in the market. According to Wall street parlance, he wiped others out, and now he is himself wiped out. No collaterals on which to make a spiritual loan. Eternal defalcation.

But this practical religion will not only rectify all merchandise; it will also rectify all mechanism, and all toil. A time will come when a man will work as faithfully by the job as he does by the day. You say when a thing is slightly done, "Oh, that was done by the job." You can tell by the swiftness or slowness with which a hackman drives whether he is hired by the hour or by the excursion. If he is hired by the hour he drives very slowly, so as to make as many hours as possible. If he is hired by the excursion, he whips up the horses so as to get around and get another customer. All styles of work have to be inspected. Ships inspected, horses inspected, machinery inspected. Boss to watch the journeyman. Capitalist coming down unexpectedly to watch the boss. Conductor of a city car sounding the punch bell to prove his honesty as a passenger hands to him a clipped nickel. All things must be watched and inspected. Imperfections in the wood covered with putty. Garments warranted to last until you put them on the third time. Shoddy in all kinds of clothing. Chromos. Pinchbeck. Diamonds for a dollar and a half. Bookbindery that holds on until you read the third chapter. Spavined horses, by skillful dose of jockeys, for several days made to look spry. Wagon tires poorly put on. Horses poorly shod. Plastering that cracks without any provocation and falls off. Plumbing that needs to be plumbed. Imperfect car wheel that halts the whole train with a hot box. So little practical religion in the mechanism of the world. I tell you, my friends, the law of man will never rectify these things. It will be the all-pervading influence of the practical religion of Jesus Christ that will make the change for the better.

Yes, this practical religion will also go into agriculture, which is proverbially honest, but needs to be rectified, and it will keep the farmer from sending to the city market, veal that is too young to kill, and when the farmer farms on shares, it will keep the man who does the work from making his half three-fourths, and it will keep the farmer from building his post and rail fence on his neighbor's premises, and it will make him shelter his cattle in the winter storm, and it will keep the old elder from working on Sunday afternoon in the new ground where nobody sees him. And this practical religion will hover over the house, and over the barn, and over the field, and over the orchard.

Yes, this practical religion of which I speak will come into the learned professions. The lawyer will feel his responsibility in defending innocence and arraigning evil, and expounding the law, and it will keep him from charging for briefs he never wrote, and for pleas he never made, and for percentages he never earned, and from robbing widow and orphan because they are defenceless. Yes, this practical religion will come into the physician's life, and he will feel his responsibility as the conservator of the public health, a profession honored by the fact that Christ himself was a physician. And it will make him honest, and when he does not understand a case he will say so, not trying to cover up lack of diagnosis with ponderous technicalities, or send the patient to a reckless drugstore because the apothecary happens to pay a percentage on the prescriptions sent. And this practical religion will come to the school-teacher, making her feel her responsibility in preparing our youth for usefulness and for happiness and for honor, and will keep her from giving a sly box to a dull-head, chastising him for what he cannot help, and sending discouragement all through the after years of a lifetime. This practical religion will also come to the newspaper men, and it will help them in the gathering of the news, and it will help them in setting forth the best interests of society, and it will keep them from putting the sins of the world in larger type than its virtues, and its mistakes than its achievements, and it will keep them from misrepresenting interviews with public men, and from starting suspicions that never can be allayed; and will make them stanch friends of the oppressed instead of the oppressor.

Yes, this religion, this practical religion will come and put its hand on what is called good society, elevated society, successful society, so that people will have their expenditures within their income, and they will exchange the hypocritical "not at home" for the honest explanation "too tired," or "too busy to see you," and will keep innocent reception from becoming intoxicated conviviality.

Yea, this practical religion will have to come in and fix up the marriage relation in America. There are members of churches who have too many wives and too many husbands. Society needs to be expurgated, and washed, and fumigated, and Christianized. We want this practical religion not only to take hold of what are called the lower classes, but to take hold of what are called the higher classes. The trouble is that people have an idea they can do all their religion on Sunday with hymn-book, and prayer-book, and liturgy, and some of them sit in church rolling up their eyes as though they were ready for translation, when their Sabbath is bounded on all sides by an inconsistent life, and while you are expecting to come out from under their arms the wings of an angel, there come out from their forehead the horns of a beast.

There has got to be a new departure in religion. I do not say a new religion. Oh, no; but the old religion brought to new appliances. In our time we have had the daguerreotype, and the ambrotype, and the photograph; but it is the same old sun, and these arts are only new appliances of the old sunlight. So this glorious Gospel is just what we want to photograph the image of God on one soul, and daguerreotype it on another soul. Not a new Gospel, but the old Gospel put to new work. In our time we have had the telegraphic invention and the telephonic invention, and the electric light invention; but they are all children of old electricity, an element that the philosophers have a long while known much about. So this electric Gospel needs to flash its light on the eyes, and ears, and souls of men, and to become a telephonic medium to make the deaf hear; a telegraphic medium to dart invitation and warning to all nations; an electric light to illumine the Eastern and Western hemispheres. Not a new Gospel, but the old Gospel doing a new work.

Now you say, "That is a very beautiful theory, but is it possible to take one's religion into all the avocations and businesses of life?" Yes, and I will give you some specimens. Medical doctors who took their religion into every-day life: Dr. John Abercrombie, of Aberdeen, the greatest Scottish physician of his day, his book on "Diseases of the Brain and Spinal Cord," no more wonderful than his book on "The Philosophy of the Moral Feelings," and often kneeling at the bedside of his patients to commend them to God in prayer. Dr. John Brown, of Edinburgh, immortal as an author, dying under the benediction of the sick of Edinburgh; myself remembering him as he sat in his study in Edinburgh talking to me about Christ, and his hope of heaven. And a score of Christian family physicians in Washington just as good as they were.

Lawyers who carried their religion into their profession: Lord Cairns, the Queen's adviser for many years, the highest legal authority in Great Britain—Lord Cairns, every summer in his vacation preaching as an evangelist among the poor of his country. John McLean, Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States and President of the American Sunday School Union, feeling more satisfaction in the latter office than in the former. And scores of Christian lawyers as eminent in the Church of God as they are eminent at the bar.

Merchants who took their religion into every-day life: Arthur Tappan, derided in his day because he established that system by which we come to find out the commercial standing of business men, starting that entire system, derided for it then, himself, as I knew him well, in moral character A 1. Monday mornings inviting to a room in the top of his storehouse the clerks of his establishment, asking them about their worldly interests and their spiritual interests, then giving out a HERALDS OF THE CROSS.

Eminent Evangelists whose Labors in Many Cities Have Aided Pastors in their Work and Won Multitudes of Souls for Christ.

At the close of the five weeks of earnest, faithful labor which Mr. D. L. Moody has devoted to New York, the Christian community is better able than ever to appreciate the value of this kind of service. Ministers and laymen alike have derived benefit from Mr. Moody's visit.

"I came to arouse the churches," Mr. Moody said at his closing service in Cooper Union, "and you will notice that I have kept to that line. If you are not going to be more zealous and active, and live more in conformity with the image of Christ, then the work of the past five weeks will be like a morning cloud, and like the early dew. If you have received any good, show it—show it in your lives." Mr. Moody could not have devoted himself to a more useful work. Its success will strengthen the hands of the ministers of the city and give them consecrated helpers in their future work. In this way the labors of an evangelist become supplementary to those of the regular pastorate, and give an impetus to the churches which is felt long after the special services who were led under his preaching to dedicate their lives to Christ, showed to Mr. Hammond his future work. In England, and in Canada, and throughout his own land he has since labored with wonderful results. Many Christians, and especially the ministers, were doubtful about the propriety of receiving into church-membership children so young as some who, under Mr. Hammond's preaching, made confession of faith; but it has been a source of joy to the evangelist to find, in re-visiting towns after an interval of ten or fifteen years, the child-converts of his earlier visit grown to manhood and womanhood, and not only still standing fast in the faith, but zealous workers in the pulpit, the Sunday-school or the church. Mr. Hammond is still active, although now sixty-five years of age, and still retains his love for the work among the children.

Rev. George C. Needham, though a much younger man than the famous "Children's Evangelist," has almost as long a record of service. In 1866 he was actively engaged in evangelistic work, and was considering the propriety of taking a college course as a preparation for the regular ministry. Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, whose first volunteers in the War, and he served to its close, rising to the rank of adjutant. He took part in no less than twenty-five battles, and had some marvelous escapes from death. Some of his most striking illustrations are drawn from his experiences in the camp and on the field.

Rev. B. Fay Mills, one of the younger members of the group, has been blessed with some of the most extensive revivals of the last decade. He is the son of an eminent New Jersey minister, and is still under forty years of age. He began his training for the ministry in his sixteenth year, and was the pastor of a church before he was twenty-one. His success in his own church and the frequent requests for help in revivals, from other ministers, led him to devote himself exclusively to evangelistic work. In Philadelphia, Boston, Indianapolis, St. Paul and other cities where a large number of churches united in the services he conducted, there have been large gatherings of souls.

Rev. Thomas Harrison, so long and affectionately denominated "the Boy Preacher," can no longer lay claim to the title on the ground of juvenility. His record of service proves him rather a veteran in Christ's army; but he retains his love of service and the characteristics which distinguished his early labors. For more than twenty years Mr. Harrison has preached the Gospel with energy and an apostolic fervor which have moved great congregations and have stirred the hearts of thousands and led them to seek Christ. Services which he was invited to hold for a period of two weeks, have often continued for twenty weeks, no Christian man daring or desiring to check the mighty force which was carrying multitudes of souls into the fold of the church. From the time of the great revival in Baltimore in 1876, to the present, Mr. Harrison has labored energetically in the evangelistic field, and both in churches and camp-meetings has been richly blessed.

Rev. C. H. Yatman, who like Mr. Harrison, has served in the ranks of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is one of those earnest preachers whose call to service was the behest of a Power greater than human ordination. It came to him when he was engaged in business, and when all circumstances appeared to be against his obeying. But the Lord had need of him and the path was opened. In his services at Ocean Grove, N. J., and in many large cities in different parts of the country, Mr. Yatman has had opportunities of addressing enormous audiences, and large numbers have been led by him to identify themselves with the Lord's people. He has recently visited Australia on an evangelistic tour, and prior to that journey, he went to England to study the Forward Movement as a preparation for a prolonged work in New York.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman is one of the few evangelists who have succeeded in uniting the pastoral relation with their wider labors. Dr. Chapman appears to combine in a rare degree the talents required for both fields of labor. As pastor of the great Bethany church of Philadelphia, and as leader of revivals in distant cities, in which large numbers of churches have united, he has seemed to be equally at home and to be able to turn readily from one sphere of work to the other.

Rev. R. G. Pearson is best known in our Southern States, where he has labored with wonderful success for ten years past. When, during the Evangelistic movement connected with the World's Fair, Mr. Moody was looking for helpers to preach the Gospel to the crowds of pilgrims to Chicago, he sent an urgent invitation to Mr. Pearson, whose footsteps, he said, he had traced everywhere through the South in churches, Y. M. C. A. halls and other permanent works of usefulness. Since his successful services in Chicago, Mr. Pearson has labored in various cities in the East and West, but has continued to give his chief attention to the South where multitudes in churches of all denominations ascribe their conversion to God's blessing on his preaching.

MR. D. L. MOODY GIVING HIS FAREWELL ADDRESS AT COOPER UNION, NEW YORK.

have terminated. During the past quarter of a century the church has more and more learned the usefulness of this aid to its work, and God has raised up large numbers of devoted men specially qualified for its performance. On our first page are portraits of a few of these, whose labors have been the means of bringing a multitude of souls in many cities into the kingdom of God.

The portrait of Mr. Moody in the centre of the group was painted expressly for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by an artist who has succeeded in getting a remarkably faithful likeness of the famous Evangelist. It is impossible to obtain a photograph of Mr. Moody, as he has an invincible repugnance to sitting for his portrait, and has for years resisted the entreaties of his most intimate friends to allow a photograph to be taken.

Rev. Edward Payson Hammond is the veteran of the group. Mr. Hammond has been thirty-six years in the evangelistic field. It was during a visit to Scotland in the year 1860 that his mission in life was first made plain to him. Six years before that time while a student at Andover, and subsequently at Union Theological Seminary, New York, he had been an active and zealous worker and a popular preacher, but it was at Edinburgh and other Scottish cities that the numbers of children advice he sought, counseled against the plan and urged him, like the apostle Paul, to straightway preach Christ, waiting no other preparation than the unction of the Spirit, which had been given to him. He was a mere boy at the time, but he took the advice, and throughout Great Britain and America he soon became known to all the churches, as a powerful and eloquent preacher. Of late years Mr. Needham has been best remembered by his Bible Readings and his expositions of the Word. He is a most diligent Bible student and has a profound conviction of the efficacy of "the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God."

Dr. L. W. Munhall, the next in order in the group of portraits, is well known in all our States from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Some remarkable revivals have been witnessed in many cities under his labors. After a series of services in the Brooklyn Tabernacle, Dr. Talmage said of him: "He is a magnetic speaker of great power. When he opens his Gospel batteries, loaded with exegesis, argument, illustration and anecdote, the hearer must either surrender or retreat into hopeless obduracy." More than six hundred persons joined Dr. Talmage's church at the close of that series of services. Dr. Munhall has a military record as well as that of a soldier of Christ. He was one of the hymn, leading in prayer, giving them a few words of good advice, asking them what church they attended on the Sabbath, what the text was, whether they had any especial troubles of their own. Arthur Tappan. I never heard his eulogy pronounced. I pronounce it now. And other merchants just as good. William E. Dodge in the iron business, Moses H. Grinnell in the shipping business, Peter Cooper in the glue business. Scores of men, just as good as they were.

Farmers who take their religion into their occupation: Why, this minute their horses and wagons stand around all the meeting houses in America. They began this day by a prayer to God, and when they get home at noon, after they have put their horses up, will offer a prayer to God at the table, seeking a blessing, and next summer there will be in their fields not one dishonest head of rye, not one dishonest ear of corn, not one dishonest apple. Worshipping God to-day away up among the Berkshire Hills, or away down amid the lagoons of Florida, or away out amid the mines of Colorado, or along the banks of the Potomac, and the Raritan, where I knew them better because I went to school with them.

Mechanics who took their religion into their occupations: James Brindley, the famous millwright, Nathaniel Bowditch, the famous ship-chandler, Elihu Burritt, the famous blacksmith, and hundreds and thousands of strong arms which have made the hammer and the saw and the adze and the drill and the axe sound in the grand march of our national industries.

Give your heart to God and then fill your life with good works. Consecrate to him your store, your shop, your banking house, your factory, and your home. They say no one will hear it. God will hear it. That is enough. You hardly know of anyone else than Wellington as connected with the victory at Waterloo; but he did not do the hard fighting. The hard fighting was done by the Somerset cavalry and the Ryland regiments, and Kemp's infantry, and the Scots Grays, and the Life Guards. Who cares, if only the day was won?

In the latter part of the last century a girl in England became a kitchen maid in a farmhouse. She had many styles of work and much hard work. Time rolled on, and she married the son of a weaver of Halifax. They were industrious, they saved money enough after awhile to build them a home. On the morning of the day when they were to enter that home, the young wife arose at four o'clock, entered the front dooryard, knelt down, consecrated the place to God, and there made this solemn vow: "O Lord, if thou wilt bless me in this place, the poor shall have a share of it." Time rolled on and a fortune rolled in. Children grew up around them, and they all became affluent, one a member of Parliament, in a public place declared that his success came from that prayer of his mother in the dooryard. All of them were affluent. Four thousand hands in the factories. They build dwelling houses for laborers at cheap rents, and where they were invalid and could not pay they had the houses for nothing. One of these sons came to this country, admired our parks, went back, bought land, opened a great public park, and made it a present to the city of Halifax, England. They endowed an orphanage, they endowed two almshouses. All England has heard of the generosity and the good works of the Crossleys. Moral: Consecrate to God your small means and your humble surroundings, and you will have larger means and grander surroundings. "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is and of that which is to come." "Have faith in God by all means, but remember that faith without works is dead."

Christ's Ascension.

Sunday School Lesson for January 3d, 1897.

Acts 1: 1-14. Golden Text, Luke 24: 51. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HE purpose of our Lord's life on earth was accomplished. He had been able to say to his Father, "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do" (John 17: 4), and now he who had "been made for a little while lower than the angels . . . because of the suffering of death [is] crowned with glory and honor, that by the grace of God he should taste death for every man" (Heb. 2: 9, R. V.). He had now made a way. He had himself become for every man's salvation from hell, from sin and from self. He had purchased and secured the right and power to impart his own life and nature to all who would deny their own life and nature. His work of redemption was done.

But now the time was come when he must visibly depart, and his human body, which had passed through death without seeing corruption, must be taken up to heaven; the unanswerable proof to his own disciples of all which he had done for them, suffered for them, taught them and promised them; and the proof which should some day convince an unbelieving world that it was the Prince of Glory whom they had crucified. Once during the days of his ministry, when he had spoken of the wondrous truth of how he would impart his very life and nature, his very flesh and blood to them that believed, and they said, "This is a hard saying; who can hear it?" he had answered them, "Doth this offend you? What and if ye shall see the Son of Man ascend up where he was before?" (John 6: 61, 62.) As though to say, It is no more impossible to communicate my nature to you than it is for me to take your nature back with me into heaven.

The cross and the resurrection had prepared his disciples for this ascension into heaven, and yet it was only to the woman who had understood and had entered into the purpose of his death, to whom he could communicate the wondrous message which she should carry to the disciples: "I ascend to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God" (John 20: 17, R. V.). He had "opened their understanding that they might understand the Scriptures" (Luke 24: 45), and had breathed upon them that they might receive the Holy Spirit. He had "given commandment through the Holy Ghost unto the apostles whom he had chosen; to whom he also showed himself alive after his passion by many proofs, appearing unto them by the space of forty days, and speaking the things concerning the kingdom of God." Moreover, before his crucifixion he had told them very plainly, "I came out from the Father, and came into the world; and now I go out from the world, and come again to the Father." (John 16: 28, 29.)

The events which had so recently taken place had been such that the disciples were like ships in a storm, which had broken from their anchor, and were tossed about by the waves of doubt and fear. His frequent appearance alive among them had only increased their faith in, and loyalty to him. And now, "being assembled together with them, he said unto them, 'Behold, I am sending you forth as witnesses unto all men.'

The Promise of the Father.

which, said he, ye heard from me: for John indeed baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence." (Act 1: 4, 5) Later on, they understood his meaning, when he had said: "It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you;" but if I go, I will send him unto you. (John 16: 7).

Our beloved Lord, in his human life on earth, was limited as we are; he could not be in more than one place at a time. But he had accomplished a wondrous work, the union of God and man in one entire human life, and had proved the possibility of God dwelling in man, and making him one with God. He had died, as a seed dies which is buried in the earth, that a harvest of men indwelt by God, might arise out of his death; blood-bought men, saved and cleansed by his blood, but indwelt by the Holy Spirit, who came to take his place, and to dwell not only with us but in us, and to impart to us the spirit and nature of our most blessed and holy Lord. This is why he so insisted on their waiting for the Spirit, "the promise of the Father."

The Apostles were all Jews. Many points of Scripture in the Old Testament should come again, would be the invisible power of God the Holy Ghost, making them like Jesus, and empowering them to do the work which he did, and yet greater works (John 15: 12). He must before all else have a people on whom he could count as his Father had counted on him. A people who should represent him as he had represented the Father, being his express image. This was the kingdom he sought, and the outward kingdom must wait until the triumph of the Lord in his hidden kingdom was complete, and he could manifest in glory with himself at his coming a people completely conformed to him through whom and with whom he could, later on, accomplish his reign on earth, and bless all nations. And the disciples began to understand now the mystery of the kingdom of God and the secret of Christ's reign.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the use of Sunday School Teachers.

DURING the whole of next year, the International Lessons are concerned with the labors of the Apostles, in preaching the Gospel and founding churches. As most of the Lessons are taken from the Acts of the Apostles, a few remarks on the book, as a whole, may be useful. It has been ascribed to Silas, to Timothy and to others, but there can be little doubt that Luke was really the author. Its resemblance, both in language and style, to the Gospel that bears his name, confirms the testimony of early Christian writers that it was written by him. Very little is known about him. That he was a physician we

"THE MOUNT CALLED OLIVET."

—the only Bible they had to study—had been explained by their Lord; but, as Jews, they could not understand how the Messiah could ascend into heaven without accomplishing the promises of the restoration of the kingdom to Israel with which the Scriptures abound. The Lord by no means says they are wrong in their expectations, but the question is one of "times and seasons which the Father hath put in his own power" (or R. V., "set within his own authority"). Paul almost repeated these words when writing to the Thessalonians of the coming of the Lord to take away "them that are alive and remain." He says, "But of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you. For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night (1. Thes. 5: 1, 2): the most unexpected thing. The day of the Lord includes both the coming of the Lord for them that wait for him, and also the setting up of his kingdom on earth."

"But ye shall receive power, when the Holy Ghost is come upon you; and ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth."

He then speaks of the "people, a 'people for his name'; then Israel, blest as a nation; then 'the residue of the Gentiles who shall come to the Lord, my Lord, and shall glorify him.' Already in the history of the disciples, we see the beginning of the work to happen. The kingdom was first to be in their own hearts, and then work from within outward. The power, until he such person. The name means a Lover or Friend of God, and it may have been that Luke intimates that both works are for the benefit of any person who may come under that designation. The question is not important, as Theophilus, if there was such a man, placed both treatises at the service of the whole church. In the Acts, Luke does not attempt to write a history of the Apostolic days. There are in the Epistles references to important events which Luke does not mention. His purpose appears to have been to show, by specimen facts, the operation in the labors of the Apostles, of that Gospel which, in his earlier work he had described as preached by the Lord himself. He repeats, as an appropriate introduction, the narrative of the ascension, with which he had closed his Gospel. That introduction is the subject of the Lesson. Luke doubtless did not witness it, but probably heard it described by Peter or some other Apostle who was present. It was the fitting close of the resurrection-life. Christ had vanished repeatedly after his resurrection from the view of his disciples, but on this occasion they evidently understood that their intercourse with him was closed, and they would see him no more until he returned in glory. But Luke's whole story represents him as living and being cognizant of everything that occurred, and as operating through the Spirit in the church. The Apostles were sadly conscious of his absence, but they had a clear and strong realization of being under his eye and of acting by his power and under his direction. Even at the ascension, however, they had not learned the lesson Christ had labored to instill into their minds during the whole of his ministry. They asked him if he was about to restore the kingdom to Israel; showing how they clung to the grossly material view of his mission, and even to the last, had no conception of the infinitely grander idea of the worldwide spiritual kingdom which he died to establish. Not until the descent of the Spirit was their understanding opened to this truth, and it was not grasped fully even then. If they could have had their way, Christianity would have been a Jewish sect.

It is not for you to know . . . but ye shall receive power. Christ knew what would be the chief need of the disciples whom he was about to leave. They were concerned about honors and dignities in his kingdom; he wanted them to work for him. People have needed a similar admonition since then. The story is told that in the fifth century there was a class of monks called solitaries, who claimed to be too spiritual to do the secular work expected of the monks. They would not teach in the schools nor attend to the duties of the monastery. One day a solitary arrived at a monastery, and seeing all the monks busy, addressed them from his superior standpoint: "Labor not for the meat that perisheth." The Abbot replied: "Very good, brother, our Lord's own words. Will you retire to a cell to meditate?" The solitary accepted the proffered hospitality. After some hours he grew hungry. He heard the signal for the mid-day meal, but no one was sent to summon him. He heard the signal for the evening meal, and wondered that he was not invited. The next morning when there was still no invitation to the table, he became ravenous and went in search of food. But the brothers who had been at work had eaten the small supply and the larder was empty. The solitary complained, but the Abbot pointed out to him that the monks whom he had reproved were at least entitled to the meat for which they had worked, and that following the Apostolic example, they had united work with worship, it being the rule of the monastery that if any man would not work, neither should he eat.

Jesus began both to do and teach. His life here was only the beginning of the work that he will carry on to the end. It has often been interrupted, because men would neither learn nor co-operate with him. The Cathedral of Cologne is one of the most beautiful ecclesiastical buildings in the world. The original plans were drawn in 1250 and work commenced. It proceeded irregularly and was suspended when there was war, or other disturbing causes. Not until 1830 were the original plans again hunted up, and an earnest effort made to complete the structure according to the design. In 1863, more than six hundred years after the plans were drawn, the cathedral was finished with the exception of the towers.

QUAINT SOUTHERN HOMES.

The Historic Country of Kiawah and its Deserted and Decaying Colonial Mansions — A Picturesque Section of the Sunny South.

URING the latter part of the seventeenth century, when our fathers were too busy making history to be able to record it accurately, names and boundaries shifted strangely, like the phantasmagosquirrels, raccoons, 'possums, wild turkeys, ducks, and partridges. Its rivers still abound in excellent fish. But the old Colonial homesteads time has not used so gently. Their days are numbered. Each year leaves one more empty and desolate, or levels another to the ground.

Just where the Eastern and Western branches of the Cooper River diverge abruptly from the main stream, there stands an old plantation known as "Coming T," or "Comingtee," settled by John Coming in 1669, and still owned by the direct descendants of his nephew and heir, Elias Ball. It was here that he lived with "that woman of eminent piety—Affra, his wife," who, on her death, endowed the Church of St. Philip, in Charleston, with the property which constitutes the Giebe lands of St. Philip's and St. Michael's to-day. It was this brave old mariner, John Coming who, having lost his ship off Charlestown bar, raised and decked his long boat, crossed the Atlantic in her and sailed up the Thames safely to London, as an answer to those who had hinted that his vessel had been lost through lack of skill or courage.

At Coming T, one may linger beside the quaint old well and horse-trough, and hold instructive converse with old negro "mammys," of a type fast passing away. Or one may seek solitude on the "Big Reserve" about which, perhaps, the strangest of all the strange stories is told. This is a lovely lake, well stocked with trout and perch and bream, as well as with alligators and "cooters." With its irregular shores all overhanging with water-oaks, willows and cypress, runists, it is described as "my Soop Spoon, bought at Vandue, and then supposed to have been silver."

Another of these old Colonial homes is

The people who dwell in that region to-day, shorn of all that would seem to the dwellers in great cities to make life valuable, poor in purse, and dropping behind in ria of a dream. The spacious and deep rivers of South Carolina, in whose embrace the city of Charleston lies to-day, were then the Kiawah and the Etiwan, and the region through which they flowed was known as the Country of Kiawah. Later, these rivers were re-named the Ashley and the Cooper, in honor of the Earl of Shaftsbury.

In this same "Country of Kiawah," there stretches to-day a region unknown to the tourist, but rich in natural beauty and in legendary and historic lore. Here are the homes of some of the most remarkable men of the Revolution, and here occurred some of the most stirring events of that momentous period. Here, too, a century before the Revolution, Palatine, Cacique, and Landgrave held sway over wide-spreading signories and baronies of virgin forest and fertile swamp.

Visit this region when the smoke of the burning stubble blurs the blue of the winter skies; when spring has faintly touched the flat, brown fields with emerald; in the hush of brooding summer, or the bustle of the busy harvest days, and you will find it, in all its natural features, a land of peace and plenty. Nature is prodigal of her gifts. Every tree that falls is covered speedily with little creeping ferns and gay green things, which veil the process of decay. Every old homestead wears a wealth of verdure which crowns its last sad days with grace. Every pine barren gleams with scarlet Catesby lilies; with the myriad-tinged golden and silver "antique lamps" of the orchis; with the rosy whiteness of the azalea, or the orange rays of the coreopsis. Spring scents every solitude with incomparable odors of yellow jessamine and magnolia. Every ditch has its blue iris and every swamp its pond-lily; and still, when summer nights brood sweetly over the land, there fly through the darkling glades winged things "who carry their lanterns in their tails in dark nights, shining like sparks of fire, enlightening it with their ning off into little creeks and bayous and inlets, with unexpected charming nooks, where trailing vines of wild grapes and scarlet-trumpeted bignonia, and grey festoons of pendant moss make long lines of cool shadow across the sunlit waters. It is so wild, so tangled, so free, so silent and so remote, that no suggestion of any artificial origin lingers with it. Here one may lie at the bottom of a "dug-out" of a pleasant April evening, and dream of Italy or Japan!

The Coming T house is full of anecdotes of Elias Ball, John Coming's nephew and heir—called variously by his descendants, "The First Elias," "Elias Red-Cap," or simply, "Old Red-Cap," and his portrait hangs on the wall of the dining-room. One crosses the river to Middleburgh—named from the Dutch town of that name—to see the large silver tankard and the "Soop Spoon," which he left in his will to his son, John Coming Ball. The "Soop Spoon" is quaintly fashioned, with a finely-seasoned handle of black ebony. In the will, which still ex-

Laurens—"Tower." Laurens, as he was always called by his neighbors after his imprisonment in the Tower of London. A flat stone in the woods marks the spot where, by his own wish, his dead body was burned in a pile of fat pine knots soaked in turpentine. This was probably the first cremation in America. There is Childbury Town, which once boasted a Free School, Town Common, Church, and Club-house. It was founded by James Child, who fled to Carolina to escape the cruelties of Judge Jeffreys. It was here that little Catharine Chicken was tied to a tombstone as a punishment, by a wicked schoolmaster and "left alone all night to face the goblins and the beasts of prey." Nothing of all this now remains but two tall chimneys and "Strawberry Chapel." Besides these, there is "Silk Hope," where Sir Nathaniel Johnson retired from cares of state to plant mulberry trees and introduce silk culture; "Mulberry Castle," built in 1714, Hyde Park and Richmond, Windsor and Kensington—all old-world places, enriched by many associations. "Marion, the Swamp Fox," has left a memory in every woodland nook, and stories of Revolutionary battles come with more recent flavor from the lips of the people of Cooper River, than do memories of our Civil War from those who live elsewhere. The curiosities and charms of the country of Kiawah do not lie in its past alone.

the worldly race, are unique in their unworldliness, their refinement and their hospitality. Perhaps never before have there been exactly such people in the world, and when these pass away, this type will pass also with the singular conditions which produce it.

It is interesting to note that when Coming T was presented by the ancestors of most of these people, Hudibras was a recent creation, the contemporaneous political mockery of which was in full flavor; the city of London had not long since passed through the Great Plague and the Great Fire; Christopher Wren was just planning St. Paul's; Pepys was immortalizing his own periwigs and the patches on his wife's face; Milton and Sir Peter Lely were still alive, and Dryden—the centre of the wits of the day at Will's Coffee House—had lately become Poet Laureate of England.

Recalling all these things, a faint fragrance of the Puritan Age, as well as of the turbulent, triumphant Restoration Days, seems to cling to the, high, dim rooms, and to the deep-hearted woodlands without.

JENNIE HASKELL ROSE.

The Lesson of the Phonograph.

A few days ago, writes Mr. Gilmour, a missionary, I spoke into a phonograph, and it was wonderful how my breath made an impression on the wax cylinder, and enabled the machine to read off what had been spoken into the instrument, and confront me with my own words, and very tone of voice; and it made me think how God has said that our own words shall condemn us—out of our own mouths shall we be condemned.

Some people no doubt laugh to scorn such an idea, but the very breath which we use marks in the books of God's remembrance the words, aye, the thoughts by which we shall be judged and condemned, except the blood of Christ Jesus be drawn over the page, and obliterate the writing, even as the hand drawn over the waxen cylinder of the phonograph obliterates all the impressions therein, and the record is lost. It is awful for a sinner to realize that he has to account for the evil done in the flesh by thought, word, and deed, and the very fear of facing such a record should drive him to Christ for pardon and obliteration of the records he has made in the past.

In Holiday Time.

IN RE we are again with Christmas just before us—the most joyous season of all the year. I woke up the other night somewhere between midnight and two o'clock in the morning and could not again fall asleep. The city is unlike the country in one respect: we never have in town at night that absolute stillness and sense of repose which reigns in the wide fields and quiet roads of the countryside. Intermittently at least all night long there is the rumble of railway trains on the elevated, or the clangor of cable and trolley cars, and often there are people passing by so that one hears the tramp of feet, or now and then a snatch of song, or perhaps the murmur of voices engaged in leave-taking when parties of people have come home from some late evening affair of pleasure or business.

But even in a bustling city, there is a little space of time after midnight which is comparatively still, and when one may rise, look from her window, and see the solemn march of the stars in the deep distant blue of the skies and fancy herself for a little while alone with God. As I did this, looking up at the floor of heaven all studded with silver points of light, there came to my mind suddenly, as if some one had spoken them, these words: "He was born in a stable and laid in a manger." And then there passed in vision before my mind the scene of that wonderful night when our Lord was born, when the shepherds watching their flocks were suddenly startled by the sound of the heavenly music, when the wise men following the star sought the place where Mary and the young Child were: when they brought to him—these wise men and these shepherds—gifts, gold, frankincense, and myrrh.

I wish that we could hear that song of the angels:

Still through the cloven skies they come
With silent wings untraced,
And their white robes gleam
On all the silent world.

But our ears are too dull, our eyes too dim, to see and hear the angels. We are so taken up with the machinery of living that life is almost gone before we begin to enjoy it. Sometimes it seems as if nobody except the little children have time in this world to be happy; there is so much care, there are so many anxieties, there is so much work to be done, that we cannot be glad of heart and light of step as the little ones are.

One of the sweetest things about Christmas is that it gathers the whole world again about the cradle of the Child, the little Child who was born in a stable and laid in a manger. No child in our homes has ever had birth so lowly as that of Our Lord. He was the highest of all, but he came to be the servant of all, and so he holds out his blessed arms in love to every one of us, and the one who is the most like a child has the most of Christ in his or her heart.

These thoughts come to us all, not only in the night, but in the day-time, at this season of the year. The woods are full of spiky evergreens and shining holly, which have been growing for Christmas festivals, the shops in town are bewilderingly beautiful, and most of us have been thinking and planning for a good while how remember at the holiday time. I never am dignified and stately as usual, but loaded with bundles of all sizes, their pockets bulging, their arms full, and their very faces lighted up as if they were Santa Claus in person. As for women and children, why they are just bubbling over with excitement and joy.

The question is always coming up among conscientious people what they should do with regard to Santa Claus, the dear old saint. A mother writes to me, "Ought I to deceive my little boy by telling him there is a Santa Claus, when his father and I are the ones who send him the gifts, and there is really no Santa Claus, there are no reindeer, there is no jolly personage tiptoeing down the chimney? Shall I tell my boy an untruth?"

My feeling about this dear puzzled mother, is that is really not an untruth. There may not be a literal Santa Claus, but the spirit of Santa Claus is abroad, and it does no harm to tell our little children that when they go to sleep on Christmas eve the jolly old St. Nicholas is busy about the world. He really is busy; I believe in him fully myself, just as fully as I did when I was a child—and you must remember that it does no harm to cultivate the imagination. Imagination is a divine thing; people who do not have it cannot have so much faith as others do. It gives wings to the soul, and even as children grow older if they learn that the literal Santa Claus is not to be found, yet they learn by degrees that there is a subtle and real truth behind the imagery which makes them better and shows them that there is love abroad in the world. No child will ever be taught falsehood by the beautiful myth of Santa Claus. For the myth of St. Nicholas has its birth in the love the

The Roses of Texas.

A Texas reader of this journal sends the following attractive description of the Rose of Texas:

I noticed some time ago an article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD about the roses of Texas. I never knew what a real rose looked like until I saw the Rose of Texas. They bloom in the Northwest are so inferior. They bloom in the year. The climate is tempered the entire year by the Gulf of Mexico, our summers delightful, and our winters like May and September in the North. We have our own Mediterranean. The fringe of fine country on the sloping shores of the Gulf is easily reached, sheltered on the north by a great forest. We are spared from the penetrating "Northerners" that sweep down in many parts of the South. Those who come, linger, and come again and again. Indeed, I often wonder why our wealthy people spend their thousands in foreign lands, hunting a warm nesting-place, when they could come here and bask in the Texas sunshine, amid magnificent flora, and hunt and fish to their heart's content. No better hunting-ground can be found. Deer, wild turkey, and all the smaller game in abundance within a few miles from town. While going twenty-five miles to the "Thicket," you can enjoy the rare sport of bagging bear, and at the same time enjoy the best of health.

I look at the vast acres of rich, cheap land (filling up, but still plenty of room), and think how easy it would be for all to make for themselves a beautiful home and a good living here on a few acres well cultivated to fruit, nuts, strawberries, and general farming. Strawberries set out in December will bear abundantly the following March. Fig trees bear at one year old, the most delicious fruit, and two crops a year; peaches at two years, pears at five. All vegetation has a correspondingly rapid growth. It is a place where poor people can make happy homes at small expense, free from the discomforts of a cold climate, and where they receive a royal welcome. Thousands of acres in a body can be had to colonize Armenians or others, where they can have free schools and churches as they like. A good many Northern

An Ocean Paradise.

Charms of Life in the Azores — Tropical Scenery and Delightful Surroundings.

COMPARATIVELY little is known by the busy world about the Azores or Western Islands, lying in mid-Atlantic about 800 miles off the Portuguese coast. There is no more delightful or salubrious climate to be found among the different island groups in either Atlantic or Pacific. Americans who sojourn on these islands in the course of travel, find them a semi-tropical paradise.

Our photographs on this page present interesting phases of life on two of the Azores group. Pico, one of the largest of the islands has a volcano which is quite an interesting sight. The rugged sides of the mountain, covered with slag, broken rock and cinders, and the steep ascent where the stones slip from beneath your feet and go crashing down the mountain side, afford quite an adventurous trip, with just enough danger to make it exciting. The large cone of the volcano is encircled by a number of smaller ones. At times a thin blue streak of smoke can be seen issuing from it. Pico is a great summer resort for the wealthier people of the islands. The country girls are noted for their beauty and for the luxuriance of their dark-brown hair, which they wear brushed back and tied in a knot behind. Some are dressed in blue, others in vivid shades of different colors. When the village girls go to the fountain with water-jars poised on their heads they are extremely graceful! They drop bunches of ferns into the wells to keep it fresh and cool, and to prevent splashing.

Terceira, Corvo, San Jorge, Graziosa, Flores, Fayal, and San Miguel are other islands of the Azores group, the last-named the largest of all. Ponta Delgada, the capital of San Miguel, is a very attractive town. Surrounded by hills, the town itself is spread along the coast and has very good harbor. Fountains of clear, sparkling water are set in stone walls in the streets and were at some former time painted in bright colors, now nearly worn off. There is very little social life in San Miguel, the rich having few social duties to claim their evenings, and the poor being too wretched to afford any lights. A military band discourses music in the public square of an afternoon, and this, with the frequent religious processions and the gatherings that assemble to listen to a tale told by some public entertainer, seems to afford all the social diversion the Azoreans desire. Market days are Friday and Sunday. In the market are booths of all descriptions, with a fountain in the centre. There is always a tempting display of semi-tropical fruit at the Ponta Delgada market and the barefooted peasants and well-dressed people, including visitors, crowd the square on such occasions. A red-letter day is the day when the mail arrives. People come flocking in from the country round about and lounge near the post-office until the fading day warns them homeward, chatting together in their soft, liquid language which still retains the Spanish impress that dates from the time when Spain was the greatest colonizing power on the globe.

Everywhere in the Azores, the scenery is beautiful and the climate is a perpetual delight to all who go there.

people have located here in the past few years, and more are coming, with the building of railroads, to our Gulf ports, and the diverting of the export traffic on account of the shorter haul from the great grain and produce centres of the Northwest.

THE MORMONS OF TO-DAY

MORMON IMPIETY.

Their Teachings Filled with Blaphemies—Examples of False Teaching from the Mormon Catechism—Mormon Wealth and Power.

SOMETHING of the official touch of the Mormon church is seen if we consider the number of its officers. It makes the utmost use of the fondness of promotion in the human breast. There may not be, as charged, an officer for every member, but the number of officers is well-nigh past finding out. A recent inquiry results in the statement that there are 50,000 officers. In 1884 there were, according to official statistics, 5,022 deacons, 1,786 teachers, 1,611 priests; elders, 12,191; "seventies," 4,747; high priests, 413; patriarchs, 68; apostles, 12; and a first presidency of three. Each rank has specific duties, and is organized into quorums. Should Brigham Young's famous dictum, "I have a perfect right to dictate in everything, from the setting up of a stocking, to the ribbons on a woman's bonnet," ever become possible of realization under a future president, what an army would his church militant find in this corps of officers! No one can state with exactness the wealth of the Mormon church; it claims its tenth. Under the union of church and State, when the declaration of John Taylor was generally accepted among them, to the effect that the priesthood is the only legitimate rule on earth, and all nations will have to submit to it, the tithes were rigorously collected. Recently it is reported that the collections have fallen off. But the buildings erected by the church, to say nothing of the immigration fund, are significant. There is a hall or church for every congregation, and several temples for the performance of their secret rites and ceremonies, their sealing or marriage, their washing, anointing and laying on of hands. But their most important buildings are in Salt Lake City. Here are their church headquarters, their great tithing house, printing establishment, and central offices for all departments of work, such as missions and Sabbath schools; their unique Tabernacle and their great Temple altogether occupying a square of the city. The tabernacle is a large, low meeting-place with a roof shaped like the side of an egg-shell, the convex side turned up. It is said to have the largest seating capacity of any auditorium in the country. Its large organ and its acoustic properties are much praised. The temple nearby is of gray granite and covers 21,250 square feet; its walls are nine feet thick at the bottom and six at the top; it is reported to have cost $6,000,000. Here is the seat of the Mormon power; hence, goes out the orders to the faithful in all lands. The missionaries do not at first preach such Mormon doctrines as their polytheism. Dr. D. J. McMillan, Corresponding Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, has published a pamphlet entitled, "Mormon Articles of Faith Explained." All his statements are verified by quotations from approved Mormon authorities. It would be well if a copy were in the hands of every American citizen. Here is clearly shown their belief in the gift of tongues, prophesy, revelations, healing, and so forth. Dr. McMillan aptly calls attention to the fact that in spite of their gift of tongues they had to learn like other people, the languages they attempted to use, whether French, German or Indian. He cites specifically the unfulfilled prophecies of Kimball, Pratt, and Brigham Young and quotes Brigham Young as once saying that "if one in ten of his prophecies were fulfilled he thought he was succeeding pretty well as a prophet." There is abundant evidence of the irreverence, profanity and deceit of their earlier prophets. Once set up such a class of men over their fellows and let it become a fixed belief among their followers that they are the vice-gerents of the Almighty on the earth, and speak and act the Divine will, and what may not be expected in the way of doctrine and action? What do they care for the God-head or manhood that is not subservient to their purposes? Why should they enquire what is right or what ought to be? Or what is for the welfare of others? Their unholiness may be expected to direct. Out of this condition comes the absurdities that impress any student of their teachings or affairs. Take this from a sermon by the prophet, Brigham Young, in the Tabernacle, April 9, 1852: "When our father, Adam, came into the Garden of Eden, he came into it with a celestial body and brought Eve, one of his wives, with him. He helped to make and organize this world. He is Michael, the Archangel, the Ancient of Days, about whom holy men have written and spoken. He is our father and our God, and the only God with whom we have to do." Again, he declares, "I tell you that God was the Father of Jesus Christ just as I am the father of my son." Apostle Kimball declared July 11th, 1852: "Jesus was the son of God and Hiram Smith was a patriarch and a son of God, and I bear witness of it unto all men." Oct. 6th, 1854, Apostle Hyde said, "If at the Marriage of Cana, of Galilee, Jesus was the Bridegroom and took unto him Mary, Martha and the other Mary, whom Jesus loved, it shocked not our nerves. If there was not attachment and familiarity between our Saviour and these women, highly improper only in the relation of husband and wife, then we have no sense of propriety." The Apostle Hyde continues:

We say it was Jesus Christ who was married, whereby he could see his seed before he was crucified. I shall say here that before the Saviour died he looked upon his own natural children as we looked upon ours. When Mary came to the sepulchre she saw two angels and they said unto her, "Woman, why weepest thou?" She said unto them, "Because they have taken away my Lord or husband."

On Sunday, September 15, 1857, Apostle H. C. Kimball said:

Well, let me tell you the Holy Ghost is a man; he is one of the sons of our father and our God, and he is that man that stood next to Jesus Christ, just as I stand by Brigham Young. You think our Father and our God is not a lively, sociable and cheerful man; he is one of the most lively men that ever lived.

Dr. McMillan was one of the first Presbyterian missionaries when the danger to those proclaiming pure Gospel was so great that for his protection he was compelled to preach with his revolver lying beside him on his pulpit. He had ample occasion to know from personal observation, the character of Mormon leaders, and asks:

Church schools, they were not satisfied with five days public instruction and one day of Sunday School instruction, but the youngest children were called together

Saturdays. Under the care of the most skilful matron that could be found they were occupied and diverted not by well devised kindergarten methods but by all the devices the matron in charge could invent, plays, dances, making dolls, and other articles which might be possible—all exercises pervaded with the spirit of Mormonism, and the lodging in their minds of such phrases and precepts as to familiarize them in their most tender years with its forms, practices, and doctrines—all impressed upon their young imaginations and religious aspirations. At eight they are baptized and admitted to church membership. Young men are deacons before they are eighteen. Take specimens of their catechism under "Revelations of God to Man:"

A. All men are the children of God.

2. Q. Did the spirits of all men exist then before they took bodies on the earth?

A. Yes, they existed in the spirit world.

And so the catechism goes on leading the young mind to receive the statements of their "Seers," the same as the revelations made to Moses and Isaiah, filling young minds with the absurdities upon which rest the doctrines of Mormonism that take away free agency and bind the followers in blindness to the leader, destroying the Scriptural doctrines of the Godhead and the foundations upon which rest the security of manhood and womanhood. This subject will be further developed in future letters. JOHN EATON.

fast in the mud, and they splash the same thing on you every week. We need a universal church-cleaning, by which all canting and humdrum shall be scrubbed out of sight.

If we would keep fresh, let us make occasional excursions into other circles than our own. Artists generally go with artists, farmers with farmers, mechanics with mechanics, clergymen with clergymen. Christian workers with Christian workers. But there is nothing that sooner freshens one up than to get into a new group, mingling with people whose thought and work run in different channels. For a change, put the minister on the hay-rack, and the farmer in the clergyman's study.

Let us read books not in our own line. After a man has been delving in nothing but theological works for three months, a few pages in the Patent Office report will do him more good than Doctor Dick on "The Perseverance of the Saints." Better than this, as a diversion, is it to have some department of Natural History or Art to which you may turn; a case of shells or birds, or a season ticket to some picture gallery.

If you do nothing more than simply play on one string of the bass-viol, you will wear it out and get no healthy tune. Better take the bow and sweep it clear across in one grand swirl, bringing all four strings and all eight stops into requisition.

The Cradle of a God.

WHEN princes are born, heralds announce it, and cannon thunder it, and flags wave it, and illuminations set cities on fire with the tidings. The older people can remember the time of rejoicing in England when the Prince of Wales was born. You can all remember the gladness throughout Christendom at the nativity in the palace at Madrid. But when our glorious Prince was born, there was no rejoicing on earth. Poor and growing poorer, yet the heavenly recognition that Christmas night shows the truth that indigence is not always significant of degradation.

In all ages there have been great hearts throbbing under rags, tender sympathies under rough exterior, gold in the quartz, Parian marble in the quarry, and in every stable of privation wonders of excellence that have been the joy of the heavenly host.

All the great deliverers of literature and of nations were born in homes without affluence, and from their own privation learned to speak and fight for the oppressed. Many a man has held up his pine-knot light from the wilderness until all nations and generations have seen it, and off of his hard crust of penury has broken the bread of knowledge and religion for the starving millions of the race.

Poetry, and science, and literature, and commerce, and laws, and constitutions, and liberty, like Christ, were born in a manger. All the great thoughts which have decided the destiny of nations started in obscure corners, and had Herods who wanted to slay them, and Iscariots who betrayed them, and rabble that crucified them, and sepulchres that confined them until they burst forth in glorious resurrection.

Strong character, like the rhododendron, is an Alpine plant that grows fastest in the storm. Men are like wheat, worth all the more for being flailed. Some of you would never have come to your positions of usefulness had you not been ground and pounded and hammered in the foundry of disaster. When I see Moses coming up from the ark of bulrushes to be the greatest lawgiver of the ages, and Amos from tending the herds to make Israel tremble with his prophecies, and David from the sheepcote to sway the poet's pen and the king's sceptre, and Peter from the fishing-net to be the great preacher at the Pentecost, I find proof of the fact that lowly starting may be precursor of grand deurs and glories yet to be.

People Who Have Good Impulses.

HERE is a raw material in humanity—often very raw—called Impulse or Enthusiasm; and some people are very proud of possessing this spasmodic excellence. They talk glibly of their "good impulses," their "noble impulses," their "generous impulses," but the fact is, that the majority of impulses, are neither good nor noble; while they are, of all guides in human affairs, the most questionable. For Impulses do not come from settled principles, but rather from a loose habit of mind—a mind just drifting along, and ready to accept any new suggestion as an "impulse," an "inspiration," a "command." We believe far too readily the cant about emotions, and erratic genius, and suffer ourselves to be imposed upon by fussy, impulsive people; for if we are at all allied with such, it is impossible to escape imposition; since we have to be patient enough for two, and so bear an undue burden of civility and good manners.

It may be said that such a discipline is not to be despised, and could be made a lesson of spiritual grace. But if we are not sick, why should we take medicine? Lessons God sets us, he helps us to learn, but there are no promises for those who impose penances upon themselves. And it is a penance to associate with impulsive, fussy persons; for no matter how good their impulses are, they are simply nowhere—as far as noble, enduring work is concerned—beside well-considered plans, carried out by cool, consistent people, who know what can be done and do it; just as much next year as this year; just as well in one place as in another.

Ministers of the Gospel know this fact perhaps better than any other mortals. They are constantly finding out how uncertain a quantity Good Impulses are to depend upon. For they have not the habit of materializing into good actions; they are evanescent pretenders to righteousness; they tell more flattering tales than ever Hope told. All too soon the practical, calm minister discovers that Impulse and Enthusiasm are but rudimentary virtues, and seldom available for any real, good work. The men of service either in spiritual or temporal work, are men that nothing hurries or flurries; who are never in haste, and never too late. They are not men of Impulse, but of Consideration. Whether they are going to deliver a sermon, or keep a momentous appointment, to get a high office, or a sum of money, or merely to catch an express train, they are perfectly cool, and always in time. Of course, impulsive people keep appointments and catch trains, but O, what a fuss they make about it!

Unfortunately calm, grand natures are not of indigenous growth, and we do not do all we might to cultivate them. If we took more time to think, we should be less impulsive; more reasonable, less shallow. If we made less haste, we should make more speed. "Slow and sure win the race," is a proverb embodying a great truth. Fussy, impulsive people never get at the bottom of things—never give an impartial judgment—never are masters of any difficult situation—for the power of deliberation—of staving off personal likes and dislikes—of waiting—of knowing when to wait and when to move—are powers invariably linked with a cool head and a clear, calm will. But none of these grand qualities come at the call of Impulse. Even good impulses are of no practical value until they crystallize into good deeds. Without this result the impulse or the intention to do great things may be a serious spiritual danger; the soul may satisfy itself with its impulses and designs, and rest upon them; forgetting what place of intellectual regret is paved with good intentions.

In a certain sense, it is true that the power of taking things in a cool, practical way is often an affair of the pulse, and so many beats, more or less, per minute, make a person fussy or serene. But it is only true in measure. Forethought and preparation—realizing what is likely to happen—and what is best to be done—are great helps to keeping cool and calm. The will also can work miracles. I believe in the will because I believe that the human will is God's grace. Those who say "I can not" are those who think "I will not." Those who think "I will" are those who have the power of the will. Paul did not hesitate to pray for the removal of his physical handicap, and the "sufficient grace" that was promised him, will be just as freely given to us. Indeed, I may rest the question here, for this is a great consolation—once cannot say too much of the Divine help. It will keep all in perfect peace that trust in it.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Lutheran Church in the United States and Canada has 5926 ministers and 1,430,325 communicants. The contributions for benevolent purposes this year will be nearly a million dollars.

Evangelist Thomas Harrison has arranged to begin a series of services at Camden, N. J., next week. The services are to be held in Broadway M. E. Church, of which Rev. James R. Mace is pastor.

Rev. F. B. Meyer, whose Labors at Northfield were greatly blessed and whose books have made him known to the Christian public of America has arranged to hold a series of services in New York during the month of February.

Dr. Temple, the new Archbishop of Canterbury, is quoted as indignantly protesting against the defect in English ecclesiastical law which permits a clergyman to remain in charge of a parish when he can, but will not, perform the duties of his office.

Evangelist Grant C. Tullar is holding meetings in Brooklyn, E. D. About eight churches are uniting in the movement, which it is hoped will be the beginning of a widespread revival. Mr. Tullar has just closed a series of successful services at Rutherford, N. J.

As the House of Representatives has passed the bill prohibiting the sale of liquor in the National Capitol in Washington, D. C., and the bill now goes to the Senate, it is suggested that every friend of Temperance see to it that the two Senators from his State receive, as speedily as possible, a memorial, signed by influential men, asking him to vote for the bill. It will be a most beneficent reform and a great triumph for Temperance if intoxicating liquor is excluded by law from the capitol.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has been holding services in the Kensington District of Philadelphia. A novel feature was a torchlight procession of Christian Endeavorers, workers and converts from the churches participating in the movement. Hymns were sung during the march, and at the close two churches were crowded by the paraders, and Dr. Munhall had to address an immense throng outside of those for whom there was no room. It is stated by the Press that fully two thousand persons joined in the march.

The revival services in Philadelphia are making excellent progress. The thorough organization and the systematic districting of the city are bearing fruit. Recent reports show that the ministers are all actively working in their respective districts, and are aided by Dr. W. L. Munhall, Dr. A. C. Dixon of Brooklyn, Rev. Geo. C. Needham, and other evangelists, who speak at one or more meetings each evening. Besides these, there are Bible readings at three o'clock, noonday prayer-meetings for business men, and on Monday a central rally meeting for workers.

Commander and Mrs. Booth-Tucker, of the Salvation Army, last week held a National Holiness Congress, from Dec. 12th to Dec. 16th. The subjects for Monday's and Tuesday's meetings were "Christ's Christianity—Its Purity;" and "Christ's Christianity—Its Fruits." All the leading Salvation Army officers of the Eastern States were present, also Commissioner Higgins, one of the International Commissioners of the Army, who is at present visiting America, and Major Deva Sundrum and Ensign Gunasekara, native converts of the Army from Southern India and Ceylon.

A Beautiful Holiday Gift.

FEW books published in recent years have attained such amazing and instantaneous popularity as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Premium Library, the gems of which are The Wedding Ring, by Dr. Talmage, and The Secret of a Happy Home, by Marion Harland. While thousands of appreciative letters reach us from recipients of the Library, expressing unbounded satisfaction with all the volumes, almost every writer makes special mention of the two named above. They are, above all others, books for the home. The Wedding Ring is a rich, domestic jewel, and the more it is read the better it is liked, since, in the author's inimitable way, it touches every phase of matrimonial life, from the halcyon days of courtship down through the joys and trials of marriage, housekeeping and maternity, to the time when our children's children fill and gladden the old homestead.

In the reign of domestic virtue and affection, Dr. Talmage as a writer is unequalled, and his chapters on "The Old Folks' Visit," "Woman Enthroned," and "Home Sweet Home," touch many hearts, while those on "Matrimonial Discords," "Hotels vs. Homes," and "Costume and Morals," cause the smiles to shine through the tears.

The Secret of a Happy Home may be aptly called a companion work, since it is a delightful supplement to Dr. Talmage's book, and a talisman that will bring much joy to its possessor. Marion Harland talks familiarly with husbands and wives, not as a gossip, but an adviser and familiar friend, in a most entertaining fashion and on such subjects as "The Family Purse," "Four feet upon a Fender," "The Rule of Two," "A Word for the Stepmother," &c. These two charming books, with eight other volumes, artistically bound in rich olive green vellum cloth with red-and-gilt titles, compose our Premium Library which is sent (enclosed in a handsome case) with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year for $1. No better selection for a home or gift purposes could be found than this beautiful library, which is entirely different from the library issued last year. It will be sent to any address the subscriber may designate. Send all subscriptions to No. 92 Bible House, New York City.

A Peace Anthem.

THE Christmas song angelic announced, the pacification of all individual and international animosities. What a sound this word of peace had in that Roman Empire that boasted of the number of people it had massacred, that prided itself on the number of the slain, that rejoiced at the trembling provinces. Sicily, and Corsica, and Sardinia, and Macedonia, and Egypt had bowed to her sword and crouched at the cry of her war-eagles. She gave her chief honor to Scipio and Fabius and Cæsar—all men of blood. What contempt they must have had there for the penniless, unarmed Christ, in the garb of a Nazarene, starting out to conquer all nations.

There never was a place on earth where that word peace sounded so offensively to the ears of the multitude as in the Roman Empire. They did not want peace. The greatest music they ever heard was the clanking chains of their captives. If all the blood that has been shed in battle could be gathered together it would up-bear a navy. The club that struck Abel to the earth has its echo in the butcheries of all ages. Edmund Burke, who gave no wild statistics, said that there had been spent in slaughter thirty-five thousand millions of dollars, or what would be equal to that; but he had not seen into our times, when in our own day, in this country, we expended three thousand millions of dollars in civil war.

The Way to Keep Fresh.

IN many of our churches, sinners hear the same exhortations that they have been hearing for the last fifteen years, so that the impenitent man knows, the moment the exhorter clears his throat, just what is going to be said; and the devout man, who has heard the exhortation as we teach our children the multiplication table forward or backward. We could not understand the doleful strain of a sermon until we had found out that he composed it on a fast day during the previous year, and has been using it ever since.

There are laymen who do not like to hear a sermon, and there are ministers who yet give their pastors the same prayer every week at the devotional meeting—that is, fifty-two times in the year, with no variation of subject or style. If they made any spiritual advancement, they would have new wants to express, and new thanksgivings to offer. But they have been for a decade of years stuck

Venezuela Notified.

FORMAL notification has been carried to the President and Congress of Venezuela that our Government has succeeded in making honorable terms with England for a settlement of the dispute between the two countries. It remains now for Venezuela, if she is satisfied with the basis accepted by the United States, to negotiate a treaty with England on the lines agreed upon. Rumors are current that the political party opposed to President Crespo will try to prevent the settlement. Its leaders urge that Venezuela will be at an unfair disadvantage in the court of arbitration, inasmuch as two of the five judges will be appointed by England, while none of them will be appointed by Venezuela. The President and his party, however, quite understand that the sympathies of the two United States members of the court will be with Venezuela, and being disinterested, will be able to protect Venezuelan interests even more effectually than citizens of Venezuela could do. It is suggested, however, that if the dissatisfaction of a considerable number of the Venezuelan Congress is evinced, with such persistence as to seriously imperil the treaty, the United States Supreme Court might name two Venezuelans as its representatives in the Court of Arbitration, instead of two of its own judges. This suggestion, however, is not favored by our Government, except as a last resort to save the treaty from failure. It is a curious fact that while Venezuelan patriots are complaining that their country has been unfairly treated in the negotiation, European journals, especially those of Germany, are taunting England with cowardice in consenting to the terms of the treaty. They say that if Germany had been in a similar dispute with a South or Central American State, she would not have suffered the United States to meddle with it, and that our Government must not suppose that her right to interfere in a quarrel, in which the United States are not directly concerned, would be recognized by a nation which respected itself, and was prepared to fight. These utterances, however, will not affect the fact. It would have been little short of a crime to have precipitated a war when there was a possibility of settling the dispute peaceably. Every one recognizes this fact when the dispute is a private one. When the owners of two adjoining estates cannot agree about the proper place to erect the dividing fence, they do not, if they are civilized people, arm themselves and settle it by fighting, but carry the dispute into court and have the case argued and settled on its merits. This is precisely what England and Venezuela have been persuaded by our Government to do. England can afford to bear the taunts of European nations, while her course in this matter is in accord with the principles of Him who said:

Blessed are the peacemakers for they shall be called the children of God. (Matt. 5:9.)

Faithful till Death.

A singular bequest was contained in the will of a citizen of German birth, who was well known to the newspaper profession in St. Louis, Mo. The will had been intrusted to a friend, and an injunction written on the outer envelope, directed that it be opened immediately after the death of the testator and before the funeral. The reason for the injunction was apparent when the will was read. One of its clauses provided for an autopsy being made, and directed that his heart should be removed and enclosed in a metal casket, which should be sent to his wife in Germany. It appears that when a young man in the German army he fell in love with a very beautiful lady and married her. Some time afterward circumstances occurred which necessitated his leaving the country. He came to America but was unable to induce his wife to leave her family. Years afterward, when he had settled in St. Louis and was doing well, he again urged her to come, but she refused. When the old man was near death, he had the will drawn, in which he said that his heart had been his wife's all through the years, and as it was still hers, he wished her to have it. His heart was sent to his wife as he directed, but she will probably place no more value on it than she did on the love of which it is the symbol. The man had evidently given the love of his life to one who could not appreciate it, since she would not sacrifice her predilections for her own country for his sake. She had failed under the test which Christ applies to his followers:

He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me. (Matt. 10:37.)

A Narcotic Spring

An official connected with the State Government of California, calls attention in a Departmental report to the existence of a dangerous spring in Plumas county. The spring is on the side of a mountain, and is known to the miners as the "Chloroform Spring." The water does not differ in color from pure water, but is slightly brackish to the taste. It is in its effects that its peculiarity consists. Persons who have drunk a small cupful feel in about half an hour as if they had taken a heavy narcotic. A large quantity renders the drinker insensible and he does not recover consciousness for several hours. The Indians denominate the spring "Heap Sleep Water," and they say many a man has died from drinking it. Their statement is corroborated by the fact that the official before-mentioned, counted the carcasses of five deer lying within a few yards of the spring when he visited the spot recently. He tested the soil around it but could not discover any cause for the death-dealing effects of the water. He urges that it should be analyzed and a warning displayed above it to warn strangers who might drink of it and be poisoned. The official does not recommend the erection of a fence or any obstruction to prevent people getting at the water. He appears to think it would be sufficient to place a warning setting forth the consequences of drinking it. He is doubtless right, though we know that multitudes pay us no heed either to the warnings against intoxicating drink, or to the assurance Christ gave about that water which he would give to all who sought it:

The water that I shall give him shall be in him, a well of water springing up into everlasting life. (John 4:14.)

Little Immigrants Tested.

An interesting exercise was witnessed in the Baron Hirsch schools in New York last week. There are over five hundred Russian children in these schools, many of whom have not been a year in the country. The general agent of the schools said that the children were unable to speak English when they came to the school, but had become conversant enough now with the language to enter the sixth and seventh grades in the public schools. "These little Russians are born linguists," he continued. "We are endeavoring to instill into their minds ideas of patriotism and a love of this their new fatherland, and the enthusiasm we meet with is surprising." Then turning to the children he said: "You are no longer Russians, but good Americans. Let's see whether you can give three good, loyal cheers. Five hundred heads were raised in the air as the folds of a large American flag were unfurled, and five hundred voices gave hearty response. The children evidently understood that it was not merely a piece of bunting they were greeting, but that they were pledging their loyalty to the principles the flag represents. When men enlist under the banner of Christ, they, too, are tested, but not so much by their ability to cheer as by their obedience to the apostolic injunction:

Let every man that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity. (11. Timothy 2:19.)

A Natural Enemy.

A long journey in intense pain was taken by a man who arrived at Portland, Ore., a few days ago. He was a miner and a prospector, who came all the way from Bernes' Bay, Alaska, to receive hospital treatment for erysipelas and blood poisoning. He was almost blind, one eye being entirely closed by his swollen cheek and eyelid, and his face was drawn into deep corrugations and was badly inflamed. His story, as he gave it to the hospital doctors, was most pitiable. Three months ago he struck a vein of rich quartz on his Alaskan claim. He followed it and worked late in the day until the sun set, and the evening closed in. Tired and hungry, he was eager to get back to camp, and decided to make a short cut across the mountain, taking an old trail he had observed. At the end of the trail he entered the timber and had gone a few rods, when, pushing his way through a dense growth of ferns, he plunged head foremost into an old whipsaw pit. During the ten years of its abandonment, there had grown up in the old pit that horror of Alaskan miners, the creeping thorn, Panax horridus, commonly known as "the devil's club." The stinging thorns pierced his face, neck and hands as he struggled to an upright position and climbed out of the pit. He suffered torture on his way to the cabin. On his arrival, his partners cut out over twenty of the barb-shaped thorns from his flesh, and a doctor, who was hunted up next day, cut out fifteen more. But some must have remained in the flesh, for he grew worse from day to day and at last had traveled to Portland for treatment. The doctors doubt if they will be able to save his life, as the poison from the thorns has thoroughly permeated his system. Many a man whose spiritual condition is similarly hopeless after falling into sin, has come to the Great Physician and has found the promise true:

He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him. (Heb. 7:25.)

A Novel Tower Clock.

The new Grace Chapel in East Fourteenth street, New York, has a novel clock, whose faces in the tower are seventy feet above the works. Ordinarily, such a clock would be run by a system of weights, and would require to be wound up at regular intervals. But this clock has no weights, and does not require to be wound up. Grace Chapel has an electrical plant for its lights, for running its elevator, and other purposes, and this plant keeps the clock going. Power is applied by the electric current to the axle of the main wheel to which the weights would ordinarily be attached, and this is all that is done either by the weights in a large clock, or the main-spring of a smaller one. There is a pendulum and escapement, as in other clocks. Provision is made, however, for an accidental failure of the dynamo, by a series of storage batteries which collect and hold sufficient electricity to run the clock for two weeks after the dynamo ceased working. The striking of the hours and quarters is also done by electricity. A cylinder on which are projecting teeth revolves slowly in an upright position. When one of the teeth presses a lever fixed near it, the lever is depressed and makes what electricians call a contact. The electric power then runs to the tongue of the bell, and the striking is done. Consideration is shown for sleeping neighbors by omitting the teeth from a portion of the cylinder. The effect of this is to keep the clock from striking in the night. At nine o'clock in the evening the clock automatically plays a short tune, strikes the hour, and does not strike again till six in the morning, though the clock goes all night as in the day. The novel feature about the clock is the automatic action of all its operations. So long as the electricity is supplied to it, it will go on indefinitely, doing all its work without winding or being touched by the human hand. It is much to be wished that all Christians were like it in this. The power of the Spirit never ceases, but too often it is resisted, spiritual work ceases and the Holy Spirit is grieved.

Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God in whom ye were sealed unto the day of redemption. (Eph. 4:30.)

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

A. H. F., Brooklyn, N. Y. Is the Apostles' Creed in the Bible? If not by whom was it com-

It is not in the Bible, word for word, but is an early summary of the Christian faith, on which all Christian Churches agree. It is stated by many of the early Christian writers that the creed was composed by the Apostles themselves at Jerusalem soon after the ascension of Christ. Rufinus (A.D. 400), writes: "Being about to depart from Jerusalem, they, (the Apostles), first settled a rule for their future preaching lest they should expound different doctrines. . . . They composed this rule, each one contributing his sentence, and left it as a rule to all believers." This version is affirmed by Augustine, who even gives in detail, the individual contributions made by each apostle.

M. J. S., Philadelphia, Pa. 1. Are dancing, playing pool, shuffle-board and cards harmless? 2. Should one professing to be a Christian and who is a Christian Endeavor worker, give them up? 3. Kindly tell me what are the duties of a Social Committee in a Christian Endeavor

1. No; they may not be sinful in themselves but they bring you into undesirable associations, make dangerous acquaintances, stir up evil passions and lead to sinful and dissipated habits. The ball-room and the card-room have ruined countless numbers of men and women. All four should be rigidly avoided by the Christian as impediments to spiritual growth. 2. Certainly, and unhesitatingly. 3. To arrange for the holding of suitable entertainments, receptions, etc., and to promote in every way acquaintance and Christian good fellowship among the members of the Society and the congregation generally.

A. M. C., Martinsdale, Mont. 1. The statement is made Ex. 4:24 that the Lord sought to kill Moses. As the Lord could kill him if he wished I should be glad to know what the passage means. 2. How can the least in the kingdom of heaven be greater than John the Baptist as stated in Luke 7:28?

1. The passage is obscure, but we infer that Moses was stricken down with sudden illness and was in danger of death. He and his wife appear to have thought that it was a judgment on them for deferring in the case of one of their sons the rite by which the boy was initiated into the Hebrew nation. Moses had, we imagine, postponed it at his wife's request. Her conduct seems to imply blame of him for yielding to her wish. 2. The coming of Christ was so great a revelation that the humblest Christian had

The Syriac documents to which you refer were discovered eight years ago in the library of the Convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai, by Prof. J. R. Harris, and were afterward published with an English translation. They were regarded by the occupants of the monastery as worthless rubbish, and some similar documents had even been used for lighting fires. The principal document found was the Apology (or Defence) of Aristides, which deals with the condition of Christianity in the second century and not improbably includes a reference to Elessa. Her name is nowhere mentioned in Scripture. This has been repeatedly stated in THE MAIL-BAG.

Mr. S. K., Rutnam, 101 Hodge Hall, Princeton, N. J. A Hindu Christian preacher and lecturer, writes as follows:

A very effective means of reaching the educated young people of India, is by distributing among them good Christian literature. Lately I have received letters from Hindu students, asking me to tion through Christ. If you believe his promise and trust Christ for salvation that is all God requires of you at the beginning. It will soon be seen by the way you live whether yours is a true and saving faith. If it is, you will seek earnestly to become like Christ and to do his will in all things. You will strive continually to avoid sin and to live the life he wished his followers to live. You will seek the Holy Spirit's power in your heart, and will pray for enlightenment. Above all we would counsel you to do some service for Christ's sake—something that you would not do if it were not that you wish to please him. Make some effort to bring souls to Christ and to make some Christian brother's burden lighter. In short, think less of your own salvation and more of Christ and the salvation of your fellow-men. Do not worry about the miraculous change. There are many true Christians who do not remember experiencing it.

F. E. M., El Paso, Tex. In THE MAIL-BAG of your issue of Nov. 25, you say in reply to M. Bliss, Germantown, Pa., of the Chinese, "their compass points south, instead of north." This has been disputed in this office, because THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA says of the compass, "with a little variation, the needle points nearly to the geographical north." Please explain why the Chinese compass points south. Also what is the state of a compass directly on the equator?

The statement that the needle of the Chinese compass points south is correct. Chinese history relates that in the reign of Hoang-ti, 4530 years ago, a chart was invented by a naive scientist (some assert by Hoang-ti himself), for indicating the south. The Chinese Encyclopedia, Tsien-tsan yung-fan, states that in the third and fourth centuries A. D., "ships were directed south by the needle." The Chinese name of the compass is ting-nan-ching, which means "needle pointing south." Their compass is made on a Presbyterian ministers of the old school have a notion that somehow it would be indecate to mention women very much, especially in connection with any high dignity in this life or that which is to come. The habits of thought of ministers in future will be different, men and women will be educated in college and theology, side by side, and in those reasonable days, there will be a better understanding of the Gospel of him "of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's outspoken championship of the Armenians, and its condemnation of Turkish massacres, has given offence to the Sultan's government, who have excluded it from the mails in that despotic country. This letter is a fair example of others received from subscribers in the Ottoman empire:

TURKEY, October 22, 1896.

Editor "CHRISTIAN HERALD."

For two years I have been a subscriber to your paper, the subscription being paid by Marsovan friends; but I am obliged to explain to my sorrow that for months past not a single copy of your paper has reached me. What happened to them I do not know. I desire to have the paper for its religious news, and I hope it may come.

To print the name of the writer would only be to direct the attention of the Turkish officials to him, and possibly give him trouble; therefore we omit it.

W. M., McKeesport, Pa. Where can I get the history of Judas Maccabeus?

In the Books of the Maccabees, contained in the Apocrypha, you will find a partial record, and also in the works of Josephus, the Jewish historian. See also Cotton's work on the subject, published in London in 1832.

H. E. R., St. Albans, Vt. To what does the Apostle allude in his question about the baptism for the dead in 1. Cor. 15:29?

The passage has occasioned much research and controversy. Among the many suggested explanations, two deserve consideration. One is that there was a superstitious and heretical practice in vogue in the Corinthian church, by which a living person was baptized in the hope that it would benefit a dead friend or relative, who had not been baptized. It is suggested that Paul who was arguing about the resurrection, referred to the heretical practice as evidence that even those who practised it believed in the resurrection, otherwise how would it benefit them if the dead rise not? A second suggestion, is one suggested by Dr. Tregelles, the eminent Greek scholar. He thinks the passage should read: "Else what shall they do who are baptized? It is for the dead if the dead rise not at all." That is, Christ and the prophets who testified of him are simply dead men if there were no resurrection.

H. R., Lima, N. Y. What is the duty of a Christian wife whose husband has ceased to attend church and spends his Sundays in work and pleasure? Is she bound to continue living with a man who tramples on her most sacred feelings?

We do not know that you are bound to continue living with him unless your conscience bids you. Perhaps a gentle, patient prayerful life on your part might bring him back to his faith. It would be a most desirable thing and you probably have a better opportunity than any one else of achieving it. This may be the cross Christ expects you to take up and bear for his sake.

MOUNT RAINIER, FROM THE NESQUALLY RIVER, WASHINGTON.

This is one of the greatest of the "American Alps." Like Mounts Shasta and Hood, Rainier is visible for a great distance, its peak of perennial snow being a feature in the landscape for fully fifty miles. Although officially known at Seattle and by the government surveys in Washington as Mount Rainier, it is still called Mount Tacoma by the people of Tacoma and the surrounding country. From the latter locality can be seen also Mount Adams, Mount Hood, Mount St. Helens, and Mount Jefferson—a group of giants, their heads crowned with eternal ice that shines dazzlingly in the sun. Rainier, with its 14,444 feet of altitude, stands without a rival in the Cascade range, Shasta being 14,440 feet.

Davis, Thompson, and other writers confirm this, but none explain quite clearly the principle upon which the Chinese needle is poised so that it is attracted southward; but it is evident that if they chose to call the positive end of the needle the south, and the negative the north, their needle would still operate practically as ours does, the sole difference being in the naming of the points. All compass needles point north and south. A compass, at the equator, would show no material difference.

Reader, Cuthbert, N. Y. What they are doing in Heaven. The most recent sermon of Dr. Lathrop and one of the most characteristic, has a peculiarity that would delight the commentator, who proved by two passages that there are no women in heaven, viz.: "There was silence in heaven for half an hour," and "I beheld a wonder in heaven, a woman!" By the same token, Dr. Talmage told of a woman of two of the most famous men, perhaps, of the world, and of a woman of the most famous of the world, I even the hero of the world, and yet the saints and angels in Heaven are not women. The Doctor would be quick to admit that we have good reason to believe that women are not in Heaven. The fact is that our good

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

Outdoor Sports in Winter.

The Pleasures of Skating, Coasting, and Tobogganing, and also some of the Perils.

THE season is again with us when the young folks have the keenest amusement of all the year. Soon they will have coasting, sleighing, skating, curling and tobogganing, while the smaller juveniles will build the time-honored, queer-looking snow man and snow-ball him out of recognition. One of the most popular winter sports with the boys, especially in the country, is coasting. Who can imagine anything more delightful than flying down a well-packed hill-side, on a long bob-sled with a merry party! But the boys don't monopolize this sport; in the evenings the hills are usually crowded with grown-ups, all shouting and screeching and enjoying themselves just as much as the youngsters.

Skating, of late years, has become very popular in America, and as soon as the ice forms, the fine lakes in the parks are turned into large skating rinks, which are crowded in the daytime by children and those who are fortunate enough to be able to give a few hours of daylight to the health-giving sport. In the evenings, clerks, business men, rich and poor, crowd the lakes until they are a mass of gracefully gliding humanity. The essentials for pleasant skating are experience, a pair of good skates, sound clear ice, and good friends to keep you company.

Just when skating was first known, is a mystery. It is claimed by the Scandinavians that it has been used as a means of locomotion for sixteen hundred years. Snow-shoes originated with the Finns, and were simply flat boards, strapped to the feet to enable the wearer to walk over the snow. They were called "Skrid Funnai" (sliding Finns). About 200 A.D., when iron came into general use, runners of that metal were put on these shoes, to make them slide along more easily. It is quite probable, therefore, that the iron skate originated about that time. English writings, dating back as far as the twelfth century, tell us about the youth of that day with long-pointed sticks and having bones tied to their feet, and with these pushing themselves over the ice with great rapidity.

Russia, Germany, Holland, Canada, Norway, Sweden, and Lapland are all great skating countries, with fine rivers and lakes where the sport is enjoyed. In Holland almost everybody skates, the women while shopping, or to market, the children to school; in fact, skates are almost as common as shoes in Holland in winter. Some of the finest skaters in Europe are Hollanders, and for speed and gracefulness they are unexcelled. Fancy skating, however, can hardly be done with the ordinary Dutch skate, the runners being too long and heavy, and built for speed more than for cutting figures and curves on the polished ice.

The four great European rivers for skaters are the Thames, the Seine, the Neva, and the Maas. On the Maas, near Rotterdam, is the famous skating resort, Slikkeveer, where the Hollanders hold their great winter carnivals and games, skating races, and ice-yacht races.

There has been much friendly rivalry as to which nation produces the finest skaters, speed, grace, and endurance all considered. Russia, Canada, Norway, and the United States have led at different times in these contests. Among the French Canadians, there are unquestionably some of the finest skaters in the world. They glide along on their frozen rivers and lakes, and travel long distances on the shining steel. Their skates are not quite so dainty as ours, however. The American and English skates are much lighter than that used in Canada, Holland, or Russia, and are made more for pleasure than real service.

Many eccentricities might be noted in connection with this king of winter outdoor pastimes. Danish skaters frequently have large sails, sometimes seven or eight feet across, strapped to their shoulders to catch the wind, which propels them at a dizzy pace along the smooth ice. These sails an expert skater can manoeuvre like those of a yacht. In Finland, skaters amuse themselves by chasing large fish from one end of a lake to the other, the pursuer on skates and the fish clearly visible through the transparent ice. By-and-by the game becomes exhausted, the skater breaks the ice and secures his fish with a spear. Troops have been repeatedly drilled on the ice in Holland, Norway, and Sweden, and a market on the ice is not a novelty. In Northern

China, great sport is had on the ice in carnival time, and many unique ice-coaches, or decorated sleds, may be seen on those festal days on the frozen ponds or lakes that are frequented by nobility.

A Girl's Clever Rejoinder to a Prince.

A clever little American girl was invited to meet the Prince of Wales at a breakfast with some other Americans in London. During breakfast the prince rallied her countrymen good-humoredly on the liberty taken by Americans in "clipping the king's English," robbing words of letters in pronunciation. After they had risen from table he found the shy little girl in a corner, and asked her kindly, "What in London has most impressed you?" "Sinpul, your highness," was the timid reply. "Sinpul?" said the puzzled prince. "Oh, yes! There is nothing in the town as wonderful to me." "I am afraid," he said, with a slight expression of annoyance, "that you know my London better than I. Sinpul? Is it a theatre—a cafe—what is it?" "A church, your highness. We Americans would call it St. Paul; but as you call St. John, Sinjun, this, it seems, must be Sinpul." The prince laughed heartily, and declared himself fairly worsted.

A Pretty Holiday Game.

"The Magic Cave" is a new game for the holidays and a very pretty one. A corner of a room is used, or if a hall, it may be easy to arrange the structure there: a screen will materially assist, or two screens are even better. A writer in The Home Magazine gives this suggestion: Any dried grasses and palms are handy to pile up on one side, on the other crystallized wadding made to look like stalactites by pulling it into points, gumming and sifting over glass powder, will give the effect of a cave. If cotton wool, or wadding of any description be used, the very greatest care should be taken that no light of any sort is allowed to be near it. At the door of the cave a fairy should stand with a wand in her hand, and after making some mystic movements with it, she may silently enter the cave, bring out the present and hand it to the person for whom it is intended, then, with her wand beckon to another.

The Duty of Young Men.

In an address delivered to the students at the recent Sesqui-Centennial celebration at Princeton, N. J., President Cleveland said among other things: "A constant stream of thoughtful, educated men should come from our universities and colleges preaching national honor and integrity, and teaching that a belief in the necessity of national obedience to the laws of God is not born of superstition. I would have those they send out among the people not ashamed to acknowledge Nature and the Children.

IT matters little what joys or toys or recreations we select for our children, after all those that most commend themselves to the wee folks, are such as approach most nearly to the usual avocations of grown-up men and women. This point is emphasized by Miss Katharine Beebe, a famous kindergartner, who writes:

Most mothers will bear me out in the statement that the playthings which the baby seems to prefer are such as the clothes-basket, the coal-bucket, the wash-boiler, and the ice-cream freezer; that is, when he can get these treasures; for usually they are taken away and the little tin horse or red ball substituted in the mistaken idea that these small objects are better suited to his little hands. People think that small toys are what he really wants, that he is mistaken when he thinks he wants the baby-carriage or the foot-tub; but he is not mistaken, he wants these big things, and mothers will do well if as far as possible they will allow their little folks to play with them. If sometimes instead of visiting a toy-shop to buy something to amuse two-year-old they will instead go through the basement of some large department store and buy a bushel-basket or a clothes-line instead of a rubber cat they will be working on the true line of development instead of against it. I remember watching a baby boy one summer whose choicest plaything was one cylindrical cedar block left in front of the house when the street was paved. With great apparent difficulty, but equal enjoyment, he carried it back and forth, from one place to another, for all sorts of reasons. He sat on it only to rest for further exertions. His wise mother did not object to his playing with it, neither did she insist on carrying it for him. She let nature teach her as well as her little son and both were stronger and wiser for it.

Real tools with a little help while the children are learning to use them, should be a part of every home outfit. Instead of the cheap and useless tool-chests sold as toys, the real tools purchased as a child grows up to their uses will be found to yield the best results. Real gardening and real work of all sorts is play to children when they are rightly lead into it.

Miss Beebe pronounces the attic the ideal playground for winter or stormy days. It may be turned into any sort of place in make-believe, — a garden, a workshop, a gymnasium, or a schoolroom, — according as the child fancies. But of course there is nothing like out-door play, when weather permits. Even the most expensive toys will be neglected by the youngsters when they wish to have a romp with nature, who is herself a fine playfellow at all times, and in her boisterous moods as well as when she is hushed and quiet. She sends summer showers to be enjoyed in bathing suits! She gives ice-ponds, snowdrifts, and heaps of leaves to roll in as well as sunshine and flowers and the whole beautiful "Out of Doors!"

A Congress of Mothers.

Truly these are times in which womanhood is coming to the front in all lines of useful and educative work. An important event to women everywhere will be the approaching Congress of Mothers, to be held in Washington, Feb. 16, 1897. Among the leading ladies who are actively interested are Mrs. Adlai Stephenson, Mrs. William L. Wilson, Miss Morton, Mrs. Phebe Hearst, Mrs. H. W. Fuller, Mrs. A. A. Birney, Mrs. T. W. Birney, Mrs. Kincaid, Mrs. Jennet Richards, and a host of others. It is proposed to have a federation of the women's clubs now scattered throughout the country, in order to secure an interchange of views on the value of child education.

God, and to proclaim his interposition in the affairs of men, enjoining such obedience to his laws as makes manifest the path of national perpetuity and prosperity. I would have those sent out by our universities and colleges not only the counselors of their fellow countrymen, but the tribunes of the people—fully appreciating every condition that presses upon their daily life, sympathetic in every untoward situation, quick and earnest in every effort to advance their happiness and welfare."

Cherub Faces.

Few prettier things have been written than this little bit of description by Rev. Theodore L. Cuyler, of a German painting he once saw in a foreign gallery. The picture is called "Cloudland." At first sight it looks like a huge, repulsive daub of confused color, without form or comeliness. As you walk toward it the picture begins to take shape. It proves to be a mass of exquisite little cherub faces, like those at the head of the canvass in Raphael's "Madonna San Sisto." If you come close to the picture you see only an innumerable company of angels and cherubim. How often the soul that is frightened by trial sees nothing but a confused and repulsive mass of broken expectations and crushed hopes! But if that soul, instead of fleeing away into unbelief and despair, would only draw up near to God, it would soon discover that the cloud was full of angels of mercy.

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

STEVE, Jessie reflected, had the carriage of a gentleman, and that air of distinction only attained by a childhood passed among refined people and surroundings. Yet he was going to sea as a steward's assistant. He would have to obey orders, write out menus, make lists of stores, and do work which she could not fancy a man of fine instincts and habits being willing to do. He even hoped to exchange this work at Liverpool for that of a man before the mast; and he spoke of such employments as if they were natural and native to him. What was he? Or rather, who was he? Even to John, he said nothing of his antecedents; or if he had done so, John was as reticent as Steve could possibly desire.

These circumstances of mystery made a favorable atmosphere for the growth of love; and before Jessie was aware of the fact, she was more interested in Steve than she would have admitted, even to her own consciousness. She realized one thing, however—that she had a heartache about his going away. In less than two weeks he had made himself a part of her happiness; already she felt the loneliness of the house without him. How good-hearted he was! How ready to help! How self-contained! How gentlemanly in the best sense of the word! How handsome! She hesitated at this declaration of her heart. She was not prepared to say Steve was handsome, but he was certainly clever; and in some directions. John thought him well educated; and John's opinion was all with Jessie.

As she was considering this list of his excellencies, Steve returned. He had sent the telegram, and Jessie was now under an obligation to take the ten-thirty train for Lloyd's Station. "I am so sorry," she said, "for I intended to see you sail in the morning, and now I cannot do so. I am half inclined to send another telegram. I am so sorry, Steve!"

"Jessie, those words are very pleasant to me. Did you really intend to go down to the steamer?" His eyes, glowing with tender fire, sought hers; and he took her hands within his clasp. She saw the love words on his lips; another moment of such feeling, and he must have made them audible. Alas! he did not venture on that moment. With a great sigh he turned away, letting her hands fall from his with a hopelessness which Jessie could not but feel and understand. The silence following was embarrassing and Steve made no effort to break it. Jessie was wounded by the advance and retreat; and her pride taught her to affect ignorance and indifference. "John likes you so much," she said, "that I am sorry that you are going away. Do you know where John is speaking to-night? I wish I could hear him."

"Nothing can be easier. It is a lovely night, and the hall is but twelve blocks away. Put on your hat and we will go there."

There was something in Steve's voice she liked to obey. They went out together and loitered down Second avenue. The broad way was yet busy; men and women touched them on either hand and the children singing to their games on the sidewalks gave an air of happiness and holiday to the scene. The park invited them to its green shadows and they strolled to a bench and sat down. Jessie was nervously anxious to talk—silence revealed too much—and she could think of no subject but the sea.

"It is strange you love it so much; were you born near it?" she asked.

"I was born on Twenty-third street. But my mother's family were sailors. It is in the blood. I love the sea, as I love my mother, and my native land. I hear it calling me to-night, as plainly as if it had a human voice. I must feel, as Euripides felt, when his incomparable invocation to the sea, was written."

CHRISTIAN HERALD

"I should like to hear it," she said, softly; and the words that had been singing in Steve's heart, came instantly in rhythmic ebb and flow from his lips:

Would God I were now by the Sea!
By the winding, wet-worn caves,
By the ragged rents of the rocks;
And that there as a bird I might be,
White-winged, with the sea-skimming flocks,
Where the spray and the breeze blow free,
O'er the ceaseless mirth of the waves,
And dishevel their loose grey locks,
I would spread my wings to the moist, salt air.
And my white, wide wings should carry me
Lifted up, out over the Sea.
Carry—I heed not where;
Somewhere, far away;
Where the breast of the breeze is sprinkled with spray;
Where the restless deep is maddened with glee,
Over the waves wild ecstasy,
Through the wild, blown foam!

As he spoke the divine longing and rapture of those who are "bond to the deep" touched her. She forgot the avenue. She forgot the stress of human hopes and fears that filled her heart. The sense of the sea was in her soul—its wild and solemn grandeur; its mysterious beauty; for one moment she felt through Steve; for that moment, she understood him.

CHAPTER III. JESSIE'S AFFAIRS.

She found it far more difficult to understand him an hour later. They were then in the half-filled, half-lit Trades Hall. John's speech was over, and a swarthy, untidy man was on the little platform, haranguing the restless men and women. John leaned on the back of a chair, as if waiting for reply; he saw Jesse and Steve enter, and motioned them to the vacant chairs beside him. The speaker was urging on a strike, with passionate invectives, and much clap-trap oratory.

"You need not believe anything he says," whispered Steve to Jessie; "the making of noise is his business."

"The worker is constantly more and more imposed upon" screamed the orator. "If it were not for the Trades Unions, he would be a serf!"

"That is nonsense," said John.

"It is the truth, sir."

"I say again, that is nonsense. The last twenty years, wages have been largely increased; hours of labor have been shortened. The working man has gained more political power, more social sympathy, more comfortable homes. In every way he has been favored. Has he improved these advantages? Is he better at home? Is he friendlier with his employers? Is he wiser in managing his own affairs? I leave you to answer these questions."

"Whatever good has come to him, has come through Trades Unions," insisted the speaker.

"I deny that," answered John. "I assert that the Unions often forbid men to do as well as they can, or to work as hard as they wish. I say, they often exercise an oppression, that few would endure at the hands of the legal government. I say, they throw the sons out of work, who have no concern in their quarrels, nor any share in their funds. I say, they rob the industrious man of his labor and the able man of his skill. I accuse them of intimidation, and of creating privileged bodies of workmen. No amount of affected sympathy with the working man, will get rid of facts like these."

"Who gives him sympathy?" was the retort. "Not the rich, sleek sinners, whom God and the devil leave alone, to succeed and prosper: such men as A. and B. and

C. and D. and Nicholas Lloyd; are they not the incarnation of selfishness and covetousness?"

Then Steve leaped to his feet, and finally went forward to the platform. "I will not defend A. and B. and C. and D. and Nicholas Lloyd!" he cried; "let their works and their charities defend them; what I want to say is this—the working-man is as selfish and as covetous as the rich man."

His words fell full, clearly rounded, and with an invincible air of authority, as he stood with flashing eyes waiting for a reply. For a minute there was an intense silence, followed by an audible murmur. Then the chairman of the meeting rose and said:—

"The gentleman owes the assembly an apology. He will please to make it."

"He owes them a statement of his position," answered Steve; "and he will make it in a few words: When a poor man, within half a dollar of starvation, marries, he is selfish. When he spends his wage on beer, and leaves his wife and children hungry, he is selfish. When a poor man hoards his dollars in an old stocking, he is covetous as the rich man hoarding his dollars in a bank. The mechanic who does bad work instead of good work—the man who does not give a day's work for a day's wage—the hands who dawdle about the factories, and take continual holidays, knowing that their families must suffer for them—the thriftless, lounging idlers, who are everybodys' enemies as well as their

"What if I decline?" asked Steve.

"I shall then make you do so."

"How will you make me?"

"Take off your coat, and I will show you—how."

In a moment two coats were flung to the end of the platform; in the next, Steve had forced his antagonist into a chair; where he held him with the grip of a clamp of iron. There was a swift and tumultuous interference, cries of "police," shrieks of women—and John went rapidly forward to the help of his friend. Jessie clasped her hands distractedly, and urged him to "hurry;" but there was no need to help Steve in his dilemma. Every man present understood the meaning of that swift blow and movement, which had non-plussed, and made powerless the recipient of it. Watchful as a bird, and not to be surprised, Steve went for his coat and put it on with the greatest deliberation. His look and attitude were unmistakable; and there was not only a subsidence of opposition, but also a kind of breathless admiration for the swift, indisputable reply he had given his challenger. No one even answered him, when he walked to the front of the platform, and scornfully thanked the Union, for "the farce of asking men to a free argument; and then giving them such a sample of fair play."

Calm as he appeared, he was really much excited; for he passed John and saw him not, and he would also have passed Jessie if she had not grasped his hand and called his name. Then he stopped. All his soul was in his face, as he looked into Jessie's eyes. And surely he saw some answering gleam in hers, for he drew her arm within his own and clasped it tight, and so passed out of the hall. No one stopped him; the nobler inner man was in command and men and women felt his influence, and fell back to the right and the left as Steve went forward. He was followed by no word of disapproval; rather they gave him an involuntary respect and admiration.

"You see what men are," he said to John, as he was joined by his friend. "They can understand an animal force; they want to knock 'Truth down.'"

How poor, how rich, how abject, how august, how complicate, how wonderful is man!

You taught me that quotation, Steve," said John, "and so I have the right to give it back to you."

All were much excited by the events of the evening, and they sat until long after midnight discussing them. Then when the family retired, Steve bid all but John "good-bye." He said he should be away before they were up in the morning; though perhaps he was influenced by a more personal motive. At that hour every one was at their best and kindest, and his farewell would have its deepest significance.

"I am sorry to leave you;" he said, giving his hands to Mr. and Mrs. McAslin. "I owe you for much happiness and hospitality."

"You have paid handsomely for your room and board, Steve Morrison," said Mr. McAslin, "and you will be very welcome in my house whenever you desire to come to it." Mrs. McAslin gave him a motherly kiss, Flora a kind "good-bye;" then he turned to Jessie.

"God bless you, Jessie," he said. She answered softly, "God bless you Steve! You will come back to us?"

"If I live, I will come back." Then they looked straight into each other's eyes, and a certain subtle something passed between them, and both knew that their hearts had longed for a warmer and sweeter farewell.

It was Steve, however, who played the woman's part in this love affair; his was the romance, the ideality, and the sweet unselfishness of the passion. Jessie was a girl of her era; and the necessity of money making was her prime instinct. She was in love as a man is in love. Her business had to be fully attended to; her love was for her hours of relaxation and pleasure. But Steve's business was to love.

FROM THAT MOMENT JESSIE UNDERSTOOD HIM.

What Prayer Can Do.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning January 3. I. Kings 8: 22-40.

PRAYER has a subjective as well as an objective side to it. No man can be in the habit of communion with the Highest without being the better for it. Apart from the answers to his prayers, apart from the graces and blessings that God gives to people who seek them at his hands, there are blessings resulting from the very act of prayer. As we see a rough, uncouth or depraved man softened and humanized by association with a pure, noble mother or wife, so entering into God's presence tranquillizes the heart and elevates the character. This, of course, does not apply to formal, unthinking prayers, but to the devotions of a man who has formed a true conception of God's character and knows that in entering his presence, he is coming into contact with ineffable holiness and righteousness. In that presence there must be a consciousness of impurity and of personal unworthiness, which comes nowhere else. There is also with self-abasement resulting from contrast, an unconscious purification of character. A man carrying into God's presence harsh, unbrotherly feelings of another, or an unholy passion, or a base design, feels the incongruity of his own spiritual condition with the atmosphere of heaven, and of necessity is delivered for the time, if not permanently, of the evil. His own idea of God has a tendency to arouse purer resolves, a desire to attain a higher state, nearer, if only by a slight step, to the holiness of the Being unto whose presence he has come.

There is, however, much more that prayer can do for the Christian than this mere subjective influence. He derives from communion with God positive blessings. The divine life implanted by Christ within him thrives and grows in God's presence. Tossed and buffeted and tempted in the world, he approaches God and renews his strength. Associating with men of sordid minds, men who measure everything by the dollar standard, he is likely to lose his esteem for the glory of self-sacrifice and all the nobler elements of human life. But as he pours out his heart before God, as into the ears of a sympathetic father, there comes to him from the heavenly heights the bracing air which "tones-up" his soul and reinvigorates his spiritual nature. God knows the need of his child, and from the Source of light and life there flows out to the poor weak nature the special blessing it requires. To the young come the strength and energy to resist temptation. To the unhappy and the harassed, there come the tranquillizing, cheering assurances of divine protection and support. To the repentant prodigal, the welcome and the affection of the loving parent who has been yearning over his wandering child. To the perplexed, the guiding light like the pillar of fire. To the bereaved, God gives the hope of reunion where there will be no more parting. To the persecuted, the fortitude which can bear suffering and death itself rather than disloyalty. And to the dying, the rod and the staff with which the lonely traveler is supported in his passage through the valley of the shadow. All these joys and consolations come to the Christian through prayer and, over and above all these, God gives blessings innumerable for which petition is made to him by his needy children.

ALONE WITH GOD.

INTO my closet fleeing, as the dove
Doth homeward flee,
I haste away to ponder o'er thy love
Alone with thee!

In the dim wood, by human ear unheard,
Joyous and free,
Lord! I adore thee, feasting on thy Word
Alone with thee!

Amid the busy city, thronged and gay,
But One I see,
Tasting sweet peace, as unobserved I pray
Alone with thee!

O happy life! Life hid with Christ in God!
So making me,
At home and by the wayside and abroad,
Alone with thee!

THE BEST GIFT.

THE fire was bright. The night was drear,
We sat and praised the parting year.

One guest gave thanks for added wealth.
And one for quick return to health.

The aged father told, with joy,
The coming of his absent boy.

"A gladsome year!" the brother cried,
And smiled upon his rosy bride.

"Ah, yes!" the sister said, and pressed
Her infant closer to her breast.

"It was a glorious year, in truth,
I gained my 'sheepskin'!" cried the youth.

The patient mother gently sighed,
And breathed the name of one who died.

Then softly said, "To her was given
The year's best gift, for she has Heaven."

The Millennium.

The Persons who will Reign with Christ, for Christ and those who will be his Subjects.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.*

EARLY six thousand years of the earth's history have rolled away under the rule of "the prince of this world." Another thousand years is at hand, in which "a King shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall minister judgment." (Isa. 32: 1). "In his days shall the righteous flourish, and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth." (Psalm 72: 7.)

We have only to read the chapter and Psalm, from which we have quoted, to understand the inconceivable blessedness of that reign of Christ for a thousand years, to which we are looking forward, after his elect are gathered to him, and the time of the tribulation is at an end.

Jesus will not reign alone; his chosen, his Bride will be with him. It is the queen who takes her rightful place by the side of her royal Spouse and whom he associates with him in the government of his kingdom. "To him that overcometh, to him will I give to sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father on his throne." (Rev. 3: 21). The four "living creatures," seen of the apostle John in heaven, were "in the midst of the throne," as well as "round about the throne," with the four and twenty elders. But the "elders" also had crowns, and both "living creatures" and "elders" are redeemed by the blood of Christ, and are made kings and priests and both reign on the earth." (Rev. 4: 4-11).

It is often contended that all believers will make part of the Bride, and that all will reign. Let us search out what saith the Scripture, that we may take account whether there are, or are not, conditions attached to this high and peerless vocation. Seven times in Rev. 2, 3, there are special promises to "him that overcometh," not to an over-coming church, but to the individual member of the church of Christ who shall overcome. Three of these are promises of reigning: "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life." (Rev. 2: 10). "He that overcometh and keepeth my words unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron" (Rev. 2: 26, 27); and then the verse already quoted (Rev. 3: 21).

But what of those who do not overcome? Shall they, can they, be trusted to reign who have not passed their examination during the school-time on earth?

There are some who shall reign with Christ and some who shall reign for Christ. It is one thing to reign as a queen-consort in a kingdom, and quite another to be vice roy or governor of a province. "Because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities" (Luke 19: 17), cannot mean the same as to sit with Christ upon his throne (Rev. 3: 21).

There is necessarily much of mystery in this glorious subject of reigning with Christ, but sufficient light is given to us to perceive that the complete and all-absorbing choice of Christ here on earth holds an inseparable relation to our eternal destiny, and relation to him through the ages of eternity. "If we suffer with him we shall also reign with him."

Praying for Money.*

CAN it be right directly to ask God to prosper our efforts—which in some cases may amount to a request for ten thousand pounds? Or is it better to confine ourselves simply to laying the matter before him, in the simple confidence of loyal children who wish to tell him everything, knowing that he will bless us in this way or in that (without our direct asking), as he may see it to be for our good? The question is complicated by many considerations; and every man must have liberty of conscience about it. The writer's own conviction, however, is clear, that while in spiritual things we should both ask and trust, for there we can have no doubt about the good of what we ask for, in temporal things (beyond actual necessities), after having poured out our heart before God, we should trust and not ask.

For temporal things, up to a certain point, we are indeed both permitted and commanded to pray. "Give us this day our daily bread" (Matt. 6:1) is a petition of our Saviour's own dictating, and, though one man's daily bread may mean something very different from another man's, and it is not safe to trust every one with the definition of what the necessities of life may be, there is nevertheless a distinction both reasonable and intelligible, between the prayer that asks God according to his promise to supply our necessities, and the prayer that asks of him to pour vast wealth into our lap. Our modern society is in such a state of mutual interdependence and entanglement, that often for me to gain, my neighbor must lose; and so the event that enriches me, impoverishes him. Then, though it may be good for one man suddenly to step into a position of affluence, it may be ruinous for another man; and God, loving the two men equally, will just because of that love, in one case bestow, in the other deny.

Material prosperity, so far from being the highest good, is in itself neither good nor evil; but it will turn to good or evil, according to the character with which it is brought in contact, and the spirit in which it is met and used. Surely a thoughtful parent would pause and muse, before out of a choice of blessings at his disposal for some beloved child he decided on the gift of great riches. May we not reverently suppose that thoughts of this kind pass through the heart of our heavenly Father as he looks round on us; and is not there wisdom in the self-control that refuses to press him for a gift, which may be health, and may be poison?

For nothing tries a man more than the sudden loss or gain of money. The loss of it, while it goads some men to an amazing and almost noble effort to recover it, will so sour and paralyze others, that henceforth they cease to be capable of further struggle with the world. The gain of it is good for some, is perhaps worse for more. Men who, while enjoying a modest competency, have been simple, kind, and charitable, have found in a great accession of wealth an instant occasion for a sordid and wretched meanness. A sudden rush of selfishness will sometimes flood the heart that thinks itself permanently raised over the necessities of friendship.

It ripens the harvest; and to need man's sympathy is a great help to giving it.

Brighter Days for Armenia.

England, France and Russia said to have United in a Plan to Curb Abdul Hamid.

MORE important than any dispatch received from Constantinople in many months is the news cabled last week that, after long negotiation, an understanding had finally been reached by France, Russia and England with regard to Turkey. In the London Times and other leading journals, it is semi-officially announced that the three powers named have agreed upon a policy toward the Porte, which will have the effect of pacifying the Turkish empire and preventing further massacres of Armenians or other subjects of Ottoman rule. Stated briefly, the arrangement reached is as follows: The Governments of Russia, England and France, through their Ambassadors at Constantinople, will control the affairs of the Turkish empire, the Sultan remaining a ruler in name alone, and shorn of his power; reforms will be put in operation, the fleets of the three powers being held in readiness to enforce them, should any opposition be offered by the Porte; the Dardanelles forts and those along the Bosphorus are to be dismantled and the passage of the Bosphorus is to be free to all vessels. The reported understanding practically concedes to Russia command of the situation giving to that power what it has long desired—an open marine highway to the Mediterranean. Whatever the cost, it will be good news to friends of peace and civilization everywhere that the brutal Moslem despotism is at last likely to be shorn of its power and Abdul Hamid placed under the firm restraint of an alliance of the three great nations who, if they continue to act in good faith toward each other, are fully equal to the task they have undertaken. Further confirmation of the news will be anxiously awaited.

Writing from Van to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Rev. G. C. Reynolds, an American missionary, tells a touching story of the helpless Armenian orphans. He says: A great number of women and children are left without their natural protectors and providers, and largely without property or homes, save as friends give temporary cover. These helpless orphans appeal most strongly to one's sympathies. It has taken some time to prepare the clothing for fifty of these poor, half-naked children, but now they are neatly though plainly and economically clad, and it was a real pleasure yesterday to see them file into chapel in their clean and comfortable clothes, as it is a satisfaction to watch them at their studies, or at their meals, or on the playground. They have all been received as boarding pupils in our schools, that their mental and spiritual natures may not be neglected while their physical wants are being supplied. We hope that these poor boys and girls, some of whom are already finding a warm place in our hearts, will continue to receive food and raiment for their bodies. We have but touched the fringe of the suffering that exists in the city even, while the cry of the villagers has not yet been permitted to reach us, save in isolated cases.

During the week the ninth weekly remittance of $1,000 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund was forwarded through the American Board to be distributed in relief work by its missionaries at the following points:

in

The Sunday School Times

During 1897, Dr. Miller, whose devotional books have already reached a circulation of over half a million copies, will write in his helpful, personal way a series of articles for THE SUNDAY SCHOOL TIMES. His theme will be "The Devotional Side of the Sunday-School Teacher's Work." These articles will, of themselves, be invaluable to Sunday-school workers, and will help wonderfully to make lesson-preparation and lesson-teaching effective. Other articles will be contributed during the year by such Sunday-school workers as Justice David J. Brewer, B. F. Jacobs, William Reynolds, Dr. James A. Worden, Dr. J. L. Hurlbut, Mrs. W. F. Crafts, Miss Bertha F. Vella, Alfred Day, W. H. Hall, and George W. Pease.

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

Sheldon Jackson's

Night on the Deep.

NE of the most heroic personalities of modern times, and one who would fit in well in any group of heroic spirits in any age of the world, is the Rev. Sheldon Jackson, D.D., who in a higher sense than any ecclesiastical power could designate, is the Bishop of all Alaska. Dr. Jackson has indeed been a father to the forgotten and neglected tribes of that far away Arctic wonder-land. He has not only traveled thousands of miles and endured loneliness and hardship to carry the Gospel to the natives in their heathenism, but he has been ever ready to thrust his persistent and invincible personality between these poor, ignorant creatures and the cruel and rapacious human sharks who would prey upon them. He has also been indefatigable in his self-denying efforts to introduce the reindeer into their impoverished land and secure them from extinction by starvation.

Dr. Jackson's whole career in Alaska is one heroic story, but here is a simple account of one little missionary trip in a canoe which for motive, exposure and danger, might well be put alongside of Paul's trip when he was shipwrecked on his way to Rome.

At three o'clock in the morning they were roused and were soon underway without any breakfast. This did not matter much, however, as their entire stock of provisions consisted of a limited quantity of ship-biscuit and smoked salmon. Biscuit and salmon for breakfast, salmon and biscuit for dinner, and straight salmon for a change for supper in the evening. The Indians upon the trip only averaged one meal in twenty-four hours.

One morning, passing the mouth of a shallow mountain stream, the canoe was anchored to a big rock. The Indians with poles and paddles clubbed to death some thirty salmon, averaging twenty-five pounds each in weight. These were thrown into the canoe and taken along.

At noon they put ashore for their first meal that day. From some rocks under the shelter of a great rock. The fish, cleaned and hung upon sticks, were soon broiling before the fire. After dinner all hands took a nap upon the beach. At three o'clock in the afternoon they were again under way. When night came the Indians could find no suitable landing place, and paddled on until two o'clock next morning, having made a day's work of twenty-three hours. Finding a sheltered bay they then ran ashore. As it was raining hard they spread their blankets as best they could, under sheltering rocks or projecting roots of the great pines.

After a few hours of uncomfortable sleep they were again under way. Toward evening they passed Cape Fox, and boldly launched out to cross the arm of the sea, and once out they found the sea becoming so rough that it was as dangerous to turn back as to go forward. The night was dark, the waves rolling high, and the storm beating upon them. One Indian stood upon the prow of the canoe all night watching the waves and giving orders. Every man was at his place, and the stroke of the paddles kept time with the measured song of the leader, causing the canoe to mount each wave with two strokes: then, with a click, each paddle would, at the same instant, strike the side of the canoe and remain motionless, gathering strength for the next wave. As the billows struck the canoe it quivered from stem to stern.

In the morning they landed at an old deserted Indian village whose forest of totem poles told of the heathenish rites and superstitions from which he was trying to save this wretched people. These horrid monuments of the past, with their grinning faces, spoke to him only too plainly of the savage butcheries, horrible cannibal feasts, inhuman torture of witches, fiendish carousals around the burning dead.

The Indians were so exhausted by the labors of the past night that they were compelled to go ashore and get some rest. On shore they tried to start a fire, but the driving rain soon extinguished it. Taking his regulation meal of salmon and hard tack, Dr. Jackson spread his blankets under a big log and tried to sleep. The beating storm soon saturated the blankets, and he awoke to find the water running down his back. Rising, he paced up and down the beach until the Indians were ready to move on. After a rest of two hours, seeing no signs of a lull in the storm, they re-embarked on their journey.

Such journeys this heroic man was willing to take that he might carry the Gospel to his brethren whom he had never seen before, and who had no more claim on him than they have upon us. And yet how hard it is for us sometimes to pluck up courage to go around on the other side of the block, and climb three flights of stairs, to carry a message of hope and salvation, to some one of our own color and tongue, who has become disheartened, and lost their way, and are perishing for just the word of good cheer we can speak. Thinking of Jackson's dark night in the canoe, it ought not seem so hard to take up that postponed duty and go on our errand for the Master this very day.

Requests for Prayer.

AT the Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Dec. 6, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

For the Conversion of Praying Mother, of Relatives and Friends.

associates in work. They are surrounded with strong temptations and do not realize that the grace of God is needed to keep them from falling into ruinous vices.—King's Daughter, Elkhorn, Mont., that her husband and a friend may both give their hearts to Christ and be led to serve him faithfully. Both are indifferent to the welfare of their souls.—"Invalid Mother," Swamp Mills, N. Y., that three sons who have passed through many trials and have had much to draw them away from Christ, may yet be led by the Holy Spirit to seek the Lord; also that three daughters who have made profession of faith, may devote their lives to the Lord's service and be kept from all evil.—Subscriber, Cambridge, N. Y., for the conversion of a dear friend and his wife. The husband once professed himself a follower of Christ but was led away by evil companions and fell into gross sin. He has now reformed but feels that he cannot call himself a Christian. His wife is indifferent. Please pray that both may be born again and have grace to train their children for God.—

"Mother," Longsford, Pa., desires prayer for the conversion of a wayward son, who was at one time a successful business man, but has been brought to wreck and ruin by his uncontrollable propensity to drink.—C. V. F. A., St. Louis, Mo., for the conversion of a whole family, consisting of father, mother, one son, and six daughters, who are all without hope and without God in the world.—"Widowed Mother," St. Clairsville, O., that four daughters and a son might consecrate their lives to God, and that more grace may be given to her to do her duty in the family and the Church, and that she may have assurance of her own salvation.—"Constant Reader," Ethel Landing, Pa., for the conversion of a dear brother, who was once an active church-member, but fell away under the burden of a distressing family trial and has become the slave of liquor; also that another brother, a sister, and a sister-in-law all unconcerned about their souls, may be saved.—Subscriber, Quackenkill, N. Y., for the conversion of a beloved father, and for special guidance in undertaking work for Christ.—C. C. Elgin, Neb., that her husband may turn to the Lord with all his heart and may help in training his children for Christ.—

"Heart-broken Mother," Hackettstown, N. J., that God in his infinite mercy would touch the hearts of her son and daughter. The son scoffs at religion and the daughter has lost her character, but neither is beyond the reach of God's mercy. "Do pray for them."—Anxious Mother, Lowell Kan., that her son, who is far away from home amid many temptations, may be led to Christ and become a good man.—Reader, Grundy Centre, Ia., for the conversion of a son for whom many prayers have been offered.—Reader, Springfield, Ill., for the conversion of a husband, son, and daughter. The husband is falling under the power of drink and is causing great anxiety. Earnest prayers are desired that Christ will save him from sin.—O. B., Mobile, Ala., for the conversion of two young men.—Reader, Ulster Park, N. Y., for the conversion of a son.—S. S., Stockton, Cal., for the conversion of an entire family.—Widowed Mother, Quana, Tex., that her three sons, who are exposed to many temptations, may give themselves to the Saviour and become children of God.

For the Restoration of Health. Mother, Philadelphia, Pa., asks prayer for the recovery of her dear infant, who has been ill for several months.—J. L. W., Anita, Pa., for recovery from sickness, and that a dear friend who has suffered for years may be healed.—H. S., Farmingdale, N. J., that a sick woman may be healed in body and mind and be kept from all evil.—Reader, Dayton, O., that relief may be given from severe pain, and that a nephew now in a hospital may speedily recover.—"Unhappy Mother," Byron, Ga., for the restoration of her daughter's reason.—Believer, Tunkhannock, Pa., for recovery from a nervous disease.—J. H. F., Wildis, Ky., that if God will his beloved wife may be restored to health.—F. S. T., Chillicothe, Mo., for the recovery of a sufferer from spinal disease.—Reader, Cleghorn, Ia., for the recovery of an afflicted sister, or if God will that peace and an abundant entrance may await her in his presence.—Believer, Hancock, Mass., on behalf of a man threatened with total blindness.—S. W., Springfield, Ill., for the healing of a painful and disfiguring malady.—S. L., Leona, Pa., for the recovery of a sufferer in body and mind.—Believing Mother, Richmond, Ind., for the restoration to health of body and mind of a daughter now in an asylum.—Reader, Chenango, N. Y., that a dear sister threatened with blindness may recover her sight, that she may continue to work for the support of her helpless children.—Reader, Wabash, Ind., that a distressing sickness of many years standing may be cured.

For Special Blessings. Believer, New York City, who is in distress, fearing that certain symptoms indicate the approach of a terrible disease, asks prayer that God would in great mercy avert the calamity and give grace to live worthily and consistently.—Believer in Ohio, that God would bless a business undertaking, so that he may be delivered from impending calamity.—Two Young Men, Jamaica, W. I., who are about to enter college, that God would bless them and make them useful men.—M. F. D., Buford, Ga., for grace to overcome a besetting sin.—O. B., Mobile, Ala., that a bereaved family might receive money justly owing them from an Insurance Company.—"One who Believes," Montclair, N. J., that God would bless an endeavor to obtain employment, so that the family circle may no longer be broken.—Reader, Paola, Kan., that God would answer the prayers that a home may be obtained.—A. V. J., Palmyra, Mo., that God would give the needed strength to bear an impending bereavement.—"In His Name," McZenia, O., who confesses backsliding, that God would in mercy forgive his penitent child and restore the joy of salvation.—Believer, Winton, Ia., that strength and wisdom may be given her to earn a living for her children.

Persons desiring the prayers of the Converts' Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission should address their letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 91-102 Bible House, New York.

From the Pricking of a Finger.

Edison, the inventor, tells a remarkably interesting story of his accidental discovery of the principle of the phonograph. He says: "I was singing to the mouth-piece of a telephone when the vibrations of the voice sent the fine steel point into my finger. That set me to thinking. If I could record the actions of the point, and send the point over the same surface afterwards, I saw no reason why the thing would not talk. I tried the experiment first on a strip of telegraph paper, and found that the point made an alphabet. I shouted the words 'Hallo! hallo!' into the mouth-piece, ran the paper back over the steel point, and heard a faint 'hallo! hallo!' in return. I determined to make a machine that would work accurately, and gave my assistants instructions, telling them what I had discovered. They laughed at me. That's the whole story. The phonograph, which has been a source of so much interest in the world, is the result of the pricking of a finger."

A Cuban Patriot's Death.

SINCE the beginning of the present war in Cuba, no leader of the Cuban armies has won such renown as General Antonio Maceo, whose brilliant victories in the field, against seemingly overwhelming numbers, have won the admiration of his countrymen. Martinez Campos, ex-Captain-General of Cuba, recognized in Maceo the greatest leader of the Cuban patriots have ever had, and though Maceo was his foe in the field, he credited the Cuban with many admirable qualities. Since Gen. Weyler assumed command of Spain's armies in Cuba, his troops have experienced a succession of reverses, principally at Maceo's hands. Maceo's generalship, it was admitted, had made Weyler's campaign in the mountainous region of Pinar del Rio, a failure. Last week, Cuban circles were startled by the announcement of Maceo's death. Later dispatches from Havana state that the Cuban general was the victim of a vile plot, and was assassinated with his entire staff at a point near Mariel, in Havana province.

The plot for the assassination, it is claimed by the Cubans, was arranged within the Captain-General's palace at Havana. A price had been set upon Maceo's head by Weyler, and in order to effect his capture or destruction, treachery was resorted to. It is asserted in the dispatches, that Dr. Zertucha, Maceo's physician, was approached and agreed to aid the conspirators. A message was sent to Maceo by Gen. Ahumada, next to Weyler in command, inviting the Cuban leader to a conference. After some hesitation, and being persuaded by Zertucha that the proposition was made in good faith, Maceo agreed to a meeting and with his staff of thirty-four officers, set out to meet Ahumada. An ambush of six hundred Spanish troops under Major Cirujeda, surrounded the party at a convenient point and demanded their surrender, which was refused. Instantly a volley was fired into the ranks of the little band of officers and Maceo, and his entire staff, were soon riddled with bullets, Dr. Zertucha alone escaping death. The traitor surrendered to a Spanish soldier, who acting under orders took him to the Spanish colonel in command of the detachment. It is further stated that Zertucha received fifty thousand dollars as the price of this treachery, which deprived the Cuban armies of their ablest leader. Maceo's body has not been found, and is believed to have been hidden in the woods.

Rius Ravera, a young and able officer who has already won several brilliant engagements in the field, is mentioned as Maceo's probable successor as Commander of the Cuban armies. Maceo's death has greatly disheartened the Cuban troops, and Spanish officials in Havana believe that the event will greatly hasten the end of the war. The story of treachery has caused deep and general indignation among the Cuban sympathizers in the United States, who are now more than ever determined to aid Cuba in freeing herself from Spanish rule.

The Bowery Mission Christmas.

On Christmas day a dinner will be given to unemployed men and boys at the Bowery Mission. Superintendent Wyburn and his assistant, Mr. Mershon, expect to be kept busy all day attending to the hungry men who will partake of the Christmas cheer, and who for a few hours at least will forget their wretched, miserable condition, and join in celebrating the birthday of the Saviour of mankind. They invite the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to co-operate with prayers, and also with contributions of food, including turkeys, hams, beef, vegetables, fruit, &c. Those who cannot send these, may be able to help otherwise. Mrs. Sarah J. Bird will have a Christmas tree for the children, giving them toys and clothing. Any gifts for the tree or the dinner should be sent to John H. Wyburn, Supt., 105 Bowery, New York.

Good News for Asthma Sufferers.

HEALING FOR ME.

Who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases. (Ps. 103:3)

With his stripes we are healed. (Isa. 53:5)

And he healed all that were sick; that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, "Himself took our iniquities and bare our sicknesses." (Matt. 8:17)

And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins they shall be forgiven him. (Jas. 5:15)

ORD, when thou wast with us the sick were made whole, Sufferers on thee all their burdens could roll—Healing they found for their body and soul—Heal me, dear Saviour, to-day.

Blessing was asked and the blessing received The deaf, and the lame, and the blind were relieved.

Still may thy promise be fully believed—Heal me, dear Saviour, to-day.

When the sick sought thee with pain on their brow, Full of compassion and mercy wast thou "Thou art the same" thou art pitiful now—Heal me, dear Saviour, to-day.

When thou, dear "Lamb without blemish," wast shorn, Surely my sins and my sickness were borne; "Bruised" for my sorrows—O, why should I mourn?—Heal me, dear Saviour, to-day.

Only a part of thy promise we use; Pardon we take—but thy healing refuse. Health for my body and soul let me choose—Heal me, dear Saviour, to-day.

"Eye hath not seen"—nor hath ear ever heard All that is meant in thy wonderful Word—Let me to deeper faith ever be stirred—Heal me, dear Saviour, to-day.

Thou art unchanging—forever the same—Salvation for body and soul I will claim—All do I ask in thy merciful name—Heal me, dear Saviour, to-day.

"Speak the word only"—let love be revealed—Speak the word only—and sorrow shall yield—Speak the word only—and "I shall be healed"—Heal me, dear Saviour, to-day.

Lord—by the sorrows that Calvary saw, I am made "free from the curse of the law"—Near to thy heart of compassion I draw—Heal me, dear Saviour, to-day.

Lord—there is healing—and healing for me—Blessing for body and soul I may see—Lord, thou hast freed me—and I will be free—Yes—I have healing to-day.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

A Cavalry Charge.

Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, II. Kings 18: 23: . . .

"I will deliver thee two thousand horses, if thou be able on thy part to set riders upon them."

By the waterworks, the upper reservoir of Jerusalem, the general of the besieging army and the generals of besieged Jerusalem are in consultation. Though General Rab-shakeh had been largely paid to stop the siege, he kept the money and continued the siege—the military miscreant! Rab-shakeh derides the capacity of the city to defend itself, and practically says, "You have not two thousand men who can manage horses. Produce two thousand cavalymen, and I will give you a present of two thousand cavalry horses. You have not in all your besieged city of Jerusalem two thousand men who can mount them, and by bit and bridle control a horse." Rab-shakeh realized that it is easier to find horses than skilful riders, and hence he makes the challenge of the text, "I will deliver thee two thousand horses, if thou be able to set riders upon them."

Rab-shakeh, like many another bad man, said a very suggestive thing. The world is full of great energies and great opportunities, but few know how to bridle them and mount them and manage them. More spirited horses than competent riders! The fact is that in the church of God we have plenty of fortresses well manned, and plenty of heavy artillery, and plenty of solid columns of brave, Christian soldiery, but what we most need is cavalry—mounted troops of God—for sudden charge that seems almost desperate. If Washington, if New York, if London are ever taken for God, it will not be by slow bombardment of argumentation, or by regular unlimbering of great theological guns from the portholes of the churches, but by gallop of sudden assault and rush of holy energy that will astound and throw into panic the long lines of drilled opposition, armed to the teeth. Nothing so scares the forces of sin as a revival that comes, they know not whence, to do that which they cannot tell, to work in a way that they cannot understand. They will be overcome by flank movement. The church of God must double up their right or left wing. If they expect us from the north, expert us at twelve o'clock at noon, we will come upon them at twelve o'clock at night. The opportunities for this assault are great and numerous, but where are the men? "I will deliver thee two thousand horses, if thou be able to set riders upon

The opportunities of saving America and saving the entire planet were never so great as now. Have you not noticed the willingness of the printing press of the country to give the subject of evangelism full saving in column after column? Such tribulation and religious journalism. Now all religious intelligence and print most offered to all engaged in the world's evangelism. The first book of any importance that was ever published, after Johann Gutenberg invented the art of printing, was the Bible. Well might that poor man toil on, polishing stones and manufacturing looking-glasses, and making experiments that brought upon him the charge of insanity, and borrowing money, now from Martin Brether and now from Johann Faust, until he set on foot the mightiest power for the evangelization of the world. The statue in bronze which Thorwaldsen erected for Gutenberg in 1837, and the statue commemorating him by David D'Angers in 1840, and unveiled amid all the pomp that military processions and German bands of best music could give the occasion, were insignificant compared with the fact, to be demonstrated before all earth and all heaven, that Johann Gutenberg, under God, inaugurated forces which will yet accomplish the world's redemption. The newspaper press will yet announce nations born in a day. The newspaper press will report Christ's sermons yet to be delivered, and describe his personal appearance, if, as some think, he shall come again to reign on earth. The newspaper press may yet publish Christ's proclamation of the world's emancipation from sin and sorrow and death. Tens of thousands of good men in this and other lands have been ordained by the laying on of hands to preach the Gospel, but it seems to me that just now, by the laying on of the hands of the Lord God Almighty, the newspaper presses are being ordained for preaching the Gospel with wider sweep and mightier resound than we have ever yet imagined. The iron horses of the printing press are all ready for the battle, but where are the men good enough and strong enough to mount them and guide them? "I will deliver thee two thousand horses, if thou be able to set riders upon them."

Go out to the Soldiers' Home and talk with the men who have been in the wars, and they will give you right appreciation of what is the importance of the cavalry service in battle. You hear the clatter of the hoofs and the whirr of the arrows and the clash of the shields and the bang of the carbines as they ride up and down the centuries. Clear back in time, Osymandyas led twenty thousand mounted troops in Bactriana. Three hundred and seventy-one years before Christ, Epaminondas headed his troops at full gallop. Alexander, on a horse that no other man could ride, led his mounted troops. Seven thousand horsemen decided the struggle at Arbela. Although saddles were not invented until the time of Constantine, and stirrups were unknown until about four hundred and fifty years after Christ, you hear the neighing and snorting of the horses in the greatest battles of the ages. Austerlitz and Marengo, and Solferino were decided by the cavalry. The mounted Cossacks reinforced the Russian snow storms in the obliteration of the French army. Napoleon said if he had only had sufficient cavalry at Bautzen and Lutzen his wars would have triumphantly ended. The Duke of Wellington had his old war horse, Copenhagen, turned out in best pasture, and that the Duchess of Wellington wore a brace-let if a carriage is full. Not one drop of my blood is in the arch of my neck and pawing hoof and panting nostril of Job's cavalry horse: "Hast thou clothed his neck with thunder? He paweth in the valley: he goeth on to meet the armed men. The quiver rattleth against him, the glittering spear and the shield. He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha; and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting."

I think it is the cavalry of the Christian hosts, the grand men and women who, with bold dash and holy recklessness and spurred-on energies, are to take the world for God. To this army of Christian service belong the Evangelists. It ought to be the business of the regular churches to multiply them, to support them, to cheer them, to clear the way for them. Some of them you like, some of them you do not like. You say some are too sensational, and some of them are not enough learned, and some of them are erratic, and some of them are too vehement, and some of them pray too loud. Oh, fold up your criticism and let them do that which we, the pastors, can never do. I like all the evangelists I have ever seen or heard. They are busy now; they are busy every day of the week. While we, the pastors, serve God by holding the fortress of righteousness and drilling the Christian soldiery, and by marshalling anthems and sermons and ordinances on the right side, they are out fighting the forces of darkness "hip and thigh, with great slaughter." All success to them! The faster they gallop, the better I like it. The keener the lances they fling, the more I admire them. We care not what conventionality they infract, if they only gain the victory. Moody, and Chapman, and Mills, and Jones, and Harrison, and Munhall, and Major Cole, and Crittenden, and a hundred others are now making the cavalry charge, and they are this moment taking New York and Philadelphia and Cincinnati for God, and I wish they might take our nation's capital. Hear the tremendous facts: There are now in this country nearly one hundred and sixty-six thousand church congregations, with nearly twenty-one million communicants and seating capacity in church for more than forty-three million people; in other words, room in the churches for three-fourths of the population of this country, and about one-third of the population of this country already Christian. In other words, we will have only to average bringing two souls to God during the next three years and our country is redeemed. Who can not, under the power of the Holy Ghost, bring two souls to God in three years? As so many will bring hundreds and thousands to God, most of you have to bring only one soul to God and the Gospel campaign for this continent will be ended. If you cannot bring one soul to God, or two souls, or three souls, in three years, you are no Christian, and deserve yourself to be shut out of heaven. The religious pessimists of this country are all the time depicting the obstacles as so great and our forces as so small, that we half of the time feel that we are attempting an impossibility. Take out of your prayers and preaching some of your stuffing of groans and put in something of acclamation and triumph, and the United States will be gospelized, and if the United States be gospelized America will be gospelized, and America gospelized, we will take Asia from the Pacific beach and Europe from the Atlantic beach, and not far from now the lost star we live on will take its place among the constellations that never fell. Let the more than twenty-one million communicants, as they lift the sacramental cup to their lips, take oath that they will not rest until the other forty million are saved. The opportunities are all saddled and bridled. Where are the men and women to guide them? "I will deliver thee two thousand horses, if thou be able to set riders upon them." What two men can do for good or evil is impressed upon me by the fact that two Scotchmen, going to California, each took something that would remind him of his native country. The one took a thistle the national emblem of Scotland. The other took a hive of bees. Years went by and the work of the two Scotchmen is widely seen. The curse of the Pacific slope is the thistle, and the blessing of the Pacific slope is the honey found everywhere in woods and fields. In your life are you responsible for honey or thistles, and if one man can do so much good, and another so much evil, how much could be done for the ransom of this country by twenty-one million people all consecrated?

Get out of the way with your dolorous foreboding, and change your Dirges for what we have not done for the Grand March of what we may do and will do. The woman at Sedan, in whose house Napoleon the Last was waiting to make surrender of himself and his army, said to the overthrown French Emperor, "What can I do for you?" And the despairing ex-monarch replied, "Nothing but draw down the blind so that I cannot be stared at." In this Gospel campaign we have plenty to draw down the blinds. In God's name I say, Pull up the blinds, and let the morning sun of the coming victory shine upon us. What we want in this campaign for God is the self-abnegation and courage of the men of Sir Colin Campbell who, as Lord Bishop Cowie of New Zealand, once Chaplain of his army, told me, said to the troops: "Men, no retreat from this place. Die right here." And they shouted: "Yes, Sir Colin; we will do it." And they did!

Temporary defeats ought not to dishearten. What is Bunker Hill monument? Monument of defeat. But from that bloody mount American Independence started for its grandest achievement, and all the defeats of the cause of God are incipient victory.

Thy saints in all this glorious war
Shall conquer, though they die.
They see the triumph from afar
And seize it with their eye.

And now, standing as I do, in this National Capital, let me say that what we want in the Senate and House of Representatives and the Supreme Court is a pentecostal blessing that will shake the continent with divine mercy. There recently came into my hands the records of two Congressional prayer-meetings, on the rolls of which were the names of the most eminent Senators and Representatives who then controlled the destinies of this republic—the one Congressional prayer-meeting in 1857, and the other in 1866. The record is in the hand-writing of the philanthropist, William E. Dodge, then a member of Congress. There are now more Christian men in the National Legislature than ever before. Why will they not band together in a religious movement which before the inauguration of the next President, shall enthrone Christ in the hearts of this nation? They have the brain, they have the eloquence, they have the influence. God grant them the grace sufficient! Who in Congressional circles will establish the Capitoline prayer-meeting in 1897? Let the evening of the last decade of this century be irradiated with such a religious splendor. There are the opportunities for a national and international charge, all bridled and saddled. Where are the riders to mount them?

The cavalry suggests speed. When once the reins are gathered into the hands of the soldierly horseman, and the spurs are struck into the flanks, you hear the rataplan of the hoofs. "Velocity" is the word that describes the movement,—acceleration, momentum,—and what we want in getting into the kingdom of God is celerity. You see the years are so swift, and the weeks are so swift, and the days are so swift, and the hours are so swift, and the minutes are so swift, we need to be swift. For lack of this appropriate speed many do not get into heaven at all. Here we are in the last Sabbath of the year. Did you ever know a twelfth month quicker to be gone? The golden rod of one autumn speaks to the golden rod of the next autumn, and the crocus of one springtime to the crocus of another springtime, and the snowbanks of adjoining years almost reach each other in unbroken curve. We are in too much hurry about most things. Business men in too much hurry rush into speculations that ruin them and ruin others. People move from place to place in too great haste and they wear out their nerves, and weaken the heart's action. But the only thing in which they are afraid of being too hasty is the matter of the soul's salvation. Yet did any one ever get damaged by too quick repentance or too quick pardon or too quick emancipation? The Bible recommends tardiness, deliberation, and snail-like movement in some things, as when it enjoins us to be slow to speak, and slow to wrath, and slow to do evil, but it tells us, "The King's business requireth haste," and that our days are as the flight of a weaver's shuttle, and ejaculates, "Escape for thy life. Look not behind thee: neither stay thou in all the plain." Other cavalry troops may fall back, but mounted years never retreat. They are always going ahead, not on an easy canter, but at full run. Other regiments hear the command of "Halt!" and pitch their tents for the night. The regiments of the years never hear the command of "Halt!" and never pitch tent for the night.

The century leads on its troop of a hundred years, and the year leads on its troop of three hundred and sixty-five days, and the day leads on its troop of twenty-four hours, and the hour leads on its troop of sixty minutes, and all are dashing out of sight. Perhaps there are two years in which we are most interested,—our first and our last. Held up in our mother's arms, we watched the flight of the first. With wondering eyes we all watch the coming of the last. The name of that advancing year we can not call. It may be in the nineties of this century, it may be in the tens or twenties or thirties of the next century, but it is coming at full gallop. With what mood will we meet it? In jocosity, as did Thomas Hood, in his last moment saying, "I am dying out of charity to the undertaker, who wishes to learn a lively Hood." Or in fear, as did Thomas Paine, saying in his last moment, "Oh, how I dread this mysterious leap in the dark." Or in boastfulness, as did Vespasian, saying in his last moment, "Ah! Methinks I am becoming a god." Or in frivolity, as did Demonax, the infidel philosopher, saying in his last moment, "You may go home: the show is over." Or conscience-stricken, as did Charles IX. of France, saying in his last moment, "Nurse! Nurse! What murder! What blood!" Or shall we meet it in gladness of Christian hope, like that of Julius Charles Hare, who said in his last moment, "Upwards! Upwards!" Or like that of Richard Baxter, in his last moment saying, "Almost well." Or like that of Martin of Tours, saying in his last moment, "I go to Abraham's bosom." Or like that of polished Addison, who said in his last moment, "See with what ease a Christian can die." Or like that of George Whitefield, who felt that he had said all that he could of Christ, declaring in his last moment, "I shall die silent." Or like that of Mrs. Schimmelpennich, who said in her last moment, "Do you not hear the voices? And the children's are the loudest." Or like that of Dragonnatti, saying in his last moment, "Stand aside! I see my father and my mother coming to kiss me." Or as did the dying girl who, having a few evenings before sat on a bench in a London mission, was seen to have tears of contrition rolling down her cheek, and who, departing from the room, had put in her hand by a Christian woman, a Bible, with the passage marked, "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." Though having promised to be at the next meeting, she did not come. The Christian woman who gave her the Bible was visiting the hospital, and the nurse said to her, "I wish you had been here a little while ago. We had a young woman who had been run over by a wagon. Poor thing! She was fearfully crushed, and died almost at once. She had a Bible in her hand, with your name in it, and she said when she was brought in, 'Thank God! I found Christ as my Saviour last night. The blood of Jesus Christ, his son, cleanseth us from all sin.'" Oh, my friends, if all right for the next world, the years can not gallop past too rapidly. If it were possible for the centuries to take the speed of the years, and the years the speed of the days, and the days the speed of the hours, they could do us no harm. The shorter our life, the longer our heaven. The sooner we get out of the perils of this life, if our work be done, the better. No man is safe till he is dead. Better men than we have been wrecked, and at all ages. Lord and Lady Napier were on horseback on a road in India. Lord Napier suddenly said to Lady Napier, "Ride on and fetch assistance, and do not ask me why." She sped on and was soon out of sight. The fact was a tiger's eyes glared on them from the thicket, and he did not dare to tell her, lest, affrighted, she fall in the danger and perhaps lose her life. From all sides of us, on this road of life, there are perils glaring on us, from tigers of temptation, and tigers of accident, and tigers of death, and the sooner we get son, they have become whiter than snow. Oh, those celestial cavalades whom our Conqueror in scarlet shall lead on through the streets of heaven! Wide streets, hundreds of mounted troops abreast, long streets, thousands in sight followed by coming thousands through the long day of heaven which hath no setting sun. Mind you, only the cavalry are in that shining procession, those who did work outside the forts, those who dared all things for God, those who had in them the spirit of holy dash. We who did easy work may look at that procession but will not be a part of it. There they pass! the equestrians, and equestriennes of heaven, regiments of evangelists, of tract distributors, of street preachers, of salvation armies, of once half-starved home missionaries on the frontiers, of those who did inconspicuous service for Christ, and never had their name in the newspapers but once and that in the notice of their own obsequies, a notice not accompanied by the request "Send no flowers" for there was no danger that there would be a profusion of flowers. As from the windows and doors of the "House of many Mansions" we look on the passing spectacle some of us will wish that on earth we had had less salary and more hardship, less comfort and more exposure, less caution and more courage, less shelter and more storm, less smooth sailing and more cyclone, and that we had dared all at the front instead of taking good care out of the perils of this life the better. Let 1897 take the place of 1896, and 1898 the place of 1897, and our souls will be landed where there shall be "nothing to hurt of destroy in all God's holy mount." "No lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast shall go up thereon, it shall not be found there, but the redeemed shall walk there. And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." Oh! will it not be grand when from the windows and doors of the "House of Many Mansions" we look out and see passing along the golden boulevards of heaven the white horse cavalry that St. John describes in Revelation? John Wesley said he thought horses had souls, but take the story in Revelation as figurative or literal, you must admit that none but cavalry horses are mentioned as being in heaven. John 19: 14, "The armies which were in heaven followed him upon white horses." You see they are mounted troops. Their Leader is in deep crimson attire. His vesture, we are told, is "dipped in blood," not blood of human slaughter, as many other conquerors have their attire, but his own blood, blood of crucifixion agony, the blood by which he redeemed you and me. That deep red of garment is in vivid contrast with the snowy white charger on which our Lord is seated. And no saved sinner can gaze on that red and that white without remembering that though his sins were once red like crimson, they have become whiter than snow. Oh, those celestial cavalades whom our Conqueror in scarlet shall lead on through the streets of heaven! of ourselves in the rear. Forward mounted troops! Favorites of heaven! Cavalrymen and cavalrywomen of the Lord God Almighty. No chargers of heaven too white, or too arched of neck, or too prancing of gait for those seated on them. If Job's war horse while the battle was going on said "Ha! Ha!" shall not these chargers now that the day is won, utter a more jubilant "Ha! Ha!" Forward under arches of triumph, by fountains rain-bowed of eternal joy, and amid gardens abloom with unfading efflorescence, and along palaces where, after they have dismounted, these souls shall reign forever and ever, they march, they brandish their weapons with which they gained bloodless victory, and they rise in stirrups of gold to greet all the rest of heaven gazing upon them from the amethystine balconies. A glorious heaven it will be for all of us who anywhere, and anyhow served the Lord, but an especial heaven, a mounted heaven, a processional heaven for those who have done outside work, exposed work, and belonged to the Lord's cavalry. "The armies which were in heaven followed him upon white horses."

Then let the creaking door of the closing year go shut. When that closes better doors will open. The world's brightest and happiest years are yet to come. Toward them we speed on in swiftest stirrup. Cavalry charge at Inkermann was not so rapid. At last the equestrians equal the chargers! At last the riders are as many as the horses!

A Unique Railroad.

How Passengers are Conveyed by Elevated Railroad Over Tracks Laid Under Water.

ON this page is a picture of a railroad-car which is probably the only one of its kind in the world. It is used on a line laid between the two English towns of Brighton and Rottingdean. The distance is only four miles, but as the tracks are under water for the greater part of every day, and at high tide are submerged to a depth of from fourteen to eighteen feet, this four mile trip is quite a novel experience. The car is something like the saloon of a trans-Atlantic steamer. It rests on four stout cylindrical pillars of hollow steel, twenty-four feet high, which are firmly bolted together. Each of these rests on a stout truck, technically called a "bogie," which is constructed on the same principle as the trucks of our railroad cars, except that each has an arrangement of teeth to prevent the bogies being washed by the waves from the tracks. As it would be impossible to run this curious car by a locomotive, the constructors have had recourse to electricity for their motive power. Along the side of the track is a line of high pillars with a curved top, from which is suspended a trolley-line connected with a power-station at each end of the line. On the car are two motors of thirty horsepower each, which collect the electricity from the trolley line and convey it to the wheels in the bogie through the hollow pillars on which the car rests. The tracks which have a gauge of thirty-two and a half inches are secured to the solid rock by strong clamps. A distance of eighteen feet separates the up from the down track. The first public journey of this strange car was made the occasion of a municipal festivity. The mayors of the two towns, with the constructors and directors of the line, traveled from Brighton to Rottingdean and back in a little over an hour and afterward celebrated the event by a public dinner and congratulatory speeches. The beach was lined throughout the course with a dense crowd of people, who took the utmost interest in the novel trip and vociferously cheered the car and its occupants as it passed and returned. The experiment was a complete success and its principle will probably be extended to other places where an arm of the sea or a broad river separates two towns.

The Peruvian Mission.

A band of young men from Harley College, England, in the face of the greatest difficulties and discouragements have established a successful Gospel Mission in Peru. The band now numbers six persons. They are: A. Robert Stark and wife, John L. Jarett and wife, F. G. Peters, H. M. Blackhouse. The young men entered Cuzco on the evening of the 4th of July, 1895. They were strangers there, and knew no one. The mountain walls around them were the tombs of a vanished empire. Here for centuries the sun had blazed in the face of a Sun of gold, and his reflecting beams fell on priests and ecstatic worshippers. Here the fruits of the Inca cornfields were offered to the sun. Here gorgeously-robed processions had gone out to meet the sun at his rising through a period of history as dramatic and poetic as any in oriental tradition and song. Here dwelt the successors of the "divine beings" who it was believed had come down from the sun. The Harley missionaries were at first kindly received, and their early efforts to establish themselves seemed hopeful but ere long their presence was made the occasion of great public excitement, and their persecutions began. They were expelled from Cuzco and returned to the coast, but the prefect in ordering them away violated the national constitution and the consular treaty, in regard to the rights of English people in the country, and they have been permitted to return and begin one of the most important missions in the world.

This mission has before it, if it shall grow and be able to use it, a stupendous system of roads. Next to the Roman roads, among the marvelous achievements of human skill must be ranked the road of the Incas over the high plateaus on the Andes. This road is shadowed by the loftiest mountains. It may yet become a great Gospel highway.

FADE YE THE - R

"They were all filled with the Holy Ghost. "It is," says a great preacher, "with the spiritual world as with the natural. The Holy Spirit falls like the dew, but not all receive it. On a dewy morning some substances are wet while others remain dry. Some souls are moved by the Spirit while others are unconscious of it. It is like the wind. We cannot make the wind blow, but we can go where there is likely to be wind. A man who wants to feel the fresh air blow upon him, goes out to sea or climbs the hills. A man who wants to receive the Spirit must be much on the celestial heights of prayer."

AMERICAN HEARTS WITH CUBA.

Our Nation's Warm Sympathy With Her Gallant Struggle for Freedom—Congress May Recognize Cuban Independence.

SINCE the death of Maceo, the brilliant Cuban patriot-soldier, which was announced in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD, the war in Cuba, instead of having received a finishing blow, as the Spaniards evidently the Cuban Republic. It has given rise to a grave question of Executive prerogative. Mr. Olney, Secretary of State, has publicly stated that even if the resolution should pass both Houses, it would be inoperative should the President's approval be withheld: that the right of recognition in such cases belongs solely to the Executive, and can be exercised either with or without the consent of Congress. This is accepted as a sufficient intimation that the resolution, even should it pass, will not be approved, and that the President believes the time has not yet arrived for American intervention. Leading Senators, including Messrs. Chandler and Frye, Justice Harlan, of the Supreme Court, and others oppose this view, but the contention between the State Department and the Senate committee, while it may not go further, will probably have the effect of delaying action for a sufficient length of time to enable the calm judgment of both houses of Congress.

CUBAN SYMPATHIZERS' MEETING AT COOPER UNION, NEW YORK.

hoped, has been renewed with increased energy and determination. Stunned for the moment by the fate of their trusted general and his staff, who, according to the telegraphed reports, were assassinated by a Spanish ambush, while riding to a conference to which they had been invited under a truce by Gen. Ahumada—the insurgent armies quickly rallied from the disaster, and are now again opposing a resolute front to the troops of Spain. Indignation over the treachery that resulted in Maceo's death is not confined to Cuba; it has spread all over this land of liberty and fair-play, and many hundreds of Americans have offered their services in the war for the liberation of the "Ever-Faithful Isle." It is probable that many Americans will ultimately find their way into the Cuban ranks. Offers of arms and money have been freely made and a number of mass meetings have been held in different parts of the country, at which resolutions have been passed denouncing Spanish methods of warfare and urging American intervention. This sympathetic enthusiasm is not by any means confined to the Eastern States. Meetings have been held at Cleveland, O., Kansas City, Mo., Columbus, O., Dubois, Pa., Chicago, Ill., Jersey City, N. J., and other places, in which enthusiastic speeches were made in behalf of Cuban freedom and urging intervention. Offers of volunteer troops have been wired from a score of cities and towns, including St. Louis, Mo., Dallas, Tex., Chillicothe, O., Indianapolis, Ind., Hornellsville, N. Y., Port Huron, Mich., Zanesville, O., Union, Ill., Decatur, Mich., Minneapolis, Minn., Tacoma, and a number of others. At some places, the excited populace have hanged and burned General Weyler in effigy, to express their condemnation of the brutal methods by which the Spanish commander has congress to deal with this difficult question. Cable dispatches represent Spain as incensed by the Committee's action and the newspapers of Madrid and Havana are talking abusively and suggest reprisals.

General Weyler's campaign has caused much dissatisfaction in Spain, and the press of Madrid has lately urged the wisdom of his recall and the appointment of General Marin in his place. An attempt has been made, in Spanish official circles, to deny that Maceo and his staff were entrapped and killed, while under truce, and high officials have declared that he fell in open fight. His death is still shrouded in mystery, and although a search has been made for his body it has not yet been found. Some prominent Cubans in Havana profess to believe that Maceo is still alive, although the leaders of the Cuban Junta have declared their belief in his death. Dr. Zertucha, whose treachery is said to have betrayed the patriot, has made contradictory statements, which give the impression, both in Cuba and America, that the real facts have not yet come to light. Since the betrayal, several encounters have occurred between Pinar del Rio and Matanzas, but the details have been suppressed by the government, which is endeavoring to create the impression that the insurgents are demoralized, although this is denied by the Cuban leaders. Meanwhile, thousands in Cuba—Spanish as well as native—have been brought to the verge of ruin by Weyler's military policy. By his orders, land within the boundaries of certain districts has been forbidden to be planted, and no crops have been raised for many months. Hundreds of rich plantations have been laid waste, many of them the property of American citizens. Trade is paralyzed, steamers and ships in Havana and other ports are idle, stores and factories are closed, and debts are accumulating. Owing to the unparalleled dearth of grain and food-stuffs, starvation and famine threaten a large part of the island. In some places, the scant supply of bread is already held at famine prices. Unless the military strain is relaxed and the land allowed to be used, great suffering is unavoidable.

Cuba, "the gem of the Antilles," is the largest and richest island of the West Indian group. It has an area of 43,222 square miles. Discovered by Columbus, it was afterwards taken possession of by the Spanish Crown. It is claimed that there does not now remain a single trace of its original inhabitants, and that the name of the island is the only existing reminder of a period prior to the Spanish conquest. It is a tax-burdened Cuban peasant and the Governor whose name has become the synonym of brutality and outrage. Still another picture shows a scene in front of Cooper Union, New York, where a body of enthusiastic volunteers—Americans and Cubans—are marching into the hall to attend the great mass meeting in behalf of Cuba, which was held there on Monday evening, December 21. This was the greatest of all the public gatherings yet held and the speeches were of a character to show the temper of the American people, whose hearts are with down-trodden Cuba in her struggle for emancipation from Spain's cruel yoke. At the Cooper Union meeting, speakers of national fame, including several members of Congress, lifted up their voices for "Free Cuba." In the metropolitan churches and in many pulpits throughout the country as well, Gen. Weyler's brutal war on non-combatants and defenceless women, his disregard of military usages and his brutal butcheries of Cuban prisoners arrested merely as "suspects," have been strongly denounced by pastors of almost every Christian denomination. At the present moment there is no other topic so universally and absorbingly discussed by the entire American people, and the action of our government is anxiously awaited by all classes.

Intemperance and Crime.

The Massachusetts Bureau of statistics of Labor has recently issued a report upon its investigation of the relations of intemperance to crime, pauperism, and insanity, which contains much interesting material for reflection. The investigation of pauperism covered 3,230 cases, 2,633 males and 597 females. As 352 of these were of children under 15 years of age, they should be excluded from the consideration. It was found that 1,966 of the remaining 2,428 males and 140 of the 450 females were addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors, showing that there is very little pauperism among men who abstain from drink. In considering intemperance as a cause of crime, 26,672 cases were investigated.—23,581 of males and 3,091 of females; 15,543 males and 2,032 females were committed for drunkenness, and 608 males and 49 females for drunkenness in connection with other crimes. In other words, 18.232 of the 26,672 commitments—nearly 69 per cent.—were for intemperance. There were 7,430 commitments of men and 1,010 of women for other offenses. It was found that 3,367 of these men and 273 of the women were intoxicated when their crimes were committed.

MR. MOODY WARNS SOCIETY.

The Evangelist Declares that Christ Would not be Welcome if He Came—The Service at Sing Sing Prison Work at Northfield.

A STARTLING statement was made by Mr. Moody at his service in Carnegie Music Hall on December 20. Probably every one present expected some reference to the festival of the coming week, when all Christendom celebrates the birth of Christ. They must, however, hardness of the way of the transgressor, but the power of Christ to make men partakers of the divine nature. He dwelt on the fact that punishment does not make men better and that the real hope there is for any man in this world and the next, whether he is a sinner of great or less de-

Mr. Sankey sang "Ninety-and-Nine" in his inimitable manner, and the convicts filed back into their cells, singing as they marched.

Mr. Moody has promised to send a thousand copies of his new book to Sing Sing, all the convicts having, at his invitation, expressed a wish to have it, and doubtless many earnest prayers will go up for God's blessing on the reading of it. Mr. Moody is taking a special interest in the prisons at this time, and has a plan, which only waits for the necessary funds, to put copies of the Bible and religious books in every prison in the land. This is only one of the many enterprises this man of consecrated Christian energy has initiated for the evangelization of all classes of the people. His colportage society for the circulation of religious literature in the rural districts, in its cheapest and most attractive form is another far-reaching and beneficent work. But none of these in Mr. Moody's opinion has the promise of so wide an influence as the work to which he has given his best energies for so many years at Northfield and Mount Hermon. There young men and women and girls

Northfield men of deep spiritual insight who have devoted their efforts to getting light and guidance out of its pages, rather have been unprepared for the practical turn the great Evangelist gave to the subject by asking who would be disposed to give the Son of God a glad welcome if he were to come now to reign. Would the governments of the nations give him official welcome? Would New York be glad to see him? Would the politicians, or the financiers, or the leaders of society be glad to know that he was coming? Mr. Moody came nearer home when he asked whether the churches would vote for his coming and lay aside pride and show, and receive their Lord in the spirit in which he should be met. The preacher did not conceal his own sorrowful conviction that in spite of the superficial reverence and devotion professed for Christ, he would have but a cold welcome, and it would be said again, as it was said when he came nineteen hundred years ago: "He came unto his own and his own received him not."

One of the most attentive audiences that Mr. Moody has preached to during his campaign in New York, was that gathered in the prison at Sing Sing, on December 16. Work in the prison was suspended at noon, and at two o'clock the convicts, about a thousand in number, marched in lock step into the chapel. Mr. Moody had sent a quantity of hymn books in beforehand, and the prison choir had practised some of the hymns, so that when the hymn, "Saved by Grace," was announced, it went were wet with unusual tears as he told the story of Valentine Burke, who had been saved after twenty years of prison experience. At the close of his sermon and boys are being trained to go out as workers for Christ, and every year great conventions are held where Christian ministers and laborers in all departments come to get fresh inspiration and renewed physical and spiritual energy for new effort.

Few people who have not visited Northfield know the extent of the work that is being done there. Here and at Mount Hermon, about fifty buildings have been erected, and a thousand acres of land occupied in the various departments of this Christian training movement. The Northfield seminary for girls has had a career of seventeen years, and only two years less is the record of the Mount Hermon school for boys. These with their dormitories, and the great Auditorium, Marquand Hall, the Library, the Recitation Halls, and the Mount Hermon Seminary for Young Men are among the most prominent of the buildings in the cluster. To many people, however, there are scenes outdoors in and around Northfield more hallowed than any of its beautiful buildings. The summer schools and conventions which hold many of their meetings in the open air have made that Massachusetts region a very Bethel to servants of Christ in many lands.

At these summer gatherings, as in all Mr. Moody's work, the Bible is the main study. It has been his delight to get to than those who subject it to literary criticism. Such men as the late Dr. A. J. Gordon of Boston, Dr. Marcus Rainsford, Dr. Andrew Bonar, Rev. F. B. Meyer of London, Rev. George C. Needham, Major Whittle, Dr. A. T. Pierson, and Dr. A. C. Dixon of Brooklyn have come there to give their brethren the fruits of their lifelong study. There parts of the day have been spent in Bible study, parts in conference on the best methods of practical work, and parts in roaming through the lovely country around Northfield drinking in the pure air and getting bodily recuperation. In these conferences many a young man has consecrated his life to work for Christ either in the home or foreign field, and has gone back to commence a career of service filled with the Spirit which has been poured out during those summer days. Mr. Moody usually presides at the meetings, but he leaves the speaking for the greater part to his invited guests, only taking care that the talk does not become desultory, but is directed to some practical end. The musical part of the exercises is never neglected. Mr. Sankey delights to visit Northfield, where, as Mr. Moody quaintly expresses it, he sang one building into existence. He is always a welcome guest and adds a charm that is thoroughly appreciated to the sessions of the Conventions. Mr. McGranahan, Mr. and Mrs. Towner and other famous Gospel singers find their way there, too, and make the woods echo with their melodious strains. They are assisted by the Mount Hermon choir, a double quartette, the members of which were trained in the Mount Hermon school. Mr.

Moody has always placed the highest value on the aid of Gospel song. Probably there is no hill except those trodden by our Lord himself, that calls up sacred memories in so many Christian hearts as the famous Round Top, of which a picture appears on this page. There the convention has waited time and again like the disciples on the day of Pentecost for the endowment of power and, like them, those who waited have gone forth to preach the Gospel in many lands and in many tongues. Mr. Moody is one of those men who can say with the emphasis of a full heart, "I believe in the Holy Ghost," and in many a solemn hour those hills and glades have been the scene of earnest pleading for the power, when he and the leaders of the Lord's host from this and other lands have met together under the shade of those trees. The Conventions commenced in 1880 and have been continued, with an interval while Mr. Moody was in England, down to the present time. They are of many kinds, and for many different kinds of workers, but the purpose of all is the same—to give new life and energy to the worker and to deepen and strengthen that sacred, mysterious connection of which Christ said: "He that abideth in me and I in him the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without me ye can do nothing."

Home Talks with Mothers and Daughters.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Fading Embers.

ANOTHER year almost gone. We are living in the last days of 1896. A few more experiences, a few more hours only, and we will be writing 1897 at the top of our page, and reminding everybody that the century is very near its end. Already in our colleges, the lads and the girls have entered the class of 1900. When you think of that it makes you feel quite solemn, for the step from one century to another seems like a great undertaking. To leave the old nineteenth which has served us so well, and presto! find ourselves in the twentieth, why there's a magical swiftness about it hard to understand, and hard to describe. Then to think how the twentieth century people will talk about and write about us, as if they knew everything, and we had known nothing; it would be hard to bear, if we did not expect to live along into at least a few of the bright new years to be labelled 1900.

But the twentieth century isn't here yet, and won't be for three more years. So we may sit down comfortably beside the fire, and over our cakes and apples, discuss the time that has fled since last we kept watch-night together.

For one thing, there's Polly's engagement. It is rather a shock to a mother when her daughter is old enough to be married, and, as for little Polly, why she has grown up so fast, that when Ned came to ask her parents for their consent to the betrothal, it seemed perfectly absurd. Papa said so with emphasis.

"Polly! What's the young man thinking about? She's only a school-girl."

"I'm nineteen, father," said Polly, with dignity.

"And I was but eighteen when you and I were married Jonathan," added Polly's mother.

So consent was given, and you have had an engaged couple in the house for the last three months. I hope it isn't to be a long engagement, this of Polly's and Ned's. Nothing takes the bloom away from life like a long period of courtship, stretching over slowly-dragging years. After young people have become so well acquainted with one another, that they are ready to pledge themselves for a life's partnership, they should be encouraged to marry without too much delay. Small means should not be considered a barrier. Let them have faith and love and a resolution to live strictly within their means, however limited they may be, and they will find that where "there's bread for one, there's bread for two."

Polly's engagement has of course, made this a notable year in the family annals, but it is not the only eventful thing we chronicle as we sit by the fire.

(Take one of mother's crisp crullers, and eat as you talk. No. It won't keep you awake. Quite the contrary. If people only knew it, something to eat before going to bed would often insure them pleasant and sound sleep. Going to bed hungry is one of the worst things I know about. The brain will rest better if the stomach is not clamorous on account of a vacuum.)

It was last summer that Jerome had typhoid fever, was it not? Well, that was a hard time, a time of anxious days, and constant watching. The doctor making three visits a day; a nurse in the house, and the neighbors all so interested and kind. We never really thought that Jerome would pull through, but he did, and now seems very well and strong again, and our hearts are full of gratitude to God. So many vacant chairs in this wide land, but none in our house. On the last night of the year, we uplift our joyful hymn, thank God, and take courage.

"Reviewing a year is rather humiliating work," says Aunt Katherine, the dear saint, laying down her shining knitting needles, and folding her hands in her lap. "One is so sure that one might have made more progress, done more for everybody, not lost one's temper so often, been more unselfish. When I look back I feel greatly ashamed that I have not been a truer and better Christian. I'm one of the disciples whose following is afar off."

"Now, Auntie," cries sweet young Priscilla, "You are every single day a shining example to me. I could not be so good as you if I tried all the while. I cannot see what makes you humble."

"Of course, dear," said mother, "it is your Aunt's piety which makes her take so lowly a view of herself. We must always look to our pattern, our dear Lord Jesus, and if we do this we shall have no need to be comparing ourselves with any earthly friend. The prayer of every heart should be that we may be daily changed into Christ's image, made ever more like him in spirit and life. So we shall recommend him to the world."

It is a custom in our family for us all to be very candid and outspoken, and we say what we mean. Nobody takes offense.

A BLACKSMITH SHOP WHERE A SUNDAY SCHOOL WAS STARTED.

because there is the art of speaking the truth in love, and our dear mother practices it, and preaches the accomplishment to her household.

Nor do we leave religion out of our common talk. When we have something to say of God and heaven and Christ's help on the road, we simply say it, and pass on to other things, religion being part of our real every-day life and thought.

The clock is striking twelve. Ring out the old! Ring in the new! Put out the lights! Lock the doors! Cover up the fire! The King is dead. The world hates to cry, "Long live the King!"

Good-bye old year. Good-bye.

A Missionary Who Started a Sunday School in a Blacksmith Shop in the Mountains—Our Sunday School Missionary's Work.

FROM time to time THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has published letters received from the Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, our Sunday School Missionary in the Southwest, and also from missionaries of the American Sunday School Union in the Southern States and the far West, giving highly interesting accounts of the founding of schools in out-of-the-way places, and frequently under the most peculiar circumstances. One of the most novel experiences thus far related is contained in a letter from Mr. W. H. Gill, a missionary of the A. S. S. U in Arizona, which says:

"I met a young man who lives in the neighborhood of a little blacksmith shop on the roadside. He said to me, 'our folks wish me to ask you to come over there as soon as you can and show us to carry on a Sunday School—they never had one with talkin' bout.' An appointment was made, and the following Sunday found me at the wayside blacksmith shop. Here I found about forty lively-looking young people, all destitute of books, except two girls who came from the C—R— district, bringing each a hymn-book. In one corner of the shop, an old rusty anvil and a broken hammer lay on a block, and these utensils served a good purpose. 'Can any of you boys and girls tell me what it takes to organize a blacksmith shop?' I asked, with book on the anvil. Three hands went up.—one boy said: 'Some bellowses to blow the fire.' Another said: 'A pair o' tongs an' some hoss shoe nails, a tub o' water an' a grine-stone.' 'All very well so far,' said I. 'And now there is something it must have in order to run the business. Who'll tell me right quick?' Here a little girl got in the first answer. 'I kin tell ye,' she said. 'Somebody to hit the hot iron.' I said, 'Now let us see if we can start up a Sunday School on this same plan. How many of you will do some 'blowing' for the school, and get up a good hot interest in it?' A dozen hands went up. Then some agreed to act as 'tongs,' 'chain-links,' 'bands,' and 'bolts,' and other useful parts, and when we got the subject well heated the question was asked, 'who'll be the man to stand at the Sunday School anvil, as Superintendent and 'strike while the iron is hot?' very appropriately, indeed, the choice fell on a good workman, who knows well how to 'make the sparks fly.' And quite smilingly did he accept the appointment and the hearty hand-shaking of our missionary."

"One Sunday lately a new Chapel was opened for Sunday School and preaching service, near the old house in which I started a small Union School, years ago, in the vicinity of Reedy Patch Gap. The roll-call has run up from 36 to 79, and the Superintendent says he is 'still making a clean sweep' of the neighborhood, as the population increases. 'My last recruits,' said he, 'were from a poor family in Terry's Gap settlement—four little fellows came three miles down the valley, riding in primitive style, on a wood-sled drawn by a small ox. We had a full house last Sunday. Two weeks ago, in the neighborhood of Byers Mountain, I met a boy toting a sack of corn, on his way to a grist mill. 'Put your sack right here in my buggy,' said I, 'and get in and ride with me a piece. Tell me some more about yourself, what you have been doing. Climbing up by my side, the boy readily replied: 'I ain't been a fishin' lately—dey is mighty nigh done bitin'. I don't go down to the creek Sundays like I uster do, but I seed some colored boys a slippin' 'round 'mong the bushes close to the foot-log, one day as I was comin' home from Sunday School, an' I got 'um to 'gree dey'd quit it. I showed 'um my picter card an' a paper. Nex' Sunday them same boys come to our house, after dinner, an' fotch a whole gang o' children wid 'um. I told 'um all I could 'bout the pictures an' things in them cards you gim me, and a'ter awhile Uncle Nesby, he come, too, an' he said he could get a place to meet in right close by where he lives, on t'other side the creek—so now dey has singin' and prayin an sich jes like we do.' Since that ride, I have made a special trip to see 'Uncle Nesby' and his little school. To look into their faces made so glad by getting some help from Am. S. S. Union, wao ample reward for the visit."

During the year now closing, Rev. G. W. Sharp, our own Sunday School missionary, has been instrumental in planting many new Sunday Schools and not a few churches in his extensive missionary territory, and by these means, giving Gospel privileges to localities where they were badly needed. Many readers of this journal have co-operated in supporting his work in the past, and great blessing has resulted in many districts from his labors. Continued co-operation is invited, and all who are interested in thus spreading the Gospel in neglected parts of our own land will be gladly welcomed. There is probably no class of evangelistic labor which is more deserving or more greatly needed in remote sections where, till the faithful missionary comes and performs his task, there is neither meeting-house nor Sunday School. Contributions in support of the work can be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at 92 Bible House, New York, and all will be promptly acknowledged in these columns.

Christmas at the Bowery Mission.

A Bounteous Dinner and a Christmas Tree Gladden Many Hearts.

REAT crowds of men and lads assembled in front of the Bowery Mission early on the evening of Christmas Day. Never since the grand old Mission was opened sixteen years ago, has it been the scene of such a gathering. It was the second annual Christmas Dinner that has been celebrated at the Mission, since it passed under the management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Along the walls of the hall hung festoons of evergreen with illuminated Scripture texts between: pretty decorations brightened the aisles, while the platform was half hidden by a Christmas tree which was dazzling with tinsel ornaments of silver and gold. Big willow baskets on either side of the hall were filled with good-sized cardboard boxes, each box containing an excellent lunch. Superintendent Wyburn and his associates in charge of the Mission, had made ample preparation for entertaining as many of the deserving poor as could be comfortably crowded into the hall, and in this effort they had been ably supplemented by Mrs. Bird, "the Mother of the Bowery Mission." Seen from out-of-doors, the Mission looked so bright and attractive that it was not surprising that it should have drawn together the large crowd so faithfully depicted by our artist in the colored illustration on the first page of this issue. But it was not alone the material blessings that brought these wanderers to the doors of the Mission. It had been a friend to them in the past, a Gospel lighthouse, whose beams had guided them through many perils and dangers, and there many had first heard the name of Jesus and accepted him as their Saviour:

Nor voice can sing, nor heart can frame
Nor can the memory find,
A sweeter sound than thy blest name,
O, Saviour of mankind!

Shortly after six o'clock the doors were opened and the guests entered the Mission Hall. A brief Gospel service was held, Dr. Klopsch reading the lesson. He selected a portion of the second chapter of St. Luke, containing the story of the Saviour's birth, and at the close of the reading spoke earnestly of the joy and peace that would come to those hearts that accepted Jesus at this sacred Christmas-time and resolved, with divine help, to serve him faithfully hereafter. Mrs. Sadie Bell, of St. Bartholomew's Church, sang a solo, after which a convert of the Mission, Mr. J. D. Broome, a lawyer, speaking in the name of a band of converts, presented to Mrs. Bird a handsomely bound Art Bible, suitably inscribed. Mrs. Bird feelingly thanked the converts in a few eloquent words. Then followed more music, and a number of striking testimonies, after which came the event of the day—the Christmas dinner. And what a dinner it was! We wish our readers could have caught a glimpse of the four hundred expectant faces of the men and lads who sat down at the bounteous table.

There were at least a dozen different nationalities represented in that motley assemblage. Some of them were mere wanderers,—homeless, unemployed and still far from God: others—and not a few—were men who had taken hold of Christ and whose lives were being daily made brighter. They were of all ages, from the lad of eighteen or twenty, possibly once the idol of some quiet country home, to the aged graybeard. Some were ragged and all more or less poorly clad; but each and all were aglow with the spirit of Christmas. Never was a dinner more thoroughly enjoyed.

On the following morning the Christmas tree, under the kindly hands of Mrs. Bird and her helpers, was soon bending under a load of such good things as only Christmas trees can bear. There were toys for the little folks and useful articles for their elders, who came to Mrs. Bird's Woman's Meeting on Saturday afternoon. All were delighted and went away with hearts full of grateful memories of Christmas that will serve to brighten the coming year.

bring more recuperation to body, mind, and soul than all entertainment that ever dramatized before footlight or encored prima donna in her most bewitching opera. I say nothing against worldly amusements. I only commend a joy brighter, and grander, and more exuberant, and more lasting. Old age is the test. Put a man who has spent all his extra time amid worldly associates, drinking their wines and keeping their unreasonable hours, and applauding in their exciting carousals, beside a man who has found his joy in God and Christian associations. Which of the twain has the healthier cheek, the steadier hand, the best morals, the happier sundown? The verdict will be unanimous. But the difficulty is that you will hardly find an old disciple of worldly amusement with whom to make comparison. Such men do not live out half their days, while longevity is promised to those who obey God and avoid evil. "With long life will I satisfy thee and show thee my salvation."

Storm Signals.

MORE and more important are becoming the storm signals along our coast: but how strange it is that many venture everything, when God and earth and man and heaven have hung out the storm signals. How many young men would have escaped fatal venture if they had only taken the warning given. They think they have so staunch a craft they can stand any stress of weather, and they go down in the first cyclone. Young man! Better watch the storm signals and not venture out where so many have perished. You wonder so many young men are ruined. The wonder is so many escape. When I see a young man in our city, with stalwartness of frame, indicating that he has fought the temptations of city life and conquered, I can hardly keep from crying, "Bravo!" though he be a stranger. Under the sudden squalls tens of thousands of them have met shipwreck. Blessed, the Young Men's Christian Associations which go forth to greet them! Blessed, the churches which give them hearty welcome! Blessed, the Christian young men who, saved themselves, go forth to save others! Do you know the struggles that young men in our cities go through, whether in high life or in low life? One day a fast young man of Wall street dropped a memorandum in which he was keeping an account of his expenses. This was the diary for one day:

September:
Breakfast at Delmonico's	$6.00
Outfit, as to Wall Street	1.00
Sundries to facilitate business affairs	3.00
Bet. and lost, a hat	10.00
For a good meal	.65
Luncheon at Delmonico's	2.00
Refreshments in the afternoon	2.00
Omnibus going uptown	.10
Dinner and wines at the Hoffman House	9.00
Carriage for self and lady	10.00
Ice cream for the lady	1.00
Having brought lady home, went to Pierce's and lost	22.00
Left Morrissey's and took another car	.15

Total expenses for September 3.... $115.75

On a large scale and in high life, that memorandum illustrates what is being done in our great cities, and on a small scale, in the lives of humbler persons who have not the same means. Hereby we lift the storm signal.

Mercy for Brutes.

SOLOMON was the founder of the first society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, when he said in his Proverbs: "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast." In other words, a man that abuses his horse, or starves his cow, or beats his dog, or maltreats his cat is no Christian. The God who heard the young ravens when they cried will hear every cry of brutal distress. When the grasshoppers and the locusts assail our land, I am not alone, but there are the expression of God's vengeance against the wrongs done by men against the unintelligent creation, and that every gore of horn and every stroke of hoof are of similar meaning. Struck so often, is it a wonder that they strike back? I think we might take a suggestion of leniency toward all beasts, since they had prior possession of this world and man came in afterward. Fish and fowl were created on the fifth day. The cattle were created in the forenoon of the sixth day. Man was not created until in the afternoon of the sixth day. Certainly the brute creation, first in creation of our world, ought to receive some regard from a race coming in afterward. In what light does this put the horrors of vivisection or the mauling of living animals for the purpose of improving knowledge of human physiology? In all parts of the earth, in the name of science, is this crime going on to-day. You have no more right to lacerate a living dog to find out what is best for a sick man than you have to lacerate a living man for the benefit of a sick dog.

A Mixed Religion.

WE hear a great deal in our time about adulteration of food, but there is something worse, and that is adulteration of religion. The bread of Life has been evilly touched, and the pure milk of the Word diluted. Free grace is the divine provision of the human family on their repentance and faith. In our time we mix it up,—a little grace of the Lord, with a decoction of humanitarianism added, and a few grains of spiritualism and a little sprinkling of worldly philosophy, and a decided coloring of art, making it orange or saffron, or vermilion or ultramarine, and then we take the tongs of the altar and stir it up and stir it down, and mix and mix it, till much of the religion of this day is deceptive death instead of life. Spiritual adulteration is one of the curses of our time. There will never be any improvement in the old Gospel. Everything added weakens its original power. What the world needs is Bible pathology, and Bible therapeutics, and Bible pharmacy, in order to cure its disorders, and not the world's quackery. What it wants, to feed its spiritual hunger, is not the cake of human contention, which may please the taste while it gives no brawn or strength, but the strong meat of the Word and the bread of which if a man eat he shall never hunger. Away with the adulteration from your groceries and drug-stores, and away with the spiritual adulteration from your churches and theological seminaries.

Pardon Free.

JUST after Queen Victoria had been crowned—she being only nineteen or twenty years of age—Wellington handed her a death warrant for her signature. It was to take the life of a soldier in the army. She said to Wellington: "Can there nothing good be said of this man?" He said: "No; he is a bad soldier, and deserves to die." She took up the death warrant, and it trembled in her hand, as she again asked: "Does any one know anything good of this man?" Wellington said: "I have heard that there are some people who speak well of him." "Thanks," said the queen: "a thousand thanks for that. Here is his pardon:" and she handed across the table the soldier's pardon.

Christ is on a throne of grace. Our case is brought before him. The question is asked: "Is there any good about this man?" The law says: "None." Justice says: "None." Our own conscience says: "None." Nevertheless, Christ hands over our pardon, and asks us to take it. Oh! the height and depth, the length and breadth of his mercy.

We are receiving numerous letters in regard to the articles on Mormonism. These articles are prepared with the sole purpose of bringing out the truth, and all the letters that are received with regard to them will be referred to General Eaton for his attention when his articles close.

BRIEF NOTES.

Mrs. Amanda Smith has been holding extraordinary meetings in Baltimore, Md. The Mizpah Methodist Church has been crowded to hear the venerable preacher, and she has had marvelous times of blessing among her people.

The new Lord Mayor of London, who is a Jew, is an enthusiastic temperance man. He has frequently entertained London Bands of Hope at his beautiful park in Hertfordshire, and has in other ways manifested his interest in the Temperance movement.

A letter from a missionary in Madagascar reports that by order of the French governor all the slaves in the island have been set free. He says that the order came quite as a surprise. On some of the plantations the slaves are remaining voluntarily, but on others not one is left.

Mr. Wm. Quarrier has received from a friend $5,000 toward the completion of the Consumptive Homes at Bridge of Weir. Mr. Quarrier has written to Sir Philip Currie, at Constantinople, offering to take a hundred Armenians into his Orphan Homes.

The Church of the Disciples has taken a new departure in Christian Endeavor work. It has arranged a Christian Endeavor reading course. A handbook for Bible readers is in course of preparation, together with a handbook on missions, and another on the Disciples.

Persons having copies of this journal or any other Christian literature for which they have no other use, may send them to Miss Jane Bailey, Sweetwater, Monroe County, Tenn. She is a missionary of the Friends' church, and has found in her work many homes entirely destitute of the Bible and all other religious reading.

A series of Sunday afternoon Temperance meetings are being held in Tremont Temple, Boston, Mass. Audiences of three thousand persons have gathered to hear them. Among the speakers have been Mrs. Ballington Booth, Mr. George W. Bain, Mr. John G. Wooley, and other noted Temperance workers.

The Indian Witness states that there has been a decided improvement in the morals of the European troops in India of late years. Total abstinence has spread to a very encouraging degree, and the Soldiers' Christian Association has many local and regimental organizations, showing that the effort for spiritual influence is having good effect.

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions reports receipts for the month of November of $38,807, a falling off of $12,010 on the receipts for November, 1895. The returns from the churches show a gain of $2,646, and from the Young People's Societies of $140; miscellaneous sources, $1,179. The Women's Boards, Sabbath Schools, and legacies show a decrease, the last of $10,757.

Any reader of this journal who can provide employment (either in his own home or business or with some friend), for a very worthy, intelligent, and capable Armenian, can be placed in communication with him on sending his name and address to "Refugee," THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, Bible House, New York. He speaks a little English and is warmly recommended.

Evangelist William E. Geil has been conducting meetings in Hamilton, N. Y., for over two weeks. Rev. C. E. Savage writes us that Mr. Geil has met with unusual success. "It is a rare occurrence in that conservative town to see stores and saloons closed for one week. The interest spread through all the surrounding country. Some three hundred started in the Christian life. Mr. Geil has shown himself to be a man of power."

Evangelist John McNeill has been holding special services with wonderful success at Bradford, England. His many friends in this country will be glad to learn that he is well and strong. The death of Evangelist John Mac Neil, in Australia, caused many to fear that it was the London Evangelist who was dead. The deceased Christian worker was a valued and successful worker in all parts of Australia and New Zealand.

Conferences for Bible study have been held recently in many towns with the best results. Attacks on the authenticity and inspiration of the Bible have aroused public interest which brings large audiences to hear what the ministers have to say in defence. At Lockport, N. Y., the ministers of the town had the assistance at their conference of Rev. H. M. Parsons, of Toronto, and other able Biblical scholars.

The membership of the Christian Endeavor Societies of all denominations in the City of New York aggregates 6,777, according to the recent report of the local union. The largest number are in the Presbyterian churches. The Baptists have the next largest number of members. Then follow in the order named: The Reformed Church, Congregationalists, Methodist, United Presbyterian, Reformed Presbyterian and Church of the Disciples.

The new West Side Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association in New York is trying a new experiment in its rooms. It has opened a restaurant in the building and has appointed a Committee of Management which will have charge of the enterprise. The waiters are to be students who will serve in relays for a short period each day, thus leaving them time to pursue their studies while increasing their slender incomes.

Rev. George C. Needham has received many letters inquiring about the projected Prophetic Conference mentioned in this column recently. The interest manifested has led Mr. Needham to plan three conferences, to be held in Philadelphia, New York and some other city not yet decided upon. The date will depend largely on the raising of a fund for the hire of halls and other expenses. Persons interested in this important subject should write, enclosing a contribution, to Rev. George C. Needham, Narberth, Philadelphia, Penn.

A Ten Day's Convention called at the request of a large number of clergymen and Christian laymen, to celebrate the nineteenth hundredth anniversary of our Lord's birth, is being held in New York this week. The sessions are held in the Gospel Tabernacle and the American Theatre and the Carnegie Music Hall, commencing December 24, and ending January 3. The call was signed by Dr. R. A. Torrey, of Chicago; Dr. A. T. Pierson, of Philadelphia; Dr. James H. Brooks, of St. Louis; Rev. Stephen Merritt and Dr. A. B. Simpson, of New York, and many other eminent men.

Where Shall We Go?

THE winter is here. A large number of foreign artists are entertaining in various ways our people. These foreign artists, together with our native talent, make it certain that our American cities will suffer from no lack of amusement. Be careful in making your selection, for your style of amusement decides your style of thought and style of character. Tell me where a man spends his evenings, and I will tell you his character. In cities we get better or worse very rapidly. The down grade is steeper than in country life, and one winter will do wonders of elevation or degradation. Those are bad amusements which leave you next day headachy and disgusted with the ordinary work of life and yawning in the discharge of duties when you ought to be wide awake. Never consent to hear or see anything that will not in some way make you a better man or a better woman. The places of amusement which only existed during the lazy months of warm weather have turned on all their lights and wakened all the orchestras and thrown out their intensest fascination. Consent not to see or hear anything iniquitous, however well done. Amid the recreations and hilarities now bursting upon the cities, in the fear of God, choose ye! There will be improving lecture, and pure concert, and enchanting galleries of art to suit every worthy taste and arouse every good emotion and educate every faculty. Take care of your winters, and for the most part the other seasons will take care of themselves. But the most of us will find our chief entertainment in Christian service. The greatest joy on earth is that of doing good. The men and women who run about trying to find a good time, do not have so good a time as those who, thinking little of their own happiness, are trying to augment the welfare of others. I promise you that this winter will be the most exhilarating season of all your life if you will give all the time not positively occupied in daily business to encouraging others, helping others, blessing others, rescuing others. Suppose in these winter months you could find some man on the wrong track and put him on the right track. Suppose you could take some soul, despairful and determined no longer to struggle against sin, and arouse in the soul the good fire of repentance. Suppose you should by unusual earnestness in prayer and faithfulness in all Christian duty, bring down upon the church some great awakening. That glorious fact would

ISLAM'S FESTIVALS.

THE frightful tragedy in Armenia which has appalled all Christendom, has called attention anew to the religion of Mohammed, under which the horrors have been perpetrated. Nothing about the massacres was more clearly established than the fact that the Armenians were murdered, not on account of their race, or conduct, but because they were Christians. Any Armenian could secure safety for his person and property by becoming a Mohammedan. The question is often asked what kind of a religion that must be which impels its professor to commit such outrages. Its fierce intolerance is the feature that has hitherto been most prominent to the world, for it enjoins on its followers perpetual war on unbelievers. The alternative of the Koran or the sword is to be offered to the world, and when in the discretion of a Mohammedan ruler there is a suspension of hostilities, it is to be in the nature of a temporary truce, and not of a peace. Thus the more devoted to his faith a Mohammedan ruler is, the more disposed is he to put to death all who will not acknowledge the authority of Mohammed. The Sultan of Turkey, who is the chief potentate of the faith, knows his own weakness too well to declare war against the Christian nations around him, but that any of his own subjects should be Christians was intolerable. While, therefore he has been guilty of horrible barbarities perpetrated in his name, he has been most punctilious in observing the rites and ceremonies of his religion. These are more numerous and onerous in Mohammedanism than in any other faith. Five times a day the Mohammedan must purify himself by washing, and prostrate himself in prayer. Every Friday he must present himself at the Mosque. During the whole of the sacred month of Ramadan every year, he must fast, not partaking of food or drink in any day until after sunset. He must observe the Bairam festival, which is celebrated all over Islam on the same day of the year. The feast of Alms following the fast of Ramadan as another sacred season is never to be neglected. Other feasts and fasts are observed peculiar to Turkey and Egypt which are not observed in India, and among these is the Festival of the Birth of the Prophet, which is celebrated on the twelfth day of the third month of the Mohammedan year. A special place outside a city is chosen for this festival, to which the faithful led by the local Iman, go in procession. There a sermon is preached and prayers are made, and at the close the people return to their homes and a sacrifice, proportionate to his wealth, is offered by the head of the family. Besides all these observances, the Mohammedan must, at least once in his life, make the great pilgrimage to the holy places of Mecca, otherwise "he might as well die a Jew or a Christian." By all these and many other observances the Mohammedan hopes to win his way to Paradise, rejecting the salvation which Christ offers to all who believe on him.

To him that worketh not, but believeth on Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. (Rom. 4:5.)

The Penalty of Travel.

A physician of Hindoo birth, who has come to this country for study, and to deliver lectures, makes a strange revelation of the penalties he incurs by crossing the sea. He says that his journey involves the loss of his caste. When he returns to India he will not be received by his family and his old friends, who will refuse to associate with him. He has assurances that his old patients will call him in professionally, as before, but he cannot break bread or sleep in the house of a former associate. Any one who might receive him socially would suffer with him the same penalty of exclusion. This ostracism is much dreaded by the high caste people. A gentleman who had promised to come with him to America, yielded at the last moment to the entreaties of his friends and remained behind. The physician does not appear to dread the penalty. He said that he should be quite as happy among his new surroundings as with his former high caste connections, as he would be welcome among those who had already lost caste by travel and in other ways, and he had more in common with them than with those who had maintained their caste. He will have congenial associates who are drawn all the closer together by the common ban upon circles of Christ's religion when they once find a lodgment in the heart. They may be silent and unnoticed, but they have the power of life.

As if a man should cast seed into the ground and should sleep and rise night and day and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how. (Mark 4: 26, 27.)

An Impregnable Tomb.

One of the most remarkable graves in this country has just been finished. It is in a cemetery at Norwich, Conn., and its construction has been planned and supervised by the lady who intends her body shall occupy it after her death. The sides of the grave are of the finest pressed and cemented bricks, and thick and massive as the foundation walls of a castle or fort. They rest on a single titanic slab of polished granite that weighs considerably more than a ton, while a similar stone, beautifully finished and weighing 2,700 pounds, forms the lid. The ground about and above the grave has been laid out and turfed evenly and with precision, so that there is no external token revealing its existence or location. The lady has expressed herself as entirely satisfied with the vault, believing implicitly now that when her body shall be laid between its two mighty monoliths, it will be forever secure from invasion by the dreaded grave-robbler. When the time has come, how-concludes that the protoplasm, or the principle of life, in a resting seed, is in a state of inaction not comparable to that of a smoldering fire, but rather like that of a chemical mixture which is capable of forming a combination whenever the required conditions of temperature and illumination are present. It is so with the spiritual life of men. Contact with Christ gives the impetus and illumination under which multitudes of dead souls have come to life and borne fruit for the glory of God. The sorrow of it is that so many men who might be thus brought to life act as did the people to whom Christ said:

Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life (John 5:40.)

A White Slave's Escape.

A recent trial of physical endurance elicited a reminiscence from a hospital surgeon in Texas, which shows what a man can endure when life and liberty are at stake. The surgeon said that some three years ago he had under his care the finest case of physical development he ever saw. It was that of a Swede who had been entrapped in New York into entering the service of a firm representing a Central American house. He expected to be employed as a clerk or timekeeper, but when he arrived he was sent to work on a banana plantation. He was required to work in the hot sun from early morning until night, and there was no compensation but food and lodging. Both were bad, the former being deficient in quantity as well as unwholesome. He became sick with malarial fever, but his employers had no mercy on him. He was driven to his work every morning and compelled to keep at it all day, although he swooned several times from weakness and pain. He perceived that there was no prospect of any alleviation, and that nothing but death awaited him as the end of all his labor, if he remained; and he determined to make his escape. He waited only for strength for the terrible journey. The hope seemed to help his recovery and just after Christmas he succeeded in slipping away unobserved. He left his surplus clothes and all his belongings behind him, and set out to walk. He had great difficulty in procuring food on his way, and at times could cover but a few miles in the day; but he persevered and finally reached San Antonio six months after setting out. He was completely worn out and was sent to the hospital for medical treatment. It is much to be wished that men who are in the service of Satan, and who know that the end of their way is death, would show a similar determination to escape, even if, like this man, they have to sacrifice all their possessions and endure hardship.

That they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil who are taken captive by him at his will. (11. Timothy 2: 26.)

Incorporation Refused.

A number of Hungarian citizens of New York met with a rebuff in the Supreme Court last week. They wanted incorporation for a club they had organized "to bring into closer contact and union the Hungarian immigrants settled in this part of the country." Justice Pryor, after examining the petition, refused it. He said in the course of his judgment: "I am most positively against anything which will in any way prevent foreigners from becoming Americans in every sense of the word; which has for its object the segregation of foreigners from Americans and the fostering or cherishing of Old World ideas. When a man leaves his native country his duties to that country cease, and he owes them all to this country. His love for his native land becomes merely a sentiment, but his duty must be with this country. The Apostle Paul had to remind his Jewish converts of a similar fact, and to this day men need often to be reminded of the duties of Christian brotherhood and their relationship to Christ:

Ye are no longer Jews, but rather ye are fellow-citizens of the saints, and of the household of God. (Eph. 2: 19.)

ANNUAL CELEBRATION AT CAIRO, EGYPT, OF THE BIRTHDAY OF MOHAMMED.

A Silent Mighty Force.

A significant natural curiosity is described in an Oregon journal. It states that a farmer whose land lies near Pleasant Home, had brought into the city a section of the root of a tree from which a potato protruded. He discovered it while digging potatoes on his farm. The potato vine seems to have crept into the root, and the new potato then started down in the depths. It flourished in its strange surroundings and developed into a large and well-formed potato. The room in the root was too small for its expansion, and so the spud exerted not less than a ton pressure on the root until the side was split open. The root is about three inches in diameter and six inches in length. About an inch of the spud protrudes from one end. It is quite a curiosity, and all who have seen it are amazed at the power which must have been exerted by the potato before it could have rent open that strong tough root. It is so with the prin-ever, for the commitment of her body to the cemetery tomb, a derrick must be used to remove and replace the ponderous lid. We may hope that as she has given thought to the time when she must die, and has taken measures to prevent her body falling into the hands of ghouls, she has not neglected to provide for the safety of her soul. It would be a more terrible thing for her to have that part of her being fall into the hands of an enemy than if her body were stolen. She may be at peace as to that, too, if she has followed the example of the Apostle who said:

I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day. (11. Timothy 1: 12.)

The Sleep of Seeds.

Professor De Candolle, of Geneva, has recently brought together many interesting facts about the latent life of seeds, and their ability to withstand very low temperatures. After recalling instances in which seeds have sprouted after lying apparently dead for hundreds of years,—in one case fifteen hundred years,—he gives the results of experiments on subjecting seeds to a freezing cold. Corn, oats, fennel and some flower-seeds were exposed during a hundred and eighteen days to a temperature of 40 degrees below zero. Afterward when placed in suitable surroundings, nearly all of the fennel, oat and corn seeds, and many of the others, germinated. He

ALTHOUGH Cotton is no longer king, as it was throughout a large part of the United States less than a generation ago, it is still a native product of sufficient importance to absorb the energies and attention of a very considerable portion of our population. It has played a prominent part in the development and progress of the country, and the cotton-grower, from the owner of the big plantation run on the most approved scientific principles, down to the humble farmer or squatter who plants an acre or two to cotton, is a benefactor in greater or less degree.

Our photograph on this page is one that will interest many who are familiar with the extensive and costly modern machinery that is now generally used in cotton manufacture. Less than a generation ago it was the rule in many farmers' homes—particularly in the South—for nearly all the clothing worn by the family to be homespun. In those days, the good wife and her daughters would card the wool or the cotton, spin it, dye it if desired, and weave it into cloth for domestic uses. The table and bed-linen, the simple hangings and draperies, the toweling and aprons, and in poorer households even the clothes, all except the best Sunday-go-to-meeting dress, were of homespun. In some parts of the Union, remote from the railroads and at an inconvenient distance from dressmakers and "fashion emporiums" the same condition of affairs exists even now. Mother and daughters all work industriously carding, spinning, and weaving the cotton. This usually occupies part of the winter. It is made into strong, sensible cloth which will do good service while it lasts. Homespun is by no means to be despised, whether worn by men or women. Some of our greatest men have worn it. Lincoln, his biographers state, wore homespun as a lad, and even after he became president, he always had a kind word for anyone who dressed in it, as he once did.

Cotton is still the great staple of Alabama, where our scene is located. On many small farms, the people cultivate just enough cotton for their own use. It is usually planted in March, and by the middle of June the field is one mass of beautiful blossoms which soon disappear. Then comes the picking in August, when the field is covered with pods through which the cotton bursts like soft, fluffy snow, all over the field. All hands are needed to help in the picking, after which the cotton is ginned, in order that the seeds may be easily separated from the cotton. The separating is called work, one person averaging about a pound of cotton a day. All this work is done by hand by these people, although machines have been made to do it much more quickly.

in demand are the American Sea Island and Uplands varieties, and these are unequalled by the products of any other part of the globe. Sea Island cotton is grown in the soft, maritime climate of the low-lands lying off the coast of Georgia, and it is a product of great beauty, strong, and of unusual length. Cotton is also grown in Mexico, Ceylon, Arabia, Siam, China, Italy, the Sandwich Islands, and South America; probably the oldest cotton producing country being India, where the plant has been known from time immemorial.

One of the wonders of the latest cotton manufacturing machines, is a thread a thousand miles long, which is so delicate and fine that it weighs only a pound. To estimate its fineness would be well-nigh impossible. The "jenny" spins eight threads at a time, a striking contrast to brodered caps, gold and silver girdles, "great sleeves," and slashed apparel. Among the first clothing products of the new colonies were "linen fustian" and woolen cloth and the imports included such substantial wear as cordovan, deerskin, sealskin and mooseskin (for the colder months), and other warm coverings, showing that after all the prudent Puritans regarded comfort and economy as more desirable than the fripperies of fashion. What would they have thought had they seen the balloon sleeves and indescribable hats of our days?

Housekeeping a Profession.

Dean Talbot, of the Chicago University, (herself a woman), has some excellent advice to young women completing school life. "Nearly every one," says the dean, "has an inclination toward some particular work, with plans formulated by the time she is ready to leave school. Every young woman should set about something that is certain, not necessarily a profession. It may be she is needed at home. In that case her duties are clearly there. To my mind women are much behind what they could be and ought to be in their own special field. Housekeeping is considered drudgery when in reality it is one of the most complicated and difficult professions.

THE CHILDREN'S HEAVEN.

THE infant lies in blessed ease
Upon his mother's breast;
No storm, no dark, the baby sees Invade his heaven of rest.
He nothing knows of change or death;
Her face his holy skies:
The air he breathes his mother's breath;
His stars, his mother's eyes.
The Father's arms fold like a nest
His children round about;
His face looks down, a heaven of rest,
Where comes no dark, no doubt.
Its mists are clouds of stars that move
In sweet concurrent strife;
Its winds the goings of his love;
Its dew the dew of life.

We for our children seek thy heart,
For them the Father's eyes:
Lord, when their hopes in us depart,
Let hopes in thee arise.
When childhood's visions them forsake,
To women grown and men,
Thou to thy heart their hearts will take,
And bid them dream again.

"Bird Day."

SOMETIME ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD referred to the project of establishing a national "Bird Day" in the schools. It is announced, in Our Animal Friends, that a hopeful beginning has already been made. The originator of the plan is C. A. Babcock, superintendent of schools, Oil City, Pa. Under his auspices "Bird Day" was first observed in the schools of that city in 1895. The exercises consisted of original compositions by the pupils, containing the results of their observations of birds: of talks, comparing observations, giving localities of bird haunts, and general exchange of bird lore; recitations from eminent prose writers on birds, and from the poets; finally, many schools closed their exercises by a trip to the woods to listen to the concert of the feathered tribes. Superintendent Babcock says:

We begin the study of birds in January and continue till June, studying those that stay all winter, and trying to keep account of the newcomers as they arrive. We devote two periods, of twenty minutes each, per week to this study. "Bird Day" is a summary or focusing of the work of the year. . . . Our children, generally speaking, know most of our bird residents and love them, and feel like protecting them. There has been a complete change in the relations existing between the small boy and the birds. We should think there would be, and that the small boy would be almost as great a gainer as the birds.

A similar movement was inaugurated during the spring of this year by Prof. C. H. Morrill, superintendent of schools, at Fort Madison, Ia. He set apart May 29, 1896, as "Bird Day," in the schools under his charge. The children brought their pet birds, decorated the rooms with flowers and green branches, ornamented the boards with drawings of birds, birds' nests and flowers, and the buildings rang with bird music all day. There is good reason to hope that "Bird Day" will soon become a "national day" in the public schools of every State.

Puritan Plainness in Dress.

Every age, we imagine, has its recurrent periods of vanity, when portions of the population seem to be seized with a mania for fine clothes. In his interesting work on the Puritans, Rev. Dr. Byington furnishes a sharply-drawn picture of society in the seventeenth century. While the dress of most people in the colonial period was plain, partly because of limited resources and partly through a desire to discourage extravagance, still the typical Puritan had the appearance of a man of distinction. The chronicler of Agawam complained of five or six extravagant women in the colony. "What a disgrace the queen is in this week," and who strive to "be in it in all haste, whatever it be." Of such he wrote: "A woman who lives but to ape the newest court fashions, I look at her as the very gizzard of a trifle, the product of a quarter of a cipher, an epitome of nothing." At times the courts enacted laws to forbid extravagance in dress, and the buying or making of apparel decked with satin, gold or lace was forbidden; also em-

It often involves intricate problems in economics. The proper preparation of food is a chemical problem, the principle of which few women understand in the least. They have no conception of the value of different foods or the way in which they may be utilized to the best advantage. The recent discoveries along that line have been made by men when they should have been made by women long ago.

Ideal Parenthood.

One of the best interpreters of God in this world, says a thankful writer, is ideal parenthood. What a motive to be perfect in this relation in the family! He who loves knows God; for God is love. He who loves not, knows not God. How different this from the definitions given in the catechisms! Out of our own lives, made sweeter and purer by the indwelling of God through faith, we come to the increasingly beautiful conception of him. "How much more!" Let the meaning of this phrase be present in every thought and act of parental culture of the children, and God will be more clearly seen, or care for the children will be more tender and wise, and the children will soon learn that all its culture is vocal with heaven's own reality.

"Try" and "Can't."

There is a big difference in the two words. "Can't do it" sticks in the mud, but "Try" soon drags the wagon out of the rut. The fox said Try, and he got away from the hounds when they almost snapped at him. The bees said Try and turned the flowers into honey. The squirrel said Try, and up he went to the top of a beech tree. The snowdrop said Try, and bloomed in the cold snows of winter. No hill too steep for Try to climb, no clay too stiff for Try to plow, no field too wet for Try to drain, no hole too big for Try to mend. No sum too hard for a boy or girl to master if they will say Try. No task too hard to perform if they will only Try.

THE MODERN JEW IN HIS ANCESTRAL HOME

BY HON. SELAH MERRILL D.D. L.L.D.

JEWISH COLONIES IN PALESTINE.

Their Condition and Prospects—The Yemen Jews in the Holy City—Pitiful Poverty, and Even Beggary among the Jerusalem Jews.

DO not think an American who has never resided in Jerusalem can realize the poverty of its inhabitants. Between that condition in life where only the plainest comforts are enjoyed, and absolute beggary, there is a vast region where human beings simply exist. They do not beg, and on the other hand they do not have sufficient food and clothing for their bodily wants. Their persons are emaciated, their houses are squalid hovels, and their general condition is altogether wretched. This describes a large percentage of the Jewish population of Jerusalem. A prominent Jew said to me once, "many of these people do not know from one day to another where they are going to get their next morsel of bread." Such a condition may be imagined where it exists for a few days, or for a short period only, but where it is prolonged for years, the anxiety, the misery of it passes comprehension. The living of this class is scanty and uncertain. How they subsist is simply a wonder. They avoid starvation, but they are always hungry—they are engaged in a constant struggle for existence. There is frequently a heroism about this battle for life which appeals to us in a most forcible manner.

I have thought that the reader would be interested in a few pictures of the struggling Israelites who have so little of this world's goods. I must not make the impression, however, that the Jews are the only class thus suffering, which is not true; others suffer in a similar way, probably not to such a degree, but it is to the Jews that our attention is at present directed.

We will begin with the porter, who represents quite a large class of laborers. He is a man who is ready to carry anywhere any sort of burden. It is a very hard method of earning a living; but he cannot stop to think of that, he is anxious only for something to do. Considerable physical strength is required, and many take up this kind of employment who are not really able, their backs are weak and their limbs are not strong enough for it, but their case is desperate and they must work. They dress in the roughest manner, their garments are coarse, patched, quilted, and always ragged, and on their shoulders and backs they have a kind of padded saddle. A heavy girdle is worn about the waist, and over one shoulder, when they are not at work, is a coil of rope. The head is covered with some thick material as a protection, for the strain of the ropes when the back is loaded bears very hard upon the forehead around which they pass. At certain times, for example when a camel train arrives with goods, or at the Mohammedan New Year, when people move, the porter is sure of getting something to do; for most of the year, however, work is slack, and he must depend upon such jobs as he can pick up, and his living is consequently precarious. The natives invariably "beat down" a workman, no matter what he has done or under what circumstances, and if the porter in half a day gets one job for which he ought to receive four cents, the person whom he is serving inevitably and in many cases roughly tries to make him take two cents for it, or certainly three cents instead of four. If he earns ten cents in half a day he is making the best wages that he can expect, although that sum will probably represent his entire earnings a day for many days together.

None of these porters lift much with their hands, as is the common way with us; but burdens are placed on some elevation by two or three men, the porter stoops and lets the object fall gently upon his back, the ropes bind it around his forehead, and he starts for his destination. My readers who are unaccustomed to such sights would exclaim, "the man cannot possibly carry that burden." His limbs tremble, the cords of his neck show that he is straining himself to the utmost, the perspiration runs from his face, he goes very slow, for a misstep or a slight unbalancing of the load would cause him to be crushed under it. This description applies to heavy burdens which weigh four hundred or six hundred pounds, say a load equal to two barrels of flour or a piano; a load like a single barrel of flour would be managed by one of these porters with little, often with no assistance in loading and unloading it. In case of very heavy burdens, fellow porters accompany the bearer of it to steady the load, to remove it every few minutes so that the man can rest, or perhaps one will carry it a short distance and then another take it. Jerusalem is not a large place, and burdens have to be carried a few yards only, or a distance anywhere from a quarter to half a mile at most.

These cases where more than one porter has to assist may be called extreme cases, still a majority of the burdens he has to carry are heavy ones, so that the work is always exhausting. Both heart and lungs are affected by the necessary straining and over-exertion. Sometimes the man is bruised and lamed, but if he has any work he cannot stop to rest. Those dependent upon him, his wife and children, must have food, and at best he can supply only what is coarse in quality and scanty in amount. If his health holds out, his work, as the years go on, does not increase, and there is a limit to his earnings which is terribly disheartening. Were he not surrounded by fatalists, by people who look with indifference upon everything, the influence of whose sentiments he shares to a degree, his condition and prospects would drive him to madness or suicide. A family living in the way that his must live, is the natural prey of disease, and sickness frequently comes to add to their misery.

The picture which I am now giving is from actual life, for scores of such cases have come under my own observation. My friends at home ask at once how a person can live and support a family who earns but fifteen or twenty cents a day?

YEMEN JEWESSES GATHERING FUEL.

After facing this problem for ten years in the land where the condition that I have described is true of thousands such of families, I must frankly confess that I can neither answer the question nor fully explain it. Still I know that in some way they continue to subsist, but the way is one of great hardship. What will Americans who receive from one dollar and a half to three dollars a day for their work, say to this? The poor Jew in Jerusalem works as hard as he can. He dreads idleness. He does not want to beg. He lives on the very edge of starvation. He struggles with all his might against it, and his struggle is heroic.

Out of a list of upwards of fifty different occupations in which the Jews in the city of Jerusalem engage, there are a number that are about on a level with that of the porter, certainly not any more remunerative. Such are glaziers, peddlers, cobblers, rag-pickers, umbrella menders, water-carriers, coffee-grinders, tin-men, or more properly, "tinkers," dealers in old iron, and old furniture. There is a class of occupations where the pay is better and the chance for earning a living much more promising than in those just mentioned, but in the nature of things there is in Jerusalem no Saturday when the strict Jew must rest. There is still another class where a fair living could be earned were not each of these trades overcrowded; for example, money-changers, dealers in eggs and fowls, auctioneers, butchers, turners, tailors, small grocers, dealers in cloth, charcoal dealers, and liquor sellers. As to Jerusalem only a very limited number of laborers required in each of these departments; such are milkmen, dragomans, dyers, weavers, book-binders, muleteers, barbers, watch-makers, &c., &c. The business of dragoman is not, in a sense, open to Jews, for the reason that most travelers are Christians, and they travel and do the last occupation, most of the small liquor selling is in the hands of the Jews.

It is simply a natural law that where a man earns next to nothing he can pay next to nothing for what he buys, consequently all goods brought into the city are obtained in Europe to suit the Jerusalem market.

A JEWISH PORTER CARRYING BOARDS.

Hence, goods bought at auction bankrupt stocks, shop-worn goods, those damaged by fire or water, any sort of goods that can be sold far below the ordinary price are in great demand. A family may desire better goods, but they cannot afford to pay for them. They must buy the cheapest commodities or go without. A stranger from our country would be amazed at the family and household articles offered for sale in a common Jerusalem shop. The curse of poverty affects everything, clothing, food, furniture, houses, utensils, personal cleanliness, sanitary matters, medicines, all the comforts of life, and it is this state of things which it is so difficult to make well-to-do foreigners realize. Moreover, there being far more laborers and handicraftsmen in the city than the needs of the place require, all work has to be done at the lowest possible price. In order to get something to do, Jews are willing, or rather they are obliged to labor at a lower wage than their Christian or Mohammedan neighbors receive. This does not seem right, but I am stating what I know to be a fact. Consequently, their expenses of living, rent, fuel, food, clothing, they are obliged to reduce accordingly or to beg. The Jew, however, is not a natural beggar. Still, in Jerusalem the condition of many Jews is so desperate that they are obliged to resort to this unnatural method of obtaining bread. Friday is the special day for these poor people, and they go about by dozens asking for a pittance from those who pity them.

I have often said, and I must repeat the remark, although enthusiasts are disturbed by it, namely, that Jerusalem is no proper place for the development of Jewish character. The very opposite of this is true; for this purpose it is the worst place in the world. The question is a far wider one than whether the poor Jew earns just enough to keep his body and soul together. Such a struggle as he is engaged in affects his character. Poverty which pinches the body, where there is no possible chance for betterment, pinches also the mind and dwarfs the spiritual nature. It pushes a man down towards the clods beneath his feet. Families living under such conditions cannot rise of themselves; they cannot lift others up; they are dead weights; a community is not helped by their presence.

Besides the fact that many Jews in Jerusalem are struggling heroically against want and beggary, another fact is prominent, namely, the problem before those who desire to elevate the Jew in body, mind, or estate, is gigantic, and only Divine wisdom can guide Christian philanthropists aright in their great and good work.

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

WRITTEN SPECIALLY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

JESSIE'S AFFAIRS.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

JESSIE had never been in love; she had always been sufficient for herself—for her needs of every kind. It was true that there was in her heart a tenderer feeling for Steve than she had ever before known; and his last, eager, loving look had perforce drawn from her an answering one; but she quickly took herself to task for her weakness. "He is the best man I ever knew," she thought, as she carefully put up her hair in its crimping pins, "but I do not intend to lose myself on unknown ground. He was grand to-night when he faced that crowd of whimpering, complaining men and told them the truth for once in their lives. And the swift, satisfactory way in which he pinned that bully down, was splendid! I was frightened a little, but I would like to be frightened very often in that kind of a way. Heigho! I wish he was rich; or, if I was rich it would do as well—perhaps better. But poverty and matrimony; no, no! there is something else for a girl than that combination these days."

This train of thought reminded her of Miss Lloyd, and she began to deliberate about her "terms." She was afraid to ask too much, and still more afraid to ask too little. Finally, she concluded to call at Pond's as she went to the train and find out what was the maximum price for out-of-town lessons. Steve went to sleep thinking of her beauty, her kindness, and her cleverness; Jessie went to sleep thinking of the role she had to fill the next day, and laying her plans for securing all her rights and every tittle of her self-respect.

In the morning she was silent, pre-occupied, and full of importance; the rest of the family said, "she was cross." Not quite that; but she had drawn to her centre all her forces, and therefore this morning she had no alms of good humor and good-will to scatter. Even her mother's natural curiosity annoyed her. Why should she want news of her old lover, of his wife and house and children? Alas! twenty years does not understand that the memories of age are as full of sentiment and sweetness as the hopes of youth.

Her mind on the journey was solely occupied with counseling her conduct in the strange and unexpected position in which she found herself. "Destiny loves surprises," she thought, "but I shall try and be ready for any phase of this event. I will not be offended by ceremony nor be made effusive by kindness. I will have no friendship with my pupil, and I will permit no unwise familiarity. If the son, whom Steve knew, is at home, I will not encourage any acquaintance with him—Poor Steve! I wonder if he has reached the open sea yet." She thought it very improbable that Miss Lloyd knew anything of her father's first love, or that if she had heard the story, she would care to mention it to the daughter of the woman he had treated so badly. But if circumstances brought this history into conversation, then Jessie made up her mind to treat the subject as mythical, as never of any importance, and to forget it.

She of the same kind she made as the train sped swiftly to Lloyd's Station, and then when she met Alice face to face, she suffered them all to slip from her mind. Her meeting with Alice, without any doubt, had done more to settle her mind than had done. She had calculated very fairly her own strength, but she made no allowance for the influence Alice might exert over her. And the influence of Alice, though not very apparent, was permeating and powerful. Jessie could not resist. Her meeting with Alice, without any doubt, had done more to settle her mind than had done. fect kindness. The lofty rooms with their revelations in artistic furnishing, the ceramic treasures, the pictures, the books, the noiseless service, the beautiful garden—to all these influences Jessie was far more sensitive than she believed herself.

Still she adhered to her "terms." They were given her without inquiry or dissent, and then teacher and pupil went together to the music-room. There Jessie honestly earned her money, for she was not only conscientious, but she also entered into the very spirit of her work. The piano delighted her. Never before, had she felt such finely strong notes, under her fingers; and she said with great feeling:

"Oh, Miss Lloyd! can you imagine what it is to play on an instrument that understands you? My piano, is not to be compared with this; but yet it is acquainted with me; we are friends; it comprehends my confidences and my moods, and we laugh and cry together."

"I have not yet made a friend of my instrument," replied Alice. "I do not do it justice. It responds to your fingers in a way that amazes me. And yet often at twilight, I hear strange, sweet voices in the strings. Where do they come from? Have you ever thought of that?"

"Do you think simple wire outstretched makes them? Oh, no! Listen to this!" said Jessie, and in a kind of inspiration, she brought forth in low, soft tones the Mermaid's Song from "Oberon." Its passion of longing sadness—its delicious pain and exquisite abandonment thrilled both girls. Under Jessie's long, small hands, the keys responded as if they were living, loving things, and her lifted face reflected every word of the song, for her heart was singing it. Alice, with sweet, proud eyes, watched the sensitive evoker of such melody, and thought of Steve, with something like elation.

It was at this moment both were suddenly aware of some strange intruding influence. Jessie became silent; and the piano seemed to fall an octave in tone. Alice turned slightly, and saw her father and a stranger standing between the portieres. As they came forward, the music ceased altogether, and Jessie stood up. The song; her eyes glowed, her lips were slightly parted, she was the incarnation of its sweet, sad melody. Mr. Lloyd introduced her to Alice. Alice heard her own name, and she was compelled to lift her eyes and acknowledge the courtesy. Afterward, every moment was an embarrassment. She was entreated to play the song again, and she consented; but there was something wanting, which she had given to Alice. Mr. Lloyd stood by her side, observing her with great interest, though he said little. Lord Medway was enthusiastic in his compliments. Jessie acknowledged their praises with a smile, and took her departure. She was trembling with excitement, and glad when she found herself in the crowded solitude of the railway car.

In this confessional, she grew rapidly angry with Jessie McAslin. "To think! she mentally ejaculated. "To think that I should have fallen so absolutely and absurdly under that girl's influence! And what is more humiliating, under the influence of chairs, and tables, and pictures, and china cups! It makes me sick! And then that 'lord' business! Why did they introduce me? I don't want to know any 'lords.' And why, oh, why, did I sing that song again?"

She tormented herself all the way home; and was glad to find no one present but Flora. Flora was busy with her sewing, and she asked Jessie no questions, and the girl pleading fatigue, went to her room to rest. Fortunately she soon fell asleep. When she awakened, the sun was nearing the western horizon, and she heard her father's voice and John's laugh answering it. She rose rapidly to her feet; and her first

"A gown of Indian mull, and real Valenciennes. I was covetous of it, John."

"Did you see Mrs. Lloyd?"

Yes, mother. I saw her for half an hour. She is tall and walks very softly. Her face is thin and worn, but her eyes are remarkable; they are so dark and lambent, and I noticed them constantly dilating—not to what was said—but to her own thoughts. Mr. Lloyd came in just before I left, and Lord Medway was with him."

Then there followed a conversation largely composed of ejaculations and descriptions. It wearied Jessie; but she knew how much her father and mother loved to see this other life, through her eyes. So she told them all about the house and the garden; the furniture, the equipage, and the order of the lunch; and as far as her casual knowledge permitted, she gave them her impressions of Mr. Lloyd, and his guest, Lord Medway. But she was glad when they were satisfied; and she could go away with John, and express herself after her own desire. And she was not as hopeful as might have been expected.

"John," she said, "I think I have began too well. When people are so pleasant at first, the pleasantness does not last."

"Sometimes it does. All will likely depend on your pupil."

"Women get on pretty well—if men don't interfere. Generally speaking, we agree to believe in each other, until they do. I fear the man in this case."

"Who is he?"

Lord Medway. He gave me a glance, he had no right to give; for I think, he is Miss Lloyd's lover.

"What kind of a glance?"

"One of inquisitive admiration. It was, as if he had said 'I wonder who you are? I admire you very much!'"

"I don't see how a flash of the eyes could say all that, Jessie?"

"When the time comes for you to say 'all that' you will understand, how in a moment, your eyes can say it."

"But why should they? Have I not a tongue?"

"Your tongue will be too slow. Tongues need to be taught. Eyes talk naturally."

"Has Steve been giving you any such glances?"

"One or two."

"Have you returned them?"

"Perhaps."

"Then keep whatever promise they have made. To raise a hope or confidence, and then deceive it, Jessie, I think nothing can be meaner or more treacherous?"

"I wish I knew something about him. I wish I felt sure in my own mind."

"If ever you have a doubt, about any way, or any work, turn back, or give it up; doubt is error."

"Why doesn't he explain himself? Why not say plainly who he is, and where he comes from?"

"That is his affair—as yet. When are you going to the Lloyd's again?"

"Next Wednesday. As I have told you, I know not how long it will last. I do not trust such fair beginnings. However, from every harvest, I have always got my ear of corn."

"Don't be so mercenary, little woman. And I do wish you would trust humanity more. If you lose faith in men and women, you will soon lose faith in God, and yourself. All men are not liars. All friendship is not feigning."

"I saw one class of men and women in the hall last night. I saw another class at Lloyd Park to-day; how am I to judge them, John?"

"Do not judge them. I believe in them. There is a love of goodness in men and women which you may always appeal to, and never in vain. Ship-wrecks, epidemics, fires, disasters of any kind, bring to the front, without fail, some heroic, compassionate spirit."

"As for being mercenary, John, we have to be mercenary. What is life without money? And it is a constant fight to get your share of it."

"Certainly Jessie, you don't want money simply for your own luxury or pleasure, or for the sake of hoarding it?"

"Certainly, I do not."

"Then are you able and willing to be one of God's stewards and dispense wealth properly for him. Understand it is no light work. There will be an audit to meet which you must daily and hourly prepare for. No one's wealth is accidental."

MR. LLOYD AND LORD MEDWAY ENTERED THE ROOM.

thought was a healthy, physical desire for her dinner. Sleep had calmed and refreshed her and she was now ready to do herself justice.

"After all," she reflected, "I behaved creditably. Things went better than I expected. I looked my best, I sang well, and I was neither uncourteous nor presuming. I think I may say, with that egotistical old Rousseau, 'I do not know a better person than myself.'"

This little bit of conceit amused her; she bathed her face and smoothed her hair to the smile it evoked, and then joined the family. Every one had a welcome for her and John drew her fondly into the empty chair set next his own. "I kept it for you, Jessie," he said. "Flora declares you came home too tired to talk."

"Flora did not ask me to talk. She had a new paper pattern on her mind, so I saved my news for more appreciative listeners."

"Did you get your pupil?" asked her father.

"Yes—at my own terms, also."

"Is she nice? Is she pleasant tempered?"

"I don't think, mother, that the word 'nice' suits her. A nice woman, is one who always behaves like other women. I think Miss Lloyd would judge for herself, under all circumstances. She is, however, beautiful, and I think, she has a sweet and gracious disposition."

"What did she wear?"

Spiritual Power.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning January 10. Philippians 4 : 4-13.

OBSERVATION and experience alike prove the need of human nature of a spiritual power outside itself. The spiritual part of man needs reinforcement to enable it to maintain its supremacy over the animal nature. Unhappily, the need is often still farther back. It needs power to enable it to gain supremacy. Left to itself, human nature is like a neglected garden. It is over run with the weeds of sensuality and self-indulgence. The animal nature asserts itself, demands gratification and grows so imperative that the man, by continually yielding, sinks into a condition, but little better than the brutes. Mental culture will raise him one step by making him think, but he cannot attain to his true position in God's world until his spiritual nature is awakened and acquires the power to control his life. When the spirit is enthroned and governs both mind and body, and not until then, is the true order established in the human system. To reach that condition power is needed. Education alone is not sufficient. Every one who has been brought into contact with the victims of vice has seen how utterly education fails as a redeeming or preserving power. Young men who come from our institutions of learning fully equipped with knowledge of the sciences and arts, fall before temptation and sink into ruin. They may, too, have a perfect knowledge of the right and true course, and yet may fall. Nothing is more common than to find a man who knows what it is right to do, yet doing the very opposite. At the close of the seventh chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, Paul gives a vivid description of such an experience. The man not only knows the right, but earnestly desires to do it, yet does it not, but does the evil that he hates. Human nature is deplorably weak on its spiritual side, while its enemies, the powers which would degrade it and drag it down into the mire, are mighty. Its urgent and most indispensable need for its development is spiritual power.

It is this power that Christianity offers to all who will seek it. Christ pictured it under many images, each full of significance. He told the woman of Samaria that he had water to give which would spring up to everlasting life. He told the people that if they ate of the bread that he would give, they would live for ever. And to his disciples he gave a deeper thought when he told them that if they were to abide in him as the branch abides in the vine, they should bear much fruit. By these and many other figures, representing the same fact, he taught the great lesson of his mission to the world. He came to impart the divine life to men. To as many as believed him he gave power to become sons of God. His followers failed to grasp his meaning. They wanted to make him a king like Solomon. But he had a higher mission. Out of humanity with its dreary anarchy, its strange mixture of good and evil, its capacities for divine elevation and its propensities to devilish degradation, he wanted to develop the god-like. His own nature was a pattern of what ours may become. In its glorious purity, its sweet compassion, its overflowing love, its inexhaustible patience it was an ideal such as the world had never seen. It is this nature, by some strange mysterious power, he can give.

The Lord's Cup-bearer.

THE Christmas joy on the sweet day
Of the dear, loving Lord,
Is poured from out his gracious heart
Like an o'erflowing flood.

And all unto this fount may come,
All drink of it who will;
If no one fills the cup for you,
Go dip for others still.

The lowliest soul on earth may be
Most blest on Christmas Day,
By seeking out another soul
To cheer along the way.

The Lord's cup-bearer one may be
From morning until night,
Waiting upon him all the day,
Serve in the Master's sight.

PHEBE A. HOLDER.

Waiting On God.

I HAVE no cares, O blessed will!
For all my cares are thine:
I live in triumph, Lord! for thou
Hast made thy triumphs mine.

And when it seems no chance or change
From grief can set me free,
Hope finds its strength in helplessness,
And gladly waits on thee.

Man's weakness, waiting upon God,
Its ends can never miss,
For men on earth no work can do
More angel-like than this.

Ride on, ride on triumphantly,
Thou glorious will, ride on!
Faith's pilgrim song behind thee take
The road that thou hast gone.

Apocalyptic Figures.

Persons, Kingdoms and Political Forces described by Expressive Images in Prophecy.

BY REV. W. R. FREEMANTLE.

PROPHETCY resembles the Parables in the fact that its teachings are imparted through the medium of figures which must be studied carefully if we are to understand them. Now in Revelation seventeen there is exhibited to us the picture of a Woman clothed in purple and scarlet, at the climax of her power and false glory, drunken with the blood of the saints and martyrs and riding upon a scarlet-colored beast, without any apparent forebodings of coming misfortune.

She is called Babylon the Great, the mother of the abominations of the earth, and is described as being seated on the seven hills. It is my conviction that this Woman or Ecclesiastical power is the Church of Rome. At the same time, it is quite evident that the Wild-beast upon which the Woman is seated as a rider, must be a power altogether distinct from the Church of Rome.

This Wild-beast is a different system altogether, and partakes of a civil or political character, being in fact the Roman Empire and the governments and nations which constitute its Ten Kingdoms. The Woman or Church of Rome is to be destroyed, not by the personal appearing of Christ, but by the Ten Horns of the Wild-beast on which she rides, that is Ten Kings who are to hate and desolate and destroy her; to confiscate her ill-gotten gains and immense wealth, and to put an end to her existence, as an ostensibly Christian Church.

But after her desolation, there still remains surviving the Wild-beast that overthrew her, the False Prophet—an infidel ecclesiastical system that will rise in her place. Then will be the time when the infidel democratic powers denoted by the Wild-beast and its Ten Horns will exercise mighty dominion over the world, and there will be the Great Tribulation, especially throughout Christendom. The combination of infidel powers shall for a season wage a fierce warfare with the people of Christ, and gain vast influence and power.

I believe it is somewhere about the time of this great confusion then taking place that we shall have the appearing of our Lord and the ingathering of his saints. The Church of the firstborn will then be caught up to meet the Lord in the air as predicted in 1. Thess. 4: 16, 17; afterwards, at a considerably later period there will be the conversion of all the Jews that are then remaining upon the earth. There will first be a partial restoration of some of them in an unconverted state and from political motives, and after these shall have passed through "the time of Jacob's trouble," there will be the fuller restoration and conversion of all Israel including the ten Tribes, at the period of Christ's descent upon the earth.

As regards the two Jerusalems, there is an earthly one, and there is a heavenly one. The glory of the heavenly Jerusalem will shine upon the earthly one, and will heighten and increase its beauties. We have the destruction of Antichrist and the false prophet at the battle of Armageddon in Rev. 19, and the binding of Satan in the succeeding chapter. Now the devil has never yet been bound and deprived of his power, as here described. He is still exercising mighty influence; but then at last his power will come to an end.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Subscriber, Harlem, N. Y. My CHRISTIAN HERALD for this week has not yet come to hand. I presume you have unceremoniously cut me off. Do you think it just right to treat a subscriber of twelve years' standing in that

No subscriber is ever "unceremoniously" cut off from our list. We invariably send, a month previous to the renewal date, an expiry notice, politely informing each subscriber of the approaching expiration of his subscription, and respectfully inviting a continuance. This notice is sent in a separate envelope, and is accompanied by a prospectus, a premium announcement, a subscription blank, and an addressed return envelope. In addition, every copy served to a subscriber bears a tab with his name and address and the exact date when, unless renewed, the subscription will cease. When these various reminders fail to enlist the attention of the subscriber, we feel justified in concluding that he does not wish the paper continued, and it is then, and not till then, that his name is taken off the list.

The law permits a publisher to continue the service of the paper until a written order discontinuing it is sent, and even then the subscriber cannot stop it until every copy received has been paid for, and many publications avail themselves of this extraordinary privilege, but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has consistently refused to place its friends under involuntary tribute by sending the paper after their subscription has expired, thus compelling them to pay for what they have not ordered.

We believe that as a rule, our subscribers would much rather that we govern ourselves strictly in accordance with their written orders, then exercise discretionary powers at their expense.

Many subscribers who order THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent to relatives or friends, have expressed the greatest satisfaction with this system. They feel perfectly safe that when the term paid for has expired, the paper will be stopped, and hence they do not incur the risk of having eventually a bill presented for several years of service never contemplated at the time of placing the original order.

Now, as regards the discriminating in favor of old subscribers, however well intentioned or kindly disposed we may be, the size of our subscription list renders such favors absolutely impracticable. If the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were to undertake to familiarize himself with 500 different names daily, he could not in a single year cover his list of nearly 200,000 subscribers, a list so large that it precludes the possibility of detailed information in regard to individual subscribers. A business of such gigantic proportions cannot be handled otherwise than according to certain well-defined, thoroughly understood and systematically enforced rules, ensuring uniform attention and fair treatment to one and all, without prejudice or favor. Any other course must result in hopeless chaos.

No subscriber has ever yet appealed in vain to have a reasonable extension of time for the service has been continued without interruption, but to generally extend this favor without so much as a postal card requesting it, would involve us in the expenditure of tens of thousands of dollars annually, and eventually land

And if, within the immensity of heaven, there are such soul-satisfying avenues of opportunity as will suit every spiritual need, some of these opportunities will be suited to the capacity of the humblest and simplest, as well as to the greatest among Christ's followers. Whatever service may be allotted to the redeemed, it will doubtless be such as is best suited to individual spiritual capacity, and such as will afford the highest pleasure in its performance.

Dr. C. F. Muller, Vintard, Cal. Our Epworth League has decided to educate a girl in Mrs. Jamal's mission school at Jerusalem. Your recollection is correct; it costs about fifteen dollars yearly per head, to educate the Syrian girls in Mrs. Jamal's school. All contributions can be sent through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Constantinople, Nov. 30, 1896.—Dear Dr. Kopsch: I am an Armenian Protestant pastor in Constantinople. You have heard the horrible story of the massacre and pillage here. The most dreadful of it has been at Hasskeny, in the Golden Horn, where I labor as a pastor. All my property, house furniture, bedding, clothing, table services, etc., were pillaged, and what the plunderers could not take with them they damaged and broke in pieces. My loss is about $3,000. We are living with a friend. I have been a regular subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for sixteen years.

Repentance. — I have had wicked thoughts about the Holy Spirit. I have prayed to God to take them from me, but I have no peace. Have I sinned beyond hope? Are we responsible for thoughts that we cannot control?

We are responsible if we harbor and cherish such thoughts, but not for their intrusion. If you continue in prayer and if you resolutely turn your mind away from the thoughts when they enter you will soon be rid of them. Settle in your mind on some subject which is full of interest to you, and begin to think of that the moment such thoughts enter your mind. As to the past, do not distress yourself. God forgives the truly penitent.

D. L. D. How was Christ made perfect as stated in Hebrews 5: 9? I have always believed he was born perfect.

In his incarnation he was placed in new and trying circumstances. He must have gained by the experience. He acquired, for one thing, by his suffering a power to sympathize with the tried and the harassed and the tempted, which could not be possessed by one who had never been in the flesh. You may be sympathetic, but we doubt whether you, or any one else who has always been free, could know exactly how a slave might feel, as you would if ever you had been a slave yourself. We are told that Job was a perfect man (Job. 1: 8), but after his suffering the perfect man has gained much and had learned some lessons he did not know before.

Reader, Nova, O. 1. What influence has the soul on the body or the body on the soul? 2. If membership in some church is essential to salvation, how could the thief on the cross have been saved?

1. We are not sure that we quite understand your question. The body may degrade the soul, as when the appetite for intoxicating liquor is indulged, and in many other ways. The soul may refine and elevate the body by its communion with God, and its aspirations after Christlikeness. 2. The thief had no opportunity of joining a church because he died on the day of his conversion. A man may be saved without joining a church, but if he neglects to do so when he has the opportunity, he disobeys Christ's command to confess him before men, and Christ will be ashamed of him.

C. M. F., San Diego, Cal. As the Israelites saw the bodies of the Egyptians dead upon the seashore (Ex. 14: 30), is it not possible that some Egyptians may have come to the place afterwards, and finding Pharaoh's body have taken it back and embalmed it? In that way his mummy might be found even if he had been drowned.

His mummy has never been found so far as we are aware. The Pharaoh whose mummy was found was that of Rameses II, who is generally identified with the Pharaoh of the Oppression, whose death is recorded in Exodus 2: 23. If his son Menepth was the Pharaoh of the Exodus, as is probable, he lived some years afterward as is seen by the monuments. He had a son who died in some mysterious way, and whose death he lamented. It is supposed that this son died on the Passover night. Menepth was just the kind of a man to stay on dry land and send his army into danger.

THE MAXIMILIAN MONUMENT ON "THE HILL OF THE BELLS," AT QUERETARO.

Though a little town of only 25,000 or 30,000 population, Queretaro has played an important part in American history. It was captured by the Spaniards in 1536 and, a century later, was known as a thriving Spanish city. In 1848, it was the seat of a Congress by which peace between the United States and Mexico was ratified. In 1867, it was the scene of the Maximilian tragedy. Unable to hold Queretaro against the republican troops under Escobedo, Emperor Maximilian was made prisoner and shot in the Cerro de las Campanas to the north of the town. The exact spot where the execution took place is shown in our photograph. Miramon and Mejias, were shot with the Emperor, and the three stone pillars of the monument stand for the trio of victims. There is no inscription on the monument, which was erected by the families of Miramon and Mejias. Mme. Miramon is still living, and the unfortunate Empress Carlotta is also believed to be alive, but insane, in some retreat abroad. Queretaro is a beautiful little city, and produces the finest opals in the world, but it is seldom mentioned save as the scene of the doom of the unfortunate Maximilian.

on many grounds. The woman jeopardizes her whole life's happiness and reputation and the man has no right to ask her to run such a risk. If he loves her he will be exceedingly careful of her good name. Social usage regards secret marriages with great disfavor, and the parties to such an act in most cases bitterly regret it. It is natural that relatives should regard it as an unpardonable slight upon themselves, if nothing worse. Marriage is a sacred compact and should be entered into before the whole world and not made a matter of subterfuge and secrecy.

Angelic Service.

A Sermon Preached in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, the Late Pastor C. H. Spurgeon's Church, by his Son and Successor, Pastor Thomas Spurgeon. Text, Matt. 4: 11, "Then the devil leaveth him, and, behold angels came and ministered unto him."

I DOUBT not that the angels, bright, blest-spirits that they are, have always been glad to serve the sons of men. They have shouted for joy in creation's days, and they have ever found a cause of gladness, in attending, at God's command, to the wants and wishes of mankind. I am sure there was a smile upon the angel's face when he awakened the prophet Elijah, and bade him satisfy his hunger and strengthen his frame with the repast miraculously provided; and I cannot doubt that that seraph was delighted to perform his God-given commission when in a dream he warned Joseph, the reputed father of Jesus, of certain who sought the young child's life. If you will be at the trouble to turn up the instances in the Old Testament and in the New, where angels are said to have come with messages and Revelations from the Glory-land, you will find that there is not in a solitary instance so much as a trace of unwillingness on their part, but, on the contrary, rather, evident proof that with glowing feet and gladsome hearts they ran to man's relief. But I cannot help believing that there was a special zest when they were sent to minister to Jesus. To the heirs of salvation they hurried happily with helping hands, but to him who was heir of all things they surely came with fleet wings and brighter features than in any other case. They were glad to render service for him, as they announced to Mary that he should presently be born, or when at his incarnation they turned the midnight into glorious daytime, and sang the sweetest song that the listening earth has ever caught. Gladder still they must have been to roll the stone away and give him opportunity for resurrection. Perhaps their joy culminated when they received him on high, as he ascended, leading captivity captive.

They brought his chariot from above,
To bear him to his throne;
Clapped their triumphant wings and cried
"The glorious work is done."

How joyously did they bid him welcome to the portals of the Paradise which he had left that he might bring earth back to God! I am not sure, however, but that they found their highest pleasure in ministering to Jesus in and need. Their joy, of course, was chastened; but who is there amongst us that has suffered but will admit that some of the joys that bloom amid our sorrows are, indeed, the sweetest of them all? There is in such case a sort of background that sets them forth and makes them shine more brilliantly and scintillate more sparkingly, and I fancy I am not far out when I conclude that the angels were never happier, even in their ministrations to Jesus, than when they found him fainting after his combat with the devil, and helped him up or wiped the perspiration away maybe, or brought from heaven some dainty from the Father's table that he might refresh himself therewith. Then did the desert grow glad. It blossomed as a rose, both to the angels and to the angels' Lord; for they were privileged to make him feel at ease once more, to assuage his anguish, and to aid him in his faintness. There is only one amongst the angels that I envy more than these of whom our text is speaking to us, and that is the one, a solitary one as the record leads us to suppose, who came direct from heaven to the Garden of Olives, who was content to leave the lustre of the glory-land for the shades of Gethsemane. "There appeared an angel unto him from heaven, strengthening him." Oh, happy, happy, happy angel, to be charged with a commission at once so sad and yet so glad, to take thy Master in thine arms, and strengthen him in the midst of his awful struggle. Are we not privileged this morning to have for our theme the ministration of angels with respect to Jesus himself?

I want you, first, to rejoice with me that Jesus, even in his mortal life, was thus attended. We have often found it glad employ to think of Jesus in the land of light, worshipped and waited upon by the noblest and brightest of God's intelligences, and there has been no little pain as we saw him quitting all, turning his back upon all the pleasures and gladnesses of heaven, and on all the honor and glory that circled like a glistening sea around his throne. We may find some little consolation in the fact that he did not leave them all behind. Some were the

when he journeyed to the far-off parts of his Father's dominion. Some hovered in the air, I doubt not, through all his earthly pilgrimage. Ever and anon some glimpses of his glory flashed through his person, and some proofs of his princely lineage appeared, as a part of his retinue was made manifest. Here in the wilderness the angels run to his relief.

They do not appear to have come to his help until the threefold battle had been fought. This was not because of any unwillingness on their part to aid him, you may be sure; it was not cowardice that kept them at a distance. It would not do for them to venture into the lists lest there should seem to be at last a division of the honors of the day. He must thus early tread the wine-press alone, and of the people, ay, even of those that peopled heaven, there must be none with him. I cannot think, however, but that they surrounded him meanwhile. Will your imagination allow you to depict them? Can you see just a trace of anxiety upon their brows occasionally, just when the devil is hurling himself upon his enemy? There was no cause for fear. Perhaps I do the angels an injustice to suppose that they had any sort of trembling or of dismay. Perhaps I shall better speak their mind if I tell you that all the while there sat upon their features a look of ineffable scorn that one who had been hurled headlong from the battlements of heaven should venture to attack the Christ of God.

And then I see their faces light with joy as they draw again and again the same old trusty blade, the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, gives the devil yet another thrust which he can by no means parry; and I can well believe that they clapped their triumphant wings when, as our text records, the devil left him. Then did a look of triumph light their eyes. They had witnessed a military tournament the like of which even heaven had never beheld before, and now they take their conquering Chief in their arms and bear him up, and speak, as only angels can, sweet words of heavenly cheer.

This leads me to inquire, what do you suppose these angels did for Jesus? He for a little while was made lower than the angels, for he became a man, and must needs condescend to accept service from them. They are privileged to render first aid, not to the wounded, for Jesus had no scratch nor scar from all the devil's fiery shafts, but first aid to one who, having fasted long and struggled bravely, was now wearied and exhausted by reason of the fray. I am not at all sure but that they brought food for the body, and Christ did eat angels' food. Certainly they had comforts for his mind. Perchance they wiped the perspiration from his brow. It may be that they upheld him when he was like to faint. In a word, they did for him just what he needed, whatever that may have been. I expect they gave him, when he was able to receive them, their own congratulations; and who shall say but that from the Father's lips they brought some kindly message, for he had watched his Son while he was receiving this baptism of fire, the first, if not the fiercest, of the long list of his temptations. "Oh,

What a Change it Was for Jesus! "The devil leaveth him," and well may the evangelist say "Behold!"—there is room for several notes of exclamation here—"Behold! angels came and ministered unto him." See, on the other hand, the retreating foe, his dragon wings spread wide that he may hurry back to the abyss from whence he came. See on the other hand, the air all bright and resonant with fluttering, glittering angels' wings. The struggle is over for a season. Hell has given place to heaven. The wilderness now blossoms like a rose, and shining ones with their celestial solicitude are caring for the Son of man, the Son of God, who suffered so keenly and fought so bravely. I love to think of the delicious thrill that must have gone through the heart of Jesus as, heaving a sigh of relief, he found that, desperate as was the battle, it was over at last. His Father had not forgotten him, he had sent him help from the sanctuary, he had strengthened him out of Zion, and now he has time to take his breath and gather strength again before the fiend can have at him once more. Blessed Saviour, I do rejoice to think that thus on earth thou wast celestially attended!

May we not cherish the hope that we also may be similarly cared for. Christ has fought our battles, I know, but we have battles of our own to fight. Our war with devils is not confined to a solitary action. We must fight until we win—nay, we must fight until we die; and I comfort myself with the thought—I may be wrong, but I hope I am not mistaken—that angels are helpful

Agencies on My Behalf.

The experience of others leads me to hope this. I cannot forget that Hagar in her distress cried unto the Lord, and an angel spake words of comfort to her out of heaven. I have not forgotten that Lot had his wrists seized by rescuing angels who led him out of Sodom. I have read of Gideon, of Joshua, of Mary, and of Joseph, of Peter, and Paul, and Philip, and of others to whom bright spirits came in the hour of need with messages divine. I have not forgotten that it is said of Israel that the angel of his presence saved them. Perhaps that has reference to the fiery cloudy pillar which, as some suppose, spread itself like cherub wings about the camp of God's chosen people.

Well, we are not without our angel, the angel of his presence that still saves us; and to those whose eyes were opened as were those of the young man in Dothan, in answer to the prophet's prayer, the hills all round grow white with many an angel tent, for "the angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them." I really believe I have the Scriptures to encourage this hope. There is the text that I have just quoted, and there is another that the devil misquoted, "For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways. They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone." Oh, if the eyes of our faith were opened we should have no cause to doubt that the air is all pierced with angel messengers flitting hither, flying thither, hastening everywhere, ministering to them that shall be the heirs of salvation.

What Do the Angels Do For Us?

They do not take us out of the world and so save us from the evil; but I think they do for us what they did for Jesus—they watch us in the battle, they help us when the battle is ended lest we faint by reason of the stress and strain. I am not sure but what they help us in the midst of the conflict sometimes, as that one did who succored Jesus in Gethsemane. I will not say for certain that the angels repel demons for us, and counteract spiritual plots, and ward off ills—I cannot say for certain, though I sometimes dream they do. I am content, however, to stick to the scriptures; they bear us up in their arms, they are our guardians, the nurses of our childhood, and if they do not feed us with earthly provender, they do bring spiritual food for our hearts, I doubt not. Thus they strengthen us. Blessed be the name of the Lord that he has not forgotten us any more than he did his first-begotten Son in this matter.

But, remember that we are not to presume upon angels' ministrations. It is in all God's ways—in all our ways if they are God's—that the angels bear us up and care for us. The devil left that out when he quoted that scripture to Jesus. He forgot, perhaps intentionally, to say, "In all thy ways." Brother, venture not where God has not sent thee, trusting angel ministrations, for angels only go with thee when thou goest whither God commands thee. Expect not that providence will shelter thee, nor that grace will succor thee if thou of thine own free will and wicked waywardness wanderest into paths unholly. Thank God, you may hope for helpful influences from the ever blessed Spirit, from the word of God, from ministers of the gospel who are the angels of the churches, and, for aught I know, from those bright intelligences themselves, if you walk upright in the way of the Lord.

Briefly, in closing, I want that you and I shall resolve to imitate the bright examples of the angels. Jesus is here in the person of the poor and of the needy, especially them that are of the household of faith. You still can help the tried, the tempted, the perplexed. You can be an angel of light to Jesus, even as Saul of Tarsus was an evil angel, persecuting the Christ while he persecuted the church. Here is work both for men and women. The charity that blesses Christ to-day can drop from the fingers of the sisters as certainly as from the hands of the men. Let us all be up and doing in this matter. But we cannot do angels' work unless we have the angels' secret. 'Twas love that brought them to the wilderness, 'twas love to Jesus that took the other one into gloomy, dark Gethsemane. It is very little use your trying to minister to the poor and needy unless you do it out of love to Jesus. Many a bundle of blessing has been turned into a bundle of curses because it was tied up with the red tape of officialism. Bind up your blessing with silken cords of love to Christ and to your fellow-men. Then you will do the angels' work in angels' fashion.

Gentle Ministrations.

Moreover, you must cultivate their disposition. How gentle are the angels! Hear them talking to the women who came weeping to the sepulchre. "Fear not," says one. "Whom seekest thou?" says another. "Why weepest thou?" says a third. There is something about their very demeanor that shows that though they be angels they are touched with a feeling of the infirmities of those poor sufferers. Try to be gentle, too, as you minister to the wants and woes of men. Oh, to be as wise as the angels! He charges even them with folly. Would to God we could be half as wise as they, for many of our gifts are spoiled by want of wisdom in the giving. How pure they are! Oh, that we could offer our charities every day with the self-same pure devotion and unsullied love that they know who have never sinned!

We shall do well, also, to adopt their methods in ministering. How swift they are! They are as winds that nothing can obstruct. How strong they are! They are as flames of fire that nothing can resist. They excel in strength, and are willing to do for the humblest of God's people the lowliest of service. Oh, that we may catch the angelic and seraphic spirit, and give our gifts as they have given their service to Jesus and to his people, and through the rest of our lives just minister to Christ—for he is here in the person of his saints—as the angels did in the bleak wilderness and in dark Gethsemane. The Lord incline you to devise liberal things and render cheerful service for the help of the poor and the needy!

PASTOR THOMAS SPURGEON.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

THE Evangelical Alliance for the United States suggests the following topics for the Week of Prayer, January 3d-10th, 1897. The sub-topics are given by way of suggestion, so that each pastor can select his own. Pastors' notes will be sent free to any pastor asking for them.

Lord is good unto them that wait for him, to the soul that seeketh him.—Lam. 3: 25.

Monday, January 4. Humiliation and Thanksgiving. Confession: Of personal, social and national sins.—Psalm 25: 1-18; Joel 2: 12-14. Thanksgiving: For the blessings of the year.—Psalm 107: 1-9; Psalm 145: 1-9; Eph. 1: 3-7.

Tuesday, January 5th. The Church Universal. Praise: For the reality of Christian unity, and for its increasing recognition.—1 Cor. 12: 12-27. Prayer: For the Holy Spirit: for a pure Gospel: for the fellowship of believers: for the fulfilment of the Church's mission.—Acts 2: 1-18; 1 John 1: 3-7; Matt. 13: 31-33.

Wednesday, January 6th. Nations and their rulers. Praise: For the general prevalence of peace; for the happy issue of the Venezuelan dispute; for the progress of arbitration.—Matt. 5: 9. Prayer: For all in authority: for courts of justice and legislatures, that righteousness may prevail in them; for the complete triumph of the principle of arbitration; for temperance and all other needed reforms: for the brotherhood of men, that all sectionalism, class prejudices and race antipathies may cease.—Rom. 13: 1-7; Prov. 23: 29-35; Isa. 2: 4; Acts 17: 26; Psa. 133.

Thursday, January 7. Foreign Missions. Praise: For the progress of the year: for the assurance that the will of God will yet be done in earth as it is in heaven.—Rev. 11: 15. Prayer: For a revival of the missionary spirit: for the inspiration of the Holy Spirit in the interdenominational meetings the ensuing week in the interest of Foreign Missions: for the relief of missionary treasures: for missionaries, especially those exposed to peculiar perils; for Armenians, Stundists and all who are persecuted for Christ's sake: for the conversion of the world.—Matt. 28: 18-20; Matt. 5: 10-12; Isa. 35.

Friday, January 8th. Home Missions. Praise: For increasing apprehension of the social mission of the Church: for the growth of municipal reform.—Isa. 65: 17-25. Prayer: For missionary societies burdened with debt: for home and city missionaries; for increased co-operation; for neglected populations, both city and rural, and for a divine urgency that shall impel to effort in their behalf.—Luke 24: 46, 47; Luke 10: 1, 2.

Saturday, January 9th. Families and Schools. Praise: For families united in Christ and for the increasing number of Christian youth. Prayer: For parents, children, and servants: for a more general observance of family worship; for all schools, colleges, seminaries and universities: for Sunday Schools and for religious societies for young men and women.—Col. 3: 18-20.

Sunday, January 10th. Sermons. "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."—Matt. 28: 18-20.

Requests for Prayer.

AT the Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting, on the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Dec. 13, in accordance with the requests of many converts, to whom the following subjects were suggested:

For the Conversion of Relatives and Friends. Brooklyn.

For the Conversion of Friends. Brooklyn.

For the Conversion of Friends. Brooklyn.

For the Conversion of Friends. Brooklyn.

For the Conversion of Friends. Brooklyn.

and be born again of the Spirit.—Reader, Walkerton, Ont., for the conversion of a man whose misconduct has brought suffering on his family for several years past, and that he may have strength to lead a consistent Christian life and be able to earn an honest livelihood.—Sorrowing one, Rapid City, S. D., for the conversion of two sons and a daughter and that their mother might receive the help of the Holy Spirit in her troubled life, and may be enabled to live honestly and pay her way.—Mother, Ohio, Mich., that her two sons may be converted to God.—Anxious Mother in Pennsylvania, that husband, son, and daughter might all consecrate their lives to Christ and his service.—Reader, Easton, O., for the conversion of one who is near and dear to her and that in his great mercy God would touch the heart of one who is a slave of liquor and is tempting others to sin, and change his nature; also that her sons may give themselves to Christ.—N. T. Welford, Kansas, that her husband who once knew the Lord, but has gone astray, may be restored to God's favor and that her three children may turn to the Lord and serve him.—Believer, Ont., for the conversion of father and uncle who are utterly indifferent to Spiritual things.—J. B. T., Cambridgeport, Mass., for the conversion of an adopted son who has gone astray, but is not beyond the reach of the Spirit.—Believer, New York City, that God would show a dear son his need of a Saviour and convince him that a good moral character is not sufficient for salvation.—Reader, Renovo, Pa., for the conversion of her husband and that he may have grace to lead an open, truthful life; also that she may herself be delivered from a censorious, Pharisaical spirit.—Reader, Concord, N. H., that a dear relative may give his heart to God and may lead his family in the right way.—Sister in Christ, Moreland, O., for the conversion of her husband who has been the subject of many prayers.—A. A. T., Rockland, Ill., that God would bring a whole family into his fold, brothers, sister and children, so that at last, not one may be missing from the circle in heaven.—Harassed Father, New York City, that his son, who has been for years a source of sorrow and shame, might be brought by the power of the Spirit to abandon his dissipated ways and follow Christ.—E. C. Scotland, S. D., earnestly entreats all Christian friends to offer an urgent prayer for the conversion of her children.—A. H. Troy, Pa., that the Holy Spirit might bring her husband back to the Lord and renew his heart; also that a dear son might be kept from evil and made a child of God.—Believer, Sturgis, Mich., for the conversion of an only son.—Mother, Chapell, Neb., that God would change the hearts of an unconverted son and daughter-in-law and make them both members of his kingdom.—Mission Worker, Highlands, Colorado, for the conversion of a young man who is away from home and will not return, and of a motherless girl who has been led astray and is leading a dissolute life. Both cases are pitiable in the extreme, as under happier circumstances they might have both been happy, useful Christians.

For the Restoration of Health. Shut-in, Bat Cave, N. C., asks for the prayers of God's people that an only daughter may be saved from dying of consumption.—Distressed, Brooklyn, N. Y., that in his infinite mercy God would heal him and save him from falling a victim to a dread-malady.—Believer, Windsor, O., that a son may be cured of a distressing affliction which is a hindrance and a humiliation to him.—Reader, Darien, N. Y., for the recovery of a sick brother who is sick of the palsy.—One who Believes, Chenoe, Ill., that a sick mother may be restored, and that strength be given her to bear an approaching ordeal which it is hoped will lead to her recovery.—J. W. Monmouth, N. J., that God would mercifully look upon herself and her sister in their affliction, and restore to them their hearing.—H. R. M., Zanesville, Ind., that God would recover her daughter who is dangerously ill.—Anxious Mother, Portland, N. Y., for the recovery of her daughter who has been an invalid for years and seems to be getting worse.—J. W. Truro, N. S., that a young lady who is a great sufferer, may be restored to health and usefulness.—W. L. K., whose father, mother, and sister are all sick, begs prayers for their speedy recovery.—D. W. H., Olinda, Ont., that a young physician, whose usefulness has been a blessing, may be healed of a dangerous disease, and that God would give skill and wisdom to the physicians to whom he has gone for treatment.

For Special Blessings. Sister in Christ, Larrabe, Maine, that God would send her a dear son who is empty.—J. R. M., Charlotte Harbor, Fla., for the conversion of a dear son who is empty.

For Special Blessings. Sister in Christ, Larrabe, Maine, that God would send her a dear son who is empty.—J. R. M., Charlotte Harbor, Fla., for the conversion of a dear son who is empty.

surance that they are blotted out.—H. M. W., Kansas City, Mo., who is sorely disturbed because his wife is suing him at law, begs for prayer that God would open her eyes to her mistake, and cause her to discontinue her suit.—Anxious, Bethlehem, Pa., to be delivered out of a sore trouble.—Two Sorrowful Wives, who once led dissolute lives, but are now struggling to live down the past and serve Christ faithfully, beg for prayer that the strength they need may be granted, and that they may be saved from reproach and humiliation.—Old Reader, Lockport, N. Y., who fears that she has grieved the Holy Spirit, and is in consequence in great distress, asks prayer that she may be restored to God's favor, and may again enjoy the peace she once had.—B. V. V., Ada, O., for financial aid in an emergency, that he may be enabled to meet his obligations honestly and punctually and may not lose his property.

DOES YOUR ANCHOR HOLD?
WHEN the waves are beating fiercely,
And the tides are sweeping by;
When the lightning and the thunder
Shake and rend the blackened sky.

REFRAIN:
Does your anchor hold, my brother;
Is it fast upon the rock?
If your faith lays hold on Jesus
You can stand the tempest's shock.

When the waves of strong temptation,
And the tides of habit sweep
Fiercely when your soul is anchored
Out on life's unstable deep.

Does your anchor hold, etc.
When destructive gales of anguish,
And the floods of bitter tears;
Breaking heart or pain of body
Raises doubtings dark and fears.

Does your anchor hold, etc.
When some Pharisee deceives you,
Or betrays or puts to shame;
When you are defamed by some one
Falsely wearing Christ's fair name.

Does your anchor hold, etc.
When, in want, a subtle envy
Seeks a place within your breast;
When the strong ebb-tide of failure
Fills your soul with deep unrest.

Does your anchor hold, etc.

Mixed Choirs.*

THE only satisfactory choirs are the mixed choirs of men and women.

Upon them has devolved the cultivation of artistic choral music in our public concert-rooms. As we know such choirs now they are of comparatively recent origin, and it is a singular commentary upon the way in which musical history is written, that the fact should have so long been overlooked that the credit of organizing the first belongs to the United States. A little reflection will show this fact, which seems somewhat startling at first blush, to be entirely natural. Large singing societies are of necessity made up of amateurs, and the want of professional musicians in America compelled the people to enlist amateurs at a time when in Europe choral activity rested on the church, and institute choristers, who were practically professionals.

As the hitherto accepted record stands, the first amateur singing society was the Singakademie of Berlin, which Carl Freidrich Fash, accompanist to the royal flautist, Frederick the Great, called into existence in 1791.

When the Bremen Singakademie was organized there were already choirs in the United States as far west as Cincinnati. In that city they were merely church choirs at first, but within a few years they had combined into a large body and were giving concerts at which some of the choruses of Handel and Haydn were sung. That their performances, as well as those of the New England societies, were cruder than those of their European rivals may well be believed, but with this I have nothing to do. I am simply seeking to establish the priority of the United States in amateur choral culture. The number of American cities in which oratorios are performed annually is now about fifty.

In size mixed choirs ordinarily range from forty voices to five hundred. It were well if it were understood by choristers as well as the public that numbers merely are not a sign of merit in a singing society. So the concert-room be not too large, a choir of sixty well-trained voices is large enough to perform almost everything in choral literature with good effect, and the majority of the best compositions will sound better under such circumstances than in large rooms with large choirs. The use of large choirs has had the effect of developing the skillfulness of amateur singers in an astonishing degree, but there is, nevertheless, a point where weightiness of tone becomes an obstacle to finished execution.

Falling and Stumbling.*

THERE is a world-wide difference between the falling of a sinner and the stumbling of a saint. The sinner habitually walks in the way of evil; the saint has deliberately chosen the way of good. When the sinner falls, he falls in the evil way that he is pursuing; that is to say, his uniform course is sinful, but his fall involves an outbreathing sin. Lust has been in his heart, but it breaks out in open impurity; latent hate has been there, but it betrays him into the sin of violence; secret avarice now becomes open over-reaching or dishonesty. The sin is in accordance with the habitual life he has been leading. On the other hand, when the child of God who has chosen the good way and walked in it thus far, stumbles into sin, this is not in accordance with his ordinary walk; and when he is recovered by the grace of God, he pursues the same path in the same direction, as before his error. The difference between these two is finely expressed in the Bible. James says, "Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth, and one bring him back." A brother is supposed to be walking in the way of the truth, and to make a temporary deviation from that way; and some one is to call his attention to the evil-doing, and bring him back into the right way. Again, the apostle Paul says in his letter to the Galatians, "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual restore such a one." Some old habit comes up, as it were, from behind, and when he is incautious and unheeding, trips him up, so that he falls. "Now you," says Paul, "which are spiritual, go and help him up, on his feet, and set him on his way again, with the help of your sympathy and prayers."

Free to all Readers.—The New Cure for Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.

As stated in the last issue the new botanical discovery, Alkavis, is proving a wonderful curative in all diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or disordered action of the Kidneys and urinary organs. The New York World publishes the remarkable case of Rev. A. C. Darling, minister of the gospel at North Constantia, New York, cured by Alkavis, when, as he says himself, he had lost faith in man and medicine, and was preparing himself for certain death. Similar testimony to this wonderful new remedy comes from others, including many ladies suffering from disorders peculiar to womanhood. The Church Kidney Cure Co., of No. 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, who so far are its only importers, are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. To prove its wonderful curative powers, it is sent to you entirely free.

Pennsylvania Railroad to Issue Clerical Orders.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company announces that for 1907 it will issue clerical orders to regularly ordained clergymen in charge of churches located on or near its lines east of Pittsburgh and Erie. To secure these orders clergymen should make application to the nearest ticket agent as soon as possible.

THE correct construction of a costume according to one's own ideas can best be accomplished at home by one's self. The most convenient stitching mechanism for the purpose is the Singer Automatic, making the single-thread chain-stitch. Its simplicity of parts, easy operation, and the excellence of its work, specially commend its use to the dilettante dressmaker desiring to express her artistic perceptions in the most appropriate form.

Having all the advantages claimed for other "automatic" sewing-machines, the Silent Singer has many points of preference that can easily be demonstrated by comparison. Of faultless construction and finish, it is absolutely the lightest-running, the simplest and most compact. It is more easily threaded, and its parts are better protected from dust. The broad treadle better of the operator, because it is lower and the position of the feet can be changed at will. These points are worthy careful consideration by those of delicate health or unaccustomed to continuous use of a sewing machine.

Aid for Armenia.

COPIES OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are arriving in the United States at the present time. A number went to Canada from Marseilles recently, and it is learned that arrangements are in the way of sending more to the Dominion, where they will have an opportunity to engage in agricultural labor. In the towns and villages of Armenia, the suffering among the poor continues to be widespread, although noble efforts are being made to relieve those localities where the worst distress prevails. It is announced in letters from missionaries in the field that there are at the present time over fifty thousand Armenian orphans, whose parents were victims of the late massacres or died of hunger and privation afterward. Missionaries at Ooria, Cesarea, Diarbekir, Van, Harpoot, and other cities are feeding and sheltering as many of these orphan children as possible. The sum of $1,000 was forwarded from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund during the week, to be applied toward the support of the orphan children by the American Board missionaries at the following places:

Van	$250.
Cesarea	250.
Ooria	250.
Harpoot	250.

This is the tenth weekly remittance of $1,000 for distribution in the field, and, together with previous disbursements, makes a total of $52,000 distributed in relief work by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund in Armenia to date. The contributions to the Fund during the week were as follows:

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

Up to Heaven on Wings of Song

MARY A. LIVERMORE is one of those splendid personalities who accomplished service of national interest and importance a generation ago, but have gone on with ever-increasing enthusiasm and freshness of spirit into the new world of to-day. Mrs. Livermore threw her sublime energy, immense store of practical wisdom, and boundless tenderness of heart into caring for the sick and wounded soldiers during the dark days of the War of the Rebellion. In her thrilling book, "My Story of the War," there is perhaps gathered more heart-stirring incidents than in any other volume which has grown out of that historic period. Here is one which reveals some of the characteristics of this great-hearted, heroic woman:

She was one day nearing the completion of her tour of a hospital ward, when she paused beside the cot of a poor fellow on whose face the unmistakable look of death was settling.

"You are suffering a great deal," she said.

"Oh, yes! Oh, yes!" he gasped: "I am, I am! but not in body. I can bear that. I don't mind pain—I can bear anything—but I can't die! I can't die!"

"Why are you afraid to die?" she inquired. "Tell me, my poor boy."

"I ain't fit to die. I have lived an awful life, and I'm afraid to die. I shall go to hell."

She drew a camp-stool to his bedside and, sitting down, put her hands on his shoulders, and spoke in commanding tones, as to an excited child: "Stop screaming. Be quiet. If you must die, die like a man, and not like a coward. Be still, and listen to me." And she proceeded to combat his fear of death, and his sense of guilt with assurances of God's willingness to pardon. She told him of Christ's mission on earth, and assured him that however great had been his sins they would be forgiven of God, since he was penitent and sought forgiveness. She bade him repeat after her the words of a prayer, which he did with tearful earnestness. She backed up her assurances by quotations from the Bible and illustrations from the life of Christ: but she felt she was making little impression on the dying man.

At last the poor fellow exclaimed:

"Can't you get a minister? I used to belong to the church, but I fell away. Oh, send for a minister!"

Mrs. Livermore was determined that nothing should be left undone that might bring comfort and salvation to the poor fellow, and on inquiry found that the hospital steward was also a minister, and soon had him at the man's bedside. To him the wounded soldier listened eagerly. After he steward had talked with him a little and prayed with him, Mrs. Livermore inquired, "Can't you sing?"

Immediately, in a rich, full, clear tenor, whose melody floated through the ward, and charmed every groan and wail into silence, the steward sang hymn after hymn, all of them familiar:

Come, humble sinner, in whose breast
A thousand thoughts revolve.
Love divine, all love excelling,
Joy of heaven, to earth come down
Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to thy bosom fly.
My days are gliding swiftly by,
And I, a pilgrim stranger.

All of these hymns were so well-known the dying soldier, that she saw he followed the singer, verse after verse. The music affected him as she had hoped. The burden rolled from the poor boy's heart, and in feeble, tender tones he said, "It's all right with me, chaplain! I will trust in Christ! God will forgive me! I can die now!"

"Sing on, chaplain!" Mrs. Livermore suggested, as he seemed about to pause to make reply. "God is sending peace and light into the troubled soul of this poor boy, through these divine hymns, and your heavenly voice. Sing on, don't stop!"

He continued to sing, but now chose a different style of hymn and tune, and burst forth into a most rapturous strain:

Come, sing to me of heaven,
For I'm about to die;
Sing songs of holy ecstasy,
To waft my soul on high.
There'll be no sorrow there,
There'll be no sorrow there.
In heaven above, where all is love,
There'll be no sorrow there.

She looked down the ward, and saw that the wan faces of the men, contracted with pain, were brightening. She looked at the dying man beside her and saw, underneath the deepening pallor of death, an almost radiant gleam.

Then the chaplain was summoned away by a call from his office. It was getting late in the afternoon, for she had tarried a couple hours at this bedside, when her friends came from other wards of the hospital to say that it was time to return.

"Don't go; stay!" whispered the fast sinking man. The words of the master rushed to her memory, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me," and she promised to remain with him to the end. The end came sooner than anyone thought. Before the sun went down, with courageous heart and rapturous face, he had put out to sea for the immortal shore.

FATHER, GUIDE ME.

FATHER, guide me, 'mid the shadows
That have thickly gathered 'round,
And are hiding stars and sunlight,
Creeping slowly o'er the ground,—
Guide me, for I'm sure without thee
I shall stumble, lose my way,
Never see the break of morning
Or the dawn of perfect day.

Father, keep me when the billows
Of bereavement toss my bark,
And my soul is almost stranded
On the rocks amid the dark—
Keep me, for thy strength in weakness
Is made perfect, and I know
Thou canst help me when the billows
O'er me in their fury flow.

Father, shield me when the arrows
Of temptation 'round me fly,
When the evil powers haunt me,
And no earthly help is nigh,
Shield me, for without thy power
I shall fall to rise no more,
And shall miss the joy of ever
Walking on the golden shore.

Father, help me when the hour
Comes for me to bid farewell
To my dear ones in this valley,—
Go across the stream to dwell.
Help me, for I'm sure the Tempter
With his allies will be there.
And thy grace will help me conquer,
Help me triumph o'er despair.

The Symptoms of Gout and Rheumatism are caused by uric acid poisoning, and a reliable remedy must be capable of removing the poisonous substance.

TARTARLITHINE
does this. It reduces the pain and inflammation and rapidly eliminates the uric acid. TARTARLITHINE is pleasant to take, and does not affect the action of the heart.

It will not Disturb the Digestion.

Price $1.00 per bottle. See that the label reads "Tartarlithine." If your druggist does not keep it a bottle will be mailed on receipt of price by

McKesson & Robbins,
Manufacturing Chemists,
95 Fulton Street, New York.
